Power balanced in discipline shift

by Katya Hokanson

Major changes in the procedure of the Discipline Committee, including allowing students to challenge the impartiality of committee members, may go into effect next year as a response to criticism of procedures used in judging this year's sexual harassment cases.

Under changes formulated by the Committee to Review Disciplinary Procedures, headed by political science professor David Colby, certain rights are now to be accorded to the accused and the accuser.

According to Colby Committee's recommendations, the accuser and the accused are to receive a written statement of the charges, a copy of the rules and procedures of the Discipline Committee, and notice of the time and place of the meeting before the disciplinary hearing.

Written rules

The Colby Committee also recommended that the Discipline Committee develop "written rules and procedures that are consistent with the Laws of the College, the Student Handbook, and the appropriate public laws and court cases. Any student or faculty member may obtain a copy of these from the Dean of the College." No such rules exist now.

Both parties may summon witnesses and present evidence and question all witnesses and challenge all evidence. Each may also choose an adviser from the student body, faculty or staff, who may sit in on meetings and give advice, but may not address the Committee.

Either the accuser or the accused may challenge members of the Committee "for cause," which includes "close friendship, conflict of interest, or a history of animosity. Mere acquaintance is not sufficient cause." The Chairman rules on challenge.

Prior to the formal presentation of the case and in the absence of the accused and the accuser, the Chairman will state the charge and the names of the two involved and request that any Committee member who is partial in a given case to disqualify himself.

A reconsideration of the Committee's decision may be requested by the accused "on the basis of substantial new evidence." The Dean of the College may also request reconsideration.

A majority of the Committee members must agree to reconsider the case. The Dean and the accused would be allowed one reconsideration each.

Legal proceedings

The Colby Committee also determined what should be done in case of legal proceedings against a student. Should a student be charged by the public authorities, and should the Dean of the College consider discipline proceedings appropriate, the College begins the proceedings. The accused student may request the Dean to suspend such proceedings until the conclusion of the court case.

If the Dean decides that the student is a threat to others, he may suspend the student without prejudice to his record until the end of the court case. The student may appeal his suspension to the President of the College.

Besides the brief statement issued by the Chair of the Discipline Committee, the Review Committee recommended that the Dean be allowed to issue a more extensive statement about the case if it is warranted. The accused, the accuser and witnesses may not be named in such a statement.

Committee reorders

Additionally, the Review Committee amended and reordered parts of the Student Handbook under the heading "Student Conduct." That particular section will now be divided into "Individual Rights" and "General Rules of Conduct" sections.

Colby characterized the changes in the "Student Conduct" section as a "reordering" of the old sections in order to emphasize and clarify the College's position.

Several members of the Review Committee expressed satisfaction with the results of their work.

"It doesn't look dramatic,"

Transfers' fate dictated soon

by Brett McDonnell and Laura Seligsohn

House transfer policies dominated debate at both the College Council and Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) meetings last week as Housing Committee co-chairman Kathleen Merrigan revealed her year-end report on Housing Committee actions.

Her report called for "a reaffirmation of the residential house system in the spirit in which it was first created." The current housing system, she noted, "was originally conceived as a place of intellectual and cultural exchange whose educational value would complement, if not rival, the classroom experience."

"Should we reaffirm that vision," Merrigan asked the Council, "Or should we accept what is basically a dormitory—a place to sleep?"

Two-thirds of the Housing Committee now favors a tighter transfer policy, claimed Merrigan, but they are divided between two proposals. One would have all transfers considered individually by the appropriate Dean and granted only for valid grievances. The other option would institute a quota system whereby each house would contain between 35 and 45 percent sophomores, no more than 35 percent juniors and seniors and no more than 10 percent transfers.

Merrigan outlined two arguments against the current liberal transfer system. "The transfer system has allowed the clustering of friendship groups within the house . . . houses are known among students as being dominated by certain types of people," her report pointed out. Class imbalances also detract from diversity, Merrigan added.

Her second argument centers on a perceived lack of student commitment to houses. "If a house fails to meet a student's expectations," said Merrigan, "rather than working to change things to meet his or her satisfaction, the student simply moves out."

Supporters of the status quo counter that restricting transfers would infringe on student freedom and force some students to spend three years in physically inferior houses. They also point to the need to accommodate changing patterns of friendship.

College Council Vice President Jay Ward '84, noted that last year's Gifford Report on undergraduate life "came out strongly in support of the present (transfer) system."

Merrigan responded, "We may be striving for a dream that isn't realistic. Maybe we're at the tail end of a hope."

She added that the Housing Committee expects to present a recommendation containing both majority and minority views within a week, and CUL chairman Cris Roosenraad anticipates his committee will vote on a specific proposal within its next three meetings.

College Council representative Paul Sabbah '83 suggested that Council members "go back to the constituency and come back next week with a campus consensus." Until more student input is digested, he concluded, "We can't decide for the whole College community, and neither can the Housing Committee, and neither can the CUL."

Merrigan assured the Council that she and the rest of the Housing Committee realize that "It would be unfair to suddenly and drastically change the system" and therefore promise that any new policy will be implemented over the course of three or four years.

Merrigan also discussed changing the organization of the Housing Committee. Currently the group is composed of five College Council Housing Category representatives, all house presidents and freshman, co-op and off-campus

Final showdown: Winter Study lives or dies

Tomorrow's faculty meeting to decide the future of Winter Study appears to be a close decision. Faculty and students close to the issue are cautiously predicting that the Winter Study Review Committee's plan A will receive the 60 percent voting majority necessary for faculty approval.

"My guess is we are going either to get a vote in the middle-50s (percent) or we will just get over the 60 percent line," said Larry Graver, co-chairman of the Winter Study Review Committee.

Freddy Nathan, coordinator of the College Council lobbying effort, was slightly more hopeful about tomorrow's vote.

"The momentum is in our favor," he asserted. "A lot of people realize that plan B won't pass—that it will be the status quo or plan A—so they might as well vote for A." Graver concurred with Nathan's assessment, saying that it is "very, very unlikely that plan B will pass."

College President John Chandler believes that the success of the plan A vote might hinge on faculty attendance at the Wednesday meeting.

"If I were to do anything now, it would be to get out the vote, whether for or against," said Chandler.

Nathan was not so neutral on the topic of voting. "Frankly, I hope the people who aren't in support of plan A just stay in their offices," he quipped.

If the faculty cannot muster a 60 percent majority for any of the proposals, both Chandler and Graver still anticipate some changes for Winter Study.

"I would expect some efforts to improve coordination," said Chandler. Measures that he believes would strengthen Winter Study include giving greater control to the Winter Study Committee and a better organization of concerts, lectures, and other events to work them into the Winter Study program.

Graver stated that the Review Committee would present a series of "single suggestions" if no plan is approved. The suggestions, incorporated in plan A of the Review Committee report, include reforms of grading, administration, and calendar as well as a proposal for 16 week "continued courses".

A-O.K.

The Freshman Council voted overwhelming support for Proposal A's freshman seminars last night, giving the faculty one more good reason to pass the Review Committee's plan for a reinvigorated Winter Study: freshmen like the idea. There is a lot to like about the proposal from the view of both freshman and faculty member.

Freshmen will get to take courses most students consider very worthwhile. The most frequent complaint we've heard about the seminars is from upperclassmen: "why can't I take one next year?"

The interdisciplinary approach exposes freshmen to several professors and departments—perhaps interesting them in new fields and leading them to a choice of a major.

In return, freshmen give up for one year the dubious "freedom" of being placed in low choices, to be lost in a lecture hall or unwanted course. Strong, well-liked courses in the formative first year will promote a stronger commitment to later Winter Study courses: students who have had a good WSP experience usually have searched for challenging courses in following years. Thus every student and faculty member will benefit from a more serious attitude about the program.

Faculty will benefit in other ways. The syllabus for each seminar can remain fairly constant over time, eliminating much of the burden of preparing a new course each year.

Additionally, the seminars offer a great opportunity to work with other faculty members in a common challenge and learning process—a fine way for professors to pull Winter Study out of its apparent rut.

Random Error

Freshman inclusion is a successful way to give students some choice in housing, and to satisfy the majority of each class. Statistics prove its success.

This year over 90 percent of the freshmen received their first or second choices. Over 91 percent of last year's group received their first two choices. Over 86 percent of the class of '83 were similarly successful.

In the face of these figures, it would be folly to make inclusion a process of random assignment. Yet this is the proposal that Kathleen Merrigan, '82 presented to the Housing Committee and the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

The stated reason for a move to random assignment is to reduce the stigma of living in unpopular houses. This dubious view misses the root of a stigma problem.

Most students choose their housing because of its physical features. Dodd has private bathrooms. Greylock has large windows. Row Houses have comfortable living rooms. These are inescapable facts. Randomness will not make students any more satisfied with inferior buildings.

The current freshman inclusion satisfies a vast majority of students. It should not be thrown out, especially not to address problems that are rooted in buildings and grounds.

Irresponsible

To the editor:

The Record's editorial advice that we should have complete information before making a decision is a good one; perhaps even good enough for the Record to follow. It was extremely irresponsible of the editorial board to make an editorial stand before they had consulted all the parties involved in the proposal that the OCC adopt a policy which denies its facilities to organizations which do not adhere to the College's policy on individual rights. The issue is a complex one and had the editorial board acted responsibly they would have been aware of the legal distinction between freedom of thought and freedom of action; that perhaps the right to be free from discrimination is more compelling than the right to gain information which is readily available throughout our culture; and finally, one does more at an interview than "hear" a representative. The Department of Defense has consistently said that it is unable to discuss policy issues. Information is necessary before an intelligent decision can be made, but neither the Record, nor the Department of Defense, are willing or able to supply that information.

Jeffrey A. Menzer '82

Misses point

To the editor:

The Record editorial, in its anonymous wisdom, once again misses the point. The proposal, which would prohibit organizations that discriminate in hiring on the basis of race, religion, sex, or sexual preference from using Williams College facilities, has nothing to do with judging whether or not these organizations are "intrinsically bad and unworthy of Williams students." The issue is whether Williams College is sincere in its commitment to the value of freedom from discrimination that it professes.

Brutus faces uncertain future in struggle for justice

by Greg Helres

Dennis Brutus, the internationally-renowned poet, scholar, and human rights advocate is currently awaiting a State Department decision concerning his residency in this country. If deported, Brutus faces imprisonment and maltreatment at the hands of the South African government. Last November a Chicago judge ruled that he was "deportable," but Brutus has since then applied for political asylum in the United States.

Technicality

The Christian Science Monitor reports that "Brutus was born in Rhodesia, now Zimbabwe, although he was raised in South Africa. When Zimbabwe gained independence from Britain last year, all British passports were withdrawn and Rhodesian citizens, of whom Brutus was one, were told to reapply for new passports from Zimbabwe. He was caught working in the U.S. without a valid passport before he got his new passport. Thus he was unable to renew his U.S. visa and work permit on time."

The Chicago-based Dennis Brutus Defense Committee (DBDC) has coordinated a nationwide campaign to lobby the U.S. government to grant Brutus asylum and to cover the lawyer fees.

According to DBDC co-convenor Jan Crew, "If Brutus, loses the right to asylum, his life will be placed in serious danger. If deported to Zimbabwe, Professor Brutus will be in danger from the South African Secret Police who are operating in that country. If deported to South Africa, he will be immediately jailed under the terms of an exit-permit he was required to sign upon being exiled by the South African apartheid government."

Crew also said, "Professor Brutus' possible deportation does not only concern him as an individual; but concerns all of us as opponents of apartheid and racism. The Reagan-Crocker policy of codding up to the minority apartheid regime of South Africa, is the 'silent' motivation behind Dennis Brutus' possible deportation."

Brutus left South Africa in 1966 after being imprisoned there for eighteen months because of his opposition to apartheid policies. Before being sent to Robben Island, a prison off the tip of South Africa, Brutus was shot while attempting to escape from the South African police. He had eluded police who were guarding him by sprinting into a crowd of people. But, he made the "mistake" of running down a side street where he passed a magistrate's court house and was shot by a secret service agent who had emerged from the building.

"He was so close that it felt as if someone had punched me," said Brutus, who continued to run after being shot. "I was losing so much blood that I collapsed on the pavement. I did not even know that the bullet had left two holes in my body as it entered and exited. I covered my shirt with a handkerchief, but then found a pool of blood under me—I had a hole in my back," he said.

Brutus had fallen in front of the Anglo-American Corporation building in downtown Johannesburg, where someone who had seen him from a window called for an ambulance. "People came with a stretcher," said Brutus. "They saw me, and they walked away." The ambulance which arrived was one used exclusively by whites. The attendants, who would have lost their jobs had they assisted Brutus, left him—bleeding and nearly unconscious—on the pavement to wait for the arrival of a "black ambulance."

Possible NATO base

Brutus noted that there has been speculation in the South African press for over two years that Robben Island may become a NATO base in the next few years. He maintained that the creation of a NATO base on the island would be consistent with current U.S. policy toward South Africa. He said, "This is what "... the South African government thought I would die. So, they let me out..."

Chester Crocker, Al Haig and Caspar Weinberger are about: the integration of this monstrous regime of a minority race into the alliance of 'free states.'"

When he left Robben Island, Brutus was placed under house arrest before receiving his permanent exit-permit. He said, "When I was let out of prison I was so sick that the South African government thought I would die. So, they let me out of the country."

After leaving South Africa, Brutus lived in Britain until 1971. A resident of the United States for eleven years, he is a tenured professor of English at Northwestern University, where he has lobbied against the school's extensive holdings in South Africa. Currently, he is at Amherst College as a visiting professor and poet-in-residence. His poetry has been published in several books and numerous magazines.

While in the U.S., Brutus has carried on his personal struggle against South Africa and has urged American universities to divest from South Africa. He has traveled extensively in the country, calling attention to racist apartheid policies which have secured minority rule. "No other country in the world excludes people on the basis of race from the political process," said Brutus. "The minority has excluded the majority by constitution and law. Franchise is denied to eighty-three percent of the population. Seventeen percent of the population makes laws for themselves against the majority."

"The minority power cannot continue their dominance without political, diplomatic, technical, and military aid from outside sources," he said. "All that aid is being used to help the minority stay in power."

According to Brutus, the U.S. is the "crucial factor" which perpetuates the apartheid government of South Africa. "The United States is the fulcrum around which the struggle turns," he said. "The alarming growth of intimacy between the Reagan Administration and the racist regime in South Africa" has been "unparalleled in U.S. history," said Brutus. Specifically, he criticized the Administration because it has supported:

- U.S. training of the South African coast guard in this country;
- relaxation of the controls implemented during the Carter years on the sale of sophisticated computers to the South African police and military;
- meetings between South African and U.S. military officials in the Pentagon; and
- sending U.S. nuclear experts to South Africa.

He also called attention to the fact that high-level U.S. cabinet members have met with the South African foreign minister, intelligence director, and military chief.

A racist, brutal minority

Brutus warned, "This country may find itself committed to a racist, brutal minority which is going to lose..." The South African government has made it clear that it will never give up power and share power with blacks," said Brutus. "Conflict is inevitable. I am sure that the eighty-three percent will seize power. The imponderable is the role of the United States. The struggle can be prolonged by the U.S., but if the U.S. were to disengage, the regime would collapse much sooner," he said.

Brutus noted that there is increasing concern about South Africa across the nation on university campuses. Although universities are imposing more stringent guidelines concerning investment in corporations and banks that are tied to South Africa, he said, "There are more loopholes than before in those policies." He said the South African government is extremely concerned about university divestiture and noted that the issue receives extensive coverage in South African newspapers. Brutus urged Williams College students to consider that "Williams College is profiting from human suffering and that 'you are benefiting from oppression.'" He advised student activists, "It is not right to be too impatient. You have to create the atmosphere, but you also have to be sure that the time is ripe. Although consciousness and divestiture should be intertwined, the issue you concentrate on should be determined by local conditions."

Money and Morality

Brutus said students who are critical of their college's support for South Africa "should hammer through the contradiction that someone (i.e., a trustee) is neutral while at the same time he sits on the board of a corporation which invests in South Africa." According to Brutus, "When people discuss the South African situation and whether to divest or invest, they treat it in terms of money, investments and returns. They even talk about it in terms of politics. The reality of apartheid is not in the textbooks. The reality is people's lives—living under oppression." He added, "The trustees can justify their investment because it's good for Williams. I don't know where they draw the line of morality. The corporations are not interested in bringing about meaningful change in South Africa. Meaningful change does not lead to profit."

University policies which judge whether corporate activities in and bank loans to South Africa are "socially useful" obscure the issue, Brutus maintained. As an example, he cited Citicorp's recent $250 million loan to South Africa to build houses and a hospital. South Africa did not need the $250 million, Brutus felt, but instead wanted to demonstrate its strength in international credit markets. Additionally, the unnecessary loan allowed the South African military establishment to spend more money on weapons.

"There is absolutely no evidence for corporate help in South Africa," said Brutus. "The plight of the blacks has become worse during the last thirty years in which corporations have been investing in South Africa," he said. "It is the money, know-how, and technology that comes from this country that keeps apartheid afloat. When you take money out of South Africa, you reduce the suffering, pain and sorrow the black people must endure to get their freedom. You shorten the length of the struggle."

Brutus criticized the Sullivan Principles, which establish guidelines for worker conditions for signatory companies, because they "don't address the fact that blacks cannot vote." He said, "The people of South Africa want to be free. They don't just want wages to go up from fifteen cents an hour to seventeen cents an hour. The Sullivan Principles simply confuse the issue. They are no more than a fig leaf behind which the corporations hide their obscenity." The Sullivan Principles will be meaningless as long as the corporations "can pay blacks starvation wages because they are politically powerless," he added.

Aside from maintaining stock in companies which invest in South Africa, Brutus said American universities are also establishing ties with South Africa through educational exchange programs. Brutus said, "Many American professors are being invited to South Africa as visiting professors and many South Africans are coming here as visiting scholars and fellows. There are American professors who have been to South Africa and are now going around defending South Africa." While in the U.S., Brutus said he has often attempted to "expose those links."

How successful Brutus is in this and other goals, such as divestment of university holdings in South Africa, in the fight against apartheid may depend on the outcome of his current struggle to remain in the United States.

Meeting passes arms resolution

by Brooke Hand

A resolution advocating a U.S.-Soviet freeze on nuclear weapons was overwhelmingly approved last Thursday at a meeting sponsored by the Williams Disarmament Forum.

The proposal, which has been sweeping the nation as concern grows over the arms race, consisted of two parts. First, it calls for an immediate halt to the arms race; "specifically, we call upon each country to adopt an immediate mutual freeze on all further testing, production and deployment of nuclear warheads, missiles and delivery systems."

The second section calls upon the administration and the Congress to transfer the funds saved to civilian use.

About 150 students and a scattering of townspeople attended the meeting.

Under College rules, 100 students are needed for a quorum in town meetings. Presided over by professor of economics Gerald Epstein, the meeting opened with five-minute presentations by Eban Goodstein '82, president of the Disarmament Forum, and David Moro '82, president of the Williams Republican Club, speaking for and against the resolution, respectively.

Goodstein emphasized that the US and USSR have the capability to destroy each other several times over. Simply limiting the arms race would not remove the desire to achieve first strike capability or the danger that one side might push the button at the slightest provocation, he claimed. Technical objections are not insurmountable, he stated, adding that there is definite Soviet interest in the proposal.

Moro advocated strengthening of conventional NATO forces and of overall arms control rather than a freeze. He claimed that the resolution ignored the USSR's advantage in Eastern Europe since the end of World War II. The Russians are capable of crossing the Rhine into Western Europe within 48 hours and presenting the US president with a fait accompli, Moro claimed.

Think—tanks

Professor Robert Stiglitz of the political science department spoke in favor of the freeze. "I would urge all of us . . . to move beyond emotionalism and simplistic arguments and to construct a viable, rational, sophisticated and broadly-based national political movement that will move the issue of nuclear weapons out of the Pentagon and into the think-tanks."

He also urged for the use of politics as an instrument to effect change.

"I urge that we politicize the issue to the hilt to make it central to the 1984 presidential contest, because the nuclear disarmament issue can do to Ronald Reagan in 1984 what Vietnam did to Lyndon Johnson in 1968."

Ten people voted against the resolution; several expressed anger that so few people got the chance to propose amendments or to argue the con side of the issue, and claimed that the Disarmament Forum seemed to be intent on pushing for a quick vote on the proposal.

Under College Council guidelines, however, only 10 of these members can vote. Decisions may be made by consensus of all members or by a majority of the voting members. "The Housing Committee has refused to follow the official voting procedures . . . for at least the past two years," preferring to make decisions only by consensus, explained Merrigan.

Her report suggested that all committee members be allowed to vote and that the CUL assume jurisdiction over the committee. The College Council currently oversees and holds veto power over the Housing Committee.

Housing Committee chairmen would be given ex-officio seats on the CUL under Merrigan's proposals.

In a final note, Merrigan offered her own view of the freshman inclusion process, which she links to any transfer reduction program. "Assuming a healthy residential house system, in which physical considerations are of lesser importance than at present, what sense is there in having freshmen prioritize housing categories? I would argue that the system would best be served if all freshmen, in groups of up to four friends, applied to a random inclusion process," she argues.

Although these are her own conclusions, she reiterated, she believes "this issue merits consideration as soon as possible."

Roosenraad blasts frats

"The ban against fraternities is one of the key rules of the College," asserted a visibly shocked and angered Dean Cris Roosenraad at last week's Committee on Undergraduate Life meeting.

Roosenraad's reaction was sparked by reports of secret fraternity activities on campus by student members of the CUL. The students said rumors of such organizations are very common, and they know students who had been asked to join. The frats are financially supported by alumni, they continued, and students believe that the administration knows about these groups and does nothing about them.

Roosenraad said he knew nothing about secret fraternities, adding "I think it is the responsibility of everyone in the community to see that the rule is enforced."

CC holds on OCC policy

The College Council reviewed a plan to restrict Office of Career Counseling (OCC) facilities to groups with policies that violate the College's student rights guarantees.

Russell Platt '82 warned that at a Trustees' meeting with the Campus Life Committee the weekend of April 17, the idea of restricting the OCC facilities met with "stiff resistance." Platt stated "the issue is whether we can allow an organization which violates the rights guaranteed by the Student Handbook to use College facilities."

Platt explained President Chandler's policy, "Any group is allowed to recruit on campus—they're encouraged. Their (the Administration's) feeling is that the rights the College should ensure are those of free speech."

Representative Paul Sabbah '83 commented, "I can see letting them defend their policies on campus (but) there's a valid point that we shouldn't let them come and actively recruit on campus," which involves giving them space, time, and publicity in the Lephlet. The Council agreed to decide its stand at next week's meeting, at which time it will have the input of President Chandler's address to the CUL.

Finally, the Council, beginning the meeting with $3,320.86 in the treasury, made two appropriations. It allotted $275.00 for travel and umpires for the Baseball Club, whose 17 members are shouldering a lot of expenses on their own. Next, the Council appropriated $1000 for security and three bands for next weekend's all-college outdoor party to be held for the 3rd consecutive year at Poker Flats. Noting that a great number of people will come, at least for a short time, Representative Dave Aitshuler '84 called the appropriation "one of the cheapest per person investments of the year."

Williams garners fellowships

Senior standouts have begun to rack up fellowship points as the graduation season gets underway.

Julie Nessen, Jeffrey Perry, Lawrence Sheinfeld and Kenneth Talley received Hubbard Hutchinson Fellowships, which provide assistance for two years of creative work in the arts.

Nessen is currently writing a script and lyrics for a musical based on William Saroyan's novel "The Human Comedy." Her theater senior honors project involved directing and staging Jean Anouilh's "Antigone." She intends to enter the graduate program in directing at New York University.

Perry plans to work toward a master's degree in music composition. For his senior thesis, Perry will write a piece for soloists, a small chorus and a small orchestra based on a one-act play, "Calvary," written by the great Irish poet William Butler Yeats.

Sheinfeld, an English major, will combine interests in fiction writing and photography by attending a graduate school with a filmmaking curriculum. His senior thesis is a study of madness in the works of twentieth century writers.

Talley, a philosophy major, will audition to study with various dance groups. At Williams, he has taught beginning dance, and has choreographed six pieces over the last three years. He has spent his summers dancing with the Cleveland Modern Dance Association and the Footpath Dance Company of Cleveland.

In addition, John W. Thoman, Jr. received an award given to an outstanding senior chemistry student or chemical engineering student by the Connecticut Valley Section of the American Chemical Society.

Parents overrun campus

Along with clear skies and sunshine, parents, some from as far away as California, appeared in Williamstown last weekend for the College's annual Parents' Day Program.

Descending upon the Williams Inn, the 1896 House, the River House and Papa Charlie's, all of whom reported "packed" crowds, the group of parents, following a welcome from Rhea Jackson, chairman of the Parents' Council, and President Chandler, were invited to participate in a multitude of events.

If they weren't interested in an exhibition in Hopkins Forest of the maple sugaring operation, an Open House at Chapin Library for the viewing of rare books, a tour of the Clark Art Institute, or the varsity baseball, tennis or lacrosse matches, there were concerts performed on campus by the Berkshire Symphony, Victor Hill on harpsichord, the Williams Jazz Ensemble, the Springstreeters, the Brass Ensemble and the Williams Octet.

Steve Epstein '83, Kathleen Merrigan '82, and Doug Nelson '82 finished in a three-way tie in the Adelphi Speaking Union contest last Saturday morning.

Smoking to pay for schools

Financial aid funds may increase if a Massachusetts four-cent cigarette tax is approved by the State legislature in the next few months.

President John Chandler, chairman of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts (AICUM), said the "tax revenue will be used to enlarge considerably the state scholarship fund."

The Massachusetts Scholarship Program currently awards $300 per year to students enrolled in state institutions and $900 to private institution scholars. The program distributes $16.3 million dollars a year, but must turn away 72,000 out of 100,000 applicants even though 98 percent of them demonstrate clear need.

A recent study by the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education and the Massachusetts Higher Education Assistance Corporation calls for an increase of ten million dollars a year to reach a minimum of $65 million in scholarships by 1986-87. The report also suggests that the state base the amount of the grant on a percentage of a student's demonstrated need up to a maximum dollar award in order to recognize the widely varying tuition costs of institutions.

For instance, a student at a state college needing $1,600 would receive a state grant of $320, or 20 percent of his need. A student at a private university with $8,000 in need would be awarded a maximum of $1,500. Remaining need would be met by federal funds, individual institutions, and student self-help in the form of a loan or job.

This plan, notes the report, has "real and apparent equity. It builds into state policy elements of both access and choice, while imposing larger dollar burdens on those who desire high-cost programs and/or institutions."

The report also recommends a state-funded work-study and job development program "to allow students to earn a greater part of their expenses while gaining work experience." A ten million dollar state allocation would be matched by funds from educational institutions and other organizations, predicted the report.

Noting the decline in the college-age population, projected at almost 30 percent by 1990, the report encourages more support for older, part-time, and independent students, especially those preparing for high-demand jobs.

Chandler said that the cigarette tax earnings will provide enough income to meet these goals. He testified before the legislature's Joint Taxation Committee last week and reported that "the leadership in the Senate and House is very much behind this... the big political unknown is the attitude of the governor."

Chandler attributed this support to "the increasing realization that higher education is very important to Massachusetts."

He added, however, that the state so far has "a very poor record" in aid to colleges and universities. The report revealed that the Commonwealth provides only $2.86 per student in scholarship aid, compared to the national average of $4.18. New York appropriates $15.17 per student; Vermont, $10.16; New Jersey, $5.97; and Rhode Island, $4.81. Massachusetts students also bear a much larger loan burden in financing their educations.

Reggae rocks in Chapin tomorrow

Toots and the Maytals will bring their fast-paced brand of reggae music to Williams tomorrow night at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

For nearly two decades Toots Hibbert and his Maytals have been at the forefront of the Jamaican reggae scene and are now established as the most enduring of Jamaica's vocal trios.

Toots' career spans every development in Jamaican music, from ska through rock steady to contemporary reggae. In the mid-seventies his American and European tours were instrumental in popularizing reggae music internationally. The widespread sales of Toots' Funky Kingston and In the Dark albums attest to his popularity.

Toots' hits include "Funky Kingston," "Pressure Drop," "Monkey Man," and "Get Up, Stand Up." His most recent album, Knock Out, is heavily "rockers" influenced with songs like "Careless Ethiopians" and the lyrical "Beautiful Woman." Toots and the Maytals are a vital, danceable band, and Security may have their hands full keeping the concertgoers out of the aisles.

Tickets are available in Baxter Hall and other College dining halls during lunch and dinner. Admission for the concert is $5.00 for students and $7.00 for the general public.

This week's question:
Should upperclass house affiliation transfer be made more difficult?

"Definitely not. If they want our respect they have to let us do what we want."

Scott Brittingham '84

"Yes, it should be. Incoming sophomores are uncertain whether they'll have rooms, even if they get in a house. They should have priority."

Elaine Calkauskas '85

"Placing restrictions seems unfair, but I recognize the problem we have with so many transfers... We should have a stricter policy, but I'm glad I could move when I wanted to."

Jim Corsiglia '83

"No. You should be able to live with your friends. House unity comes from being happy."

Brad Case '85

"Regulations should be tightened to an extreme. People should suffer if they don't choose the right places."

Scott Donohue '84

"No, I don't think so... my year would have been miserable if I hadn't been able to move."

Lee Buttz '82, also a member of the Discipline Committee, commented that although at first he did not know how the present system could be changed, he found that rules of

"I didn't realize how unclear the procedure was to people not familiar with it," Buttz admitted.

Faculty Club: the secret revealed

by Jenny Bleks

It happened upon it purely by chance. My '73 Chevy had been going for miles with her needle wavering on Empty. I knew it couldn't last much longer. Suddenly I saw it looming ahead on Route 2, the familiar look of an all-American gas station: white pillars and sterile red brick. My prayers had been answered. I pulled in but saw no gas tanks. I honked. Something strange was going on. Instead of an attendant coming to greet me an old man with a bow tie ambled out of the front doors. "Fill 'er up?" I asked meekly. "The Williams Faculty House doesn't make it a practice to sell gas" he answered. This is where my troubles began.

Belly dancers and gambling
So, this was the Faculty House. I had heard it mentioned under students' breaths. The place to which faculty disappeared for hours, days, on end. The place where students were not allowed. My interest was piqued. I had to find out what went on behind those ready-to-fit bricks. I thought quickly. May I use their bathroom? I asked. He reluctantly agreed. I was on my way.

Inside, the club upheld its accepted image. Things seemed deceptively quiet and sedate. I sidled up to my friend in the bow tie who would only admit to me that the club was used for "entertainment." A little fishy, I thought. Entertainment? Belly Dancers? Gambling? Tupperware parties? People appeared reluctant to answer my queries. I dug deeper.

Swallowing goldfish

Only "faculty and town members" are allowed in the club, which operates on the academic calendar.

What does one have to do to become a "town" member? I thought. Visions of secret fraternities danced in my head. Swallowing goldfish. Streaking. Disassembling cars and reassembling them in bathrooms. Was it possible?

I scanned the walls. Notices admitted that they served lunch five days a week to faculty. So, Baxter wasn't good enough, eh?

Inside this innocent New England gas station lurks the horrifying solution to the mystery of the Faculty House. A bowling alley is just one of the hidden attractions available to lucky Faculty Club members.

I saw the plot thickening.

Some faculty meetings take place here too. I looked for hidden panels in the walls that would lead to a secret meeting room but my search was fruitless.

Supposedly they also have two guest rooms available for "visiting lecturers." I never saw them, so I can't be sure. I mean, for all we know these "rooms" could be a gigantic wet bar.

Everyone standing near me seemed to be talking in low tones about "The Extension." So, I had found the plot. But what kind of code name was this? "The Extension," someone offered, is "an Alumni Center to be added on to the main house. Construction will begin next month and be finished by September '83." "Sure," I thought. Good excuse.

People were beginning to notice me. I felt a compulsion to run. Posing as a lamp can be a little conspicuous. I turned to leave, bothered that I had not found the key to this "organization." Suddenly I saw it. Through a small door I spied a group of excited faculty members all jumping up and down. And... could it be... Yes! A bowling alley! So, the Faculty House is all a front for what they call the "Faculty Bowling League." A front for secret, illicit betting on the roll of a ball. These are professors who are shaping our lives!

A hand grabbed me and shoved me out the door. They had discovered me. Bowling balls and pins assailed me as I ran down the front path. A thesis whizzed by my ear. I reached the Chevy just in time. And I didn't even get to ask them why we don't have a bowling alley in the bottom of Baxter.

In Other Ivory Towers

RPI

Nude swimming could be in the offing at RPI if Junior Andy Morrow has his way. He has been surveying student opinion on his proposal to make "swimsuits optional" one day a week at the RPI pool, according to the Polytechnic.

Students are not particularly aroused by the proposal. Only 12 of 55 respondents said they would use the pool more under such a policy. Twenty-nine were indifferent and 14 opposed. "I found no strong opposition," said Morrow. "There seems to be enough people interested in attending such a thing."

Morrow is cautious. "Unlike other activities on campus, you have to trust more than one person in the situation, which gives it a special quality," he said. Participants would learn to stop looking at bodies as objects rather than people, he feels. Morrow noted the success of similar policies at Harvard and University of Texas pools.

A public meeting was scheduled earlier this month to garner reactions and signatures. Director of Athletics Bob Ducatte already had a reaction. He called Morrow's proposal "very, very unusual."

Wesleyan

A Wesleyan student was arrested this month after allegedly assaulting several Wesleyan security officers and a police officer. The student was one of a group of people throwing rocks at lights at 1:30 a.m. on a Sunday morning. A chase ensued, and the student was caught by security guards. During the following struggle the student cut his head on some iron bars, "leaving a pool of blood," according to the Wesleyan Argus. The officers called Middletown (Ct.) Police, who finally arrested the student after several security guards, a policeman, and the student were injured.

The student was charged with criminal mischief and three counts of assault. He was released after posting a $1000 bond provided by the Wesleyan Student Bail Bond Fund.

North Adams State

"Last drops of blood given today in CC pub," read the headline in the Beacon. The event was last month's blood drive in the North Adams pub. Student volunteers helped out. "Working at the beds is the best job, and also walking people after they have given blood is a fun job," said Al Capone (no joke), a member of Kappa Delta Phi fraternity.

Holy Cross

A Holy Cross student charged last week that a Christian service organization put him through a "painful and possibly hazardous" initiation rite last fall, said The Crusader.

Anthony Ziebart '83 was inducted into the Order of the Alhambra, an organization designed to help mentally retarded children, at a New Hampshire hotel.

"We began in the morning with some marching around the hotel and adjacent restaurant, stopping occasionally to give the Alhambra greeting," said Ziebart. "Embarrassing as (this) was, it was nothing compared to what came after."

The inductees then marched around a room equipped with several large wrestling mats, stopping at times to hear the history of the Alhambra. "After marching around a few times in my stocking feet, I felt a small electric shock," continued Ziebart. These shocks continued for over an hour, and got increasingly more painful. Eventually I was jumping to try to avoid the mats because the pain was so intense. At one point the inductees had to crawl on the electrified mats.

Ziebart considered quitting, but continued because "I was so mad I was determined to fin-

"Hay Fever"

Nothing to sneeze at

by Scott Corngold

Not a single martini is mixed during the course of the Williams theatre production of Hay Fever, yet the performance still satisfies our expectations of a Noel Coward play. The play launches us into the familiar but always welcome territory of Coward comedy-of-manners—quickly the sophisticated bantering, tasteful lusting, and polite insulting ("You're getting far too blasé and exclusive, Simon")—all presented in impeccable British upper-class style.

Hay Fever takes place in the 1920's at the country estate of the "Bohemian" Bliss family. Father David is a writer, and Mother is a "retired" actress still "onstage" every moment of the day. They have two young adult children—songwriter son Simon, and "ingenue" daughter Sorel. The play begins with each family member miffed to learn that the others have each invited a "guest" for the weekend. The initial discomfort among the guests continues throughout the play as the Bliss family performs a confusing word/playacting game among themselves with alarming enthusiasm and seriousness. The guests' misery increases as they soon find themselves transferred into the objects of the Bliss' incessant game playing. Finally, they are reduced to sneaking through the house in order to avoid having to face any of the family members.

Director Jean-Bernard Bucky says Hay Fever is "at its core, the exploration of a complex social facade through which, every now and again, we catch a glimpse of the abyss." Actually, one could say the same about almost any comedy, from Animal House to The Philadelphia Story. In asserting that there is more to this play than meets the eye, Bucky seems to be overstating the case a bit. There is an obvious nastiness in the Bliss family's playing with the guests. Indeed, playwright Edward Albee says he modeled much of the devastating game-playing in Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? after Hay Fever. Yet, still the tone

Come one! Come all! See your profs have a ball

by Dan Keating

"If you can't do anything, teach. If you can't teach, sing."

—Woody Allen (amended)

In an attempt to dispell the common notion that they can't do anything but teach, the Williams faculty let their creative juices flow into previously uncharted waters Saturday night in the first annual Faculty Club Talent Show.

Entitled "From Gong Show to Carnegie Hall," the show lived up more to the first half of the title than the second.

As the Master of Ceremony, art professor Ed Epping directed the cavalcade of stars. His ambling manner and dry wit made the audience appreciative each time an act came on stage and he exited.

The evening began with the "Board of Governors", the mustachioed waiters for the affair, singing "Another Opening, Another Show." The "governors" included Lee Dalzell, Fatma Kassamali, Donald Beaver, and Barton Slatko. The show could have very grace fully ended right there, but mathematics professor Kim Bruce took the stage.

Bumbling juggler

Bruce, who finished second only to alumnus Lou Safford in most attempted performances for the night, made a rare attempt at applied mathematics. Bruce demonstrated the variability of parabolic pathways over three dimensions (four including time) by scattering the three balls he was juggling all over the stage. He was immediately and ceremoniously gonged, the first and last of the show to be so treated.

Dean Danny O'Connor reminded us of an old solution to the sexual harassment problem with a Gilbert and Sullivan tune advocating punishment of the strictest nature.

Following that, there were few dry eyes as Danny, in a falsetto vibrato, crooned out two classic Irish ballads.

Bells cracked

Time leapt forward, but mankind showed no similar advance as rock 'n roll took the stage. "Buddy and the Bells," composed of Bob Bell, "Buddy" Karellis and Michael Bell belted out a series of melodies of dubious quality. Michael Bell may well have lost his voice at the same time as his hair. The group concluded with a foot-stomping, hand-clapping rendition of "Who wrote the Book of Love?"

Epping summed up "Buddy and the Bells" quite accurately by saying that what they did "certainly took guts." There was one stray cry of "encore," but it was quickly quelled.

Octet Alumni added their part as Safford and David Simonds turned the show back to a more classical vein. Their version of "Brush Up Your Shakespeare" was erudite, impressive and atonal. The lyrics escaped the pair periodically, but returned without great loss.

The show took an upbeat turn with the last act before intermission. Frequent Log performer Jim Bayliss, saying he would keep in the spirit of the show by singing three songs he didn't know, struck a popular note with Willie Nelson's "On the Road Again."

Bayliss's third song was self-composed. He gave an indication of what Jim Croce may have sounded like if he had played harmonica and lacked talent. His touching manner brought lumps to the throats of all present, including himself.

Bayliss was called back for the first and only encore of the evening and performed a syncopated rendering of "Take Me Home Country Roads." The song showed why John Denver is such a popular character around campus.

Serious news

Epping returned from intermission and solemnly informed the crowd that the "Williams in Falkland" program had been cancelled. He then heralded the next group, consisting of Judy Reichert singing with Michael Bell accompanying on piano, with the judgment that it had "not been long enough" since Bell had left the stage.

Reichert and Bell tastefully performed some Cole Porter favorites and added some poignant campus commentary. To Porter's "Let's Fall in Love," they added that maybe "even Deans do it." And about Winter Study, they asserted that if you only "half do it" you'll end up with perfunctory pass. They concluded with a classical remaking of some fifties-nifties.

New twist

Kim Bruce then courageously re-emerged onstage, this time with mathematics professor Jeff Parker and biology man Barton Slatko. Fortunately, they were accompanied by Parker's wife Nancy, who added a new angle to the group by being able to sing. They were given a special introduction as the "Oral Majority" by mathematics professor Bob Kozelka, who also added College commercials before and betwixt their ditties.

Kozelka's first product was Purple Cow Biscuits which "give people the courage to join committees and do work that doesn't need to be done."

Commercial break

Kozelka also advertised Roosenraad's Canine Clinic for dogs who have to hide in their rooms all day. For those bored bow-wows, he provides Rubik's Bone. And for professors, there was Larry's (Graver, chairman of the Winter Study Review Committee) Winter Study projects. Called "Head Stop," the program is listed as "rehabilitation for the overeducated." Kozelka's last comic commercial was for Reichert's House of Reconciliation, which had Dean of Faculty John Reichert providing a haven for untenured faculty to avoid vengeful department heads.

Sandwiched around the ads, the "Oral Majority" made a strong bid for Bruce's second gong of the night. Their efforts included a political satire whose refrain went something like "I'm sticking with Kemp-Roth 'till we all trickle down," a tenured version of the Beatles' "When I'm 64," and a new theme song for Winter Study which advocated that we "ditch our books to play." At the completion of the quintet's histrionics, Epping noted that there may be four extra empty seats at the next faculty meeting.

ish. I kept hoping that when I walked over the next mat I would not be shocked again." "Commander of the Holy Cross caravan" Nick Argento '83 substantiated the story and condemned the initiation. The Rev. E. K. Cheney S. J., associate supreme chaplain of the International Alhambra, commented that "the students may have misperceived the point of the initiation. As I remember, they got there late and I don't think they really understood what was going on.

"The students who find so much fault with the organization's policies really aren't wanted anyway," continued Cheney. "We keep the organization small on purpose so that only people who really care take part."

"It doesn't make any sense to think that anything foul could be going on here," Cheney concluded. "I mean, the Pope is a member and (President of Holy Cross) Friar Brooks knows all about it."

sang a popular piece from Music Man. The singing ended abruptly, but not as abruptly as the piano, as Ennis-Dwyer stranded Dwyer in a musical mixup.

Safford then gave his second performance of the night with a musical tribute to Boston and Anchorage. His magical lyrics prompted everyone's sentiments to drift to Alaska where the "air is perfumed with the smell of blubber frying."

Logical magician

Buddy Karellis, scheduled next on stage, tried to back out in a moment of uncertainty (which may well have been a moment of wisdom). The moment passed, and Karellis mounted the stage to perform his rope tricks. Displaying not only legerdemain, but legerdeped (sleight of foot), Buddy left the audience baffled and stunned.

The penultimate act was a faculty spouse mix-and-match with lookalike women singing of confused husbands. Safford accompanied on piano, of course.

The evening was brought to conclusion with Slatko and company leading a sing-a-long for the entire group. The lyrics were distributed and everyone chimed in with verses of "By the Light of the Silvery Moon," "Let Me Call You Sweetheart," "Wait 'till the Sun Shines, Nellie," and "In the Good Old Summer time." Such harmony hasn't been heard since the last faculty meeting on Winter Study. No one had the presence of mind to reach for the gong, but no one would send them to Carnegie Hall, either.

Throughout the evening, the faculty enjoyed some of the more cerebral pleasures, assuming that killing brain cells is pleasurable.

Overall, among the tremendously talented faculty, the math department seemed to reign supreme. The decision remains to be made of whether they are the most talented, the most courageous, or the most susceptible to delusions. Probably all of the above.

Gombrich details art development

Sir Ernest Hans-Joseph Gombrich, prominent art historian and author of Art and Illusion, concluded his visit here with a seminar last Wednesday entitled "The Role of Psychology and Relativism in the Humanities." In his talk Gombrich presented art history as a cyclical concept. Specifically, Gombrich discussed two ideas: primitivism in art and the evolution of art. Together, the two subjects were used to support his thesis that the history of art has been one of general development from lesser to greater realism.

Gombrich discounted the "relativist" theory of art history as irrelevant, asserting that there are no true standards by which one can speak of art as being "more" or "less" close to nature. Gombrich centered on answering the question "how much can we consider art to be a reflection of mankind's evolution?" Did primitive man produce "less realistic art"? Or, is art simply a reflection of an artist's intentions? Could a Giotto have painted a Raphael, or are artistic styles unavoidably bound to the age in which they first appear?

In answering these questions, Gombrich asserted that art is built on technical foundations, and that until those foundations are first laid, the depiction of certain images will have no relevance for the artist. That is, Gombrich differentiates between intelligence and technical skill. Giotto didn't paint like a High Renaissance painter not because he was less intelligent than a Raphael but rather because he lacked the technical foundations that Raphael was able later to draw upon.

One might ask, why there is ever a pull away from technical foundations in art and a swing back to the less realistic, as demonstrated by such movements as primitivism? Here the role of psychology, Gombrich's main field of interest in art history, comes into play.

There is a natural tendency, Gombrich claimed, for man to want to depict the world pictographically. It is a psychological desire to depart the three dimensional, more realistic world for the less concrete world of two dimensions instead.

Sir Ernest Hans-Joseph Gombrich presented a humorous and educational lecture on evolution in art to wrap up his stay at Williams.

Professional Accounting Program.

This Program is a 15-month course of study designed for graduates of Arts and Sciences and other non-accounting majors. It's a full-time graduate program divided into five quarters, preparing you for the CPA Examination and a career in public accounting. The third quarter is an internship where you are employed by a leading public accounting firm such as Arthur Andersen, Alexander Grant, Coopers & Lybrand, Peat Marwick, or Price Waterhouse. In addition to student loans and tuition scholarships, significant financial aid is provided by internship earnings, which averaged $4,500 for the three month internship last year.

You still have time to apply for the class beginning in June. No prior accounting course is required. Send for brochure, or call (617) 437-3244.

Netmen whip BC, fall to Jeffs

by Gordon Celender

Coming off a big victory over Tufts last week, the men's varsity tennis team was eager to face Boston College and archrival Amherst in competition this week. The team had to be content with a split, winning impressively (7-2) over the Eagles but suffering a disappointing (5-4) loss to the Lord Jeffs.

The Williams tennis courts were once again the site of an exciting showdown for the Little Three Championship on Saturday. Although they were forced to compete without the services of junior Marc Sopher who is undefeated so far this season, Williams was still favored to come out on top in defense of their crown.

Following the completion of the singles matches, the Ephmen found themselves trailing 4-2, with wins by sophomores Greg Zaff (#1) and Brook Larmer (#3). Confronted with the unenviable task of sweeping the doubles, the Williams netmen fell just short of a comeback victory, capturing only the first and second matches and thus losing the overall match by a score of 5-4. Zaff teamed up with senior Captain Chuck Warshaver to win at number one doubles, while Larmer was joined by freshman Craig Hammond in the win at number two doubles.

The team met the Eagles of Boston College on Wed. Due to a slight muscle pull in an earlier match against Colgate, War-shaver was unable to participate. His absence afforded the Ephmen an opportunity to display some of their impressive depth, as the team took four of the singles matches and swept the doubles to win by a 7-2 tally.

Victorious Williams players included Zaff, Larmer, Crack Graham ('82) and Don Myk-rantz ('82) at numbers 1, 3, 4, & 5 as well as Hammond (w/Larmer), Tim Rives ('85) (w/Zaff), and Jeff Harmer ('82) (w/Myk-rantz) in doubles.

Williams' record now stands at 6-2 with just three matches left. Today, the team goes against Trinity here, and this weekend they will head to New Haven to compete in the New England Championships.

Women's lax even after split week

Keeping their record even, the women's lacrosse team split two games this week. The team fell to Tufts Saturday after downing Union earlier in the week.

In their most physical contest this season, the Williams women's lacrosse team bowed to Tufts 11-8. Williams sophomore Allison Earle led the Eph offense with three goals. Junior Bea Fuller netted a pair of goals, and Eileen Conley '82, Alison Fuller '85 and Beth Connolly '82 each scored once.

Versus Union, Williams maintained a lead throughout the game despite the blustery cold winds of Cole Field. A well-balanced attack and solid defense gave the Ephs a 7-3 lead at the half, which they held to win 11-6.

With their record at 2-2, the women face Trinity tomorrow at home.

Track romps at NESCAC

In a performance which made stoic coach Dick Farley "very pleased," the Williams track team emerged as possibly the best team in this weekend's New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) track meet.

Since team scores are not compiled, no school wins the NESCAC title, but with six first place finishes and a number of other good performances, Williams was among the best schools. The other team at the top was Colby.

Lindsay Rockwood '85 led the Ephwomen with a third place in the long jump and fourth in the high jump. The women also collected a number of other fourth and fifth place finishes.

Seniors Jeff Poggi and Charlie Von Arenschiltdt each won an event and finished highly in another to pace the men. Von Arenschiltdt won the 400 meter run with sophomore Ted Leon in second. Von Arenschiltdt then went on to take third in the 200 meter dash.

Poggi won the 400 meter hurdles and almost completed a sweep of the hurdles by getting second in the 110 high hurdles.

Junior Dan Riley put in a tremendous effort to win the 10,000 meter run. The wins then continued to pile up for Williams as the 400 meter and mile relay teams posted victories.

Completing the day for the Purple were John Campbell '84 who won the pole vault and freshman Paul Toland who placed second in the high jump.

Walking hurts Ephwomen

The Williams College softball team is 1-1 after one week of play, but Coach Erv Chambliss is confident that better days are in the future.

Williams rode freshman Karen Montzka's no-hitter to an 18-1 victory over Amherst last Sunday, but fell victim to walks at Union a week ago today, 24-13.

The Ephwomen walked in 10 runs in a row in the fifth inning of the Union game, and Chambliss was upset—not at his pitchers but at the other team. "I barely consider them a softball team," said Chambliss. "In softball, you have to swing at some balls—nobody can get three strikes over on a batter. They just refused to play." Union started swinging the bat again when they had scored 10 runs, with an 18-13 lead.

Williams had better luck on Sunday with Montzka's no-hitter. She had six strikeouts, and Amherst's only run came on an error.

Offensive stars in the game for Williams were Liz Jex '83, who went five-for-five, Terry Dancewicz '82, who was three for four with a home run, and Laura Napolitano '85, who went two for four.

Chambliss is very confident about the rest of the season. "We'll win the rest of our games," he said. "We should have gone undefeated. The Union game was a fluke—I still don't consider them a tough opponent."

Laxmen win first over Bantams

Decisively ending a three game losing streak, the men's lacrosse team downed Trinity 11-6 Saturday. The win came after the Ephmen's worst loss of the year, a 28-2 drubbing at the hands of Dartmouth.

Williams combined an especially strong attack with its very aggressive defense to establish a 4-3 lead by halftime at the Trinity game. The Ephmen saw a fine performance by its man-down defense, allowing only one goal in nine such situations.

After securing its second half lead with four more goals in the third quarter, Williams gained an additional three scores in the fourth quarter to complete their final tally of 11-6.

Freshman goalie David Flynn had a spectacular day in the nets with 19 saves. Attackmen Keith Haynes '84, Ken Miller '82, and Mark Payton led the offense, with midfielders Dirk Rittenhouse, Tom Costley, and Jay Wheatley adding their own goals to advance the Purple attack.

The Ephmen received a sound 28-2 thrashing from Dartmouth Wednesday. The visiting Big Green moved quickly in front, leading 15-1 at the half and never allowed the Purple to steal their momentum.

The Big Green established an early three goal lead before surrendering one tally to Williams senior captain Ken Miller. Dartmouth came back to score two more in the first quarter and added ten in the second to forge a 15-1 halftime advantage.

The Williams squad seemed determined to stop the Big Green offensive in the third quarter, giving up only three goals and gaining one of their own as senior attackman Tad Chase scored on a breakaway shot. The Ephmen's defensive mistakes and ineffective offense, however, resulted in ten more Dartmouth goals to set the final tally at 28-2.

Ephmen hit hard, get pounded

by John Clayton

The baseball team (2-6) won one and lost three last week, but with their hitting potential, they won't be out of too many games. They split with Bowdoin Saturday, losing 5-1 then winning 7-5, lost to Colby 17-6 on Friday, and lost to Wesleyan 6-2 on Tuesday.

Williams jumped out to an early lead in the second game, scoring all seven runs in the first three innings. Then they almost threw it away, as Bowdoin scored three runs in the top of the seventh.

Mark White '84 was the offensive star of the second game, going four for four with two RBI's. John DeLorenzo '82 got the win for Williams, going six and a third innings to even his record at 1-1. Freshman Dave Moss finished up the seventh to get the save.

The Ephmen started out well when leadoff hitter Dave Nasser '83 singled and took second on an error. Co-captain Tom Howd '82 bunted and was thrown out, but when Bowdoin tried for a double play they overthrew third and Nasser scored. Bob Brownell '83 singled, and freshman Mike Coakley doubled, sending Brownell home on yet another fielding error.

The Ephmen added to that 2-1 lead (Bowdoin had scored in the first on a triple and a ground ball out) in the second with three more runs, this time with only one error to help them out. Singles by Dave Calabro '82, Brian Rutledge '85 and Nasser, a double by White, who then stole third, and a ground ball by Coakley did the work.

Williams scored another run in the third when senior John Lawler singled, stole second, took third on the overthrow at second, and scored on a bunt by Calabro.

Bowdoin scored another run in the fifth on another triple, this time by Dave Powers. They threatened with three in the seventh on a walk, three singles and two errors.

Bowdoin committed an atrocious five errors in the second game, but an even worse nine in the first game. Yes, nine errors. Their ineptitude in the field was saved only by a lack of clutch hitting by the Ephmen.

Williams only scored one run for pitcher Joe Merrill (1-1), despite four hits, six walks, and those nine errors.

Meanwhile Bowdoin got one in the third, one in the fifth, and three in the seventh. Burton Sciolla scored the first two runs, after tripling and doubling. John Reldy had a home run in the seventh, along with four other singles.

They got enough hitting to win the Colby game, but had trouble stopping the other team.

"We hit well," said Williams Coach Jim Briggs, "but they did too. They just beat us. Today we gave up too many steals and too many walks, but we hadn't done that before. Soon we'll put it all together defensively and win some games."

John Hennigan took the loss for Williams, giving up six runs on eight hits in six and one-third innings. Hennigan walked one and struck out four in his relief of starter Joe Markland. Markland had gone one and two-thirds innings, giving up the first two runs.

Colby scored the winning runs in the seventh, when they stole second, third and home on the

Proposal A passes 100-50 Honors grade dropped from plan

Winter Study gained new life yesterday in a packed Griffin Three. The faculty approved the Review Committee's Proposal A to go into effect in 1983-84, but voted the controversial "honors" grade out of the final version.

The two-to-one margin of passage, described as "very decisive" by President John Chandler, spurred hopes that faculty and students would implement the program with enthusiasm. The percentage was larger than most had predicted—excepting former College Council President Freddy Nathan '83, who was holding a sign reading "68%" long before the vote was taken. Nathan estimated each faculty member's position on the issue and made a tally early in the meeting. Chandler's calculator showed the actual figure to be 66 percent.

The debate on the floor gave few clues to the final outcome, however. The honors grade fell early after the unexpected voice-vote approval of an amendment to eliminate the extra mark. "So much student performance is indifferent, it never occurred to me that (the "honors" grade) would be defeated," remarked history professor Russel Bostert later.

Classics professor John Stambaugh, who offered the amendment, explained, "I expected someone else to do it, but when the time (for amendments) grew closer, it seemed that nothing was presented."

He argued that the "honors" grade "would do more harm than good . . . I'd rather not give year-round approval to the competitive drive of the regular semester."

Although three proposals were on the ballot, Proposal A and the two-semester calendar Proposal B dominated discussion. Review Committee co-chairman Larry FACULTY SECRETARY FRED STOCKING COUNTS WINTER STUDY BALLOTS WITH THE AID OF HOPKINS HALL STAFF.

Graver described Proposal A and its centerpiece, Freshman Seminars, as an attempt to "revitalize Winter Study." He outlined the seminars as voluntarily conceived and taught by groups of four or five faculty. The wide scope of the seminars will allow for flexibility and the incorporation of relevant issues within and outside of the community.

In response to questions from faculty members, Dean Daniel O'Connor explained that all freshmen will be required to participate in a seminar, with no exceptions. Incoming freshmen will register in June so that seminar sizes may be adjusted to meet demand, thereby guaranteeing that everyone will receive a first or second choice, he continued. In the summer of 1983, six groups of six to eight faculty members will meet to plot seminars "for two years running," elaborated O'Connor to allay faculty fears of being "dragooned" into teaching a seminar.

Graver praised the seminar concept. "Few students will ever have had this kind of shared experience. It should set the tone for Winter Study . . . To the faculty, it's an invitation to imaginative adventure."

Many faculty looked back to 1967, when Winter Study was added to the curriculum, cutting into the previous fourteen week semesters. As biology professor William Grant observed, "We're not here to vote for A, B or C, but whether to retain Winter Study or not. That's the bottom line."

Grant said he backed Winter Study at its inception but was swayed by "the fact that Winter Study has shown steady deterioration for the past seven years." "Proposal A will not work—it's not enough by one half," he predicted, urging the faculty to "cut off the life support system and let Winter Study go with grace to the peace that it so well demands."

Music professor Irwin Shainman disagreed emphatically with Grant. "The reason for Winter Study is that we didn't like the two-semester system," he insisted. "We can't go back to the past, to the good old days, because they weren't as good as we think."

After the meeting, Chandler said he "was pleased" with the plan. "The real test will be whether the seminars can be made attractive and whether the staffing can be arranged."

Grant, too, was pleased with the outcome, having expected no proposal to gain a majority vote, but maintained that "the likelihood is that Winter Study will slowly die. Considering the strength of the vote, it's up to all the faculty and all the students to make it work."

Student reaction was undeniably jubilant. "Naturally, we're elated," responded Nathan.

CUL refutes student pleas

The house transfer system will tighten in the next few years despite student opposition, the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) indicated at its meeting last Tuesday.

Although no formal vote was taken, CUL chairman Cris Roosenraad summed up committee sentiment, "I think the quota system is appealing to all of us."

"Nil support"

The CUL came down on the side of the traditional house philosophy. "The housing system is the creation of the faculty and Trustees of the College. It gives integral support to the educational goals of the College... (it) should represent the diversity that is there in the entire student body," explained Roosenraad.

Former College Council president Freddy Nathan '83, speaking for the Gargoyle Society, pointed out that, among the student body, "there is virtually nil support for any transfer restrictions," and asked the CUL, "Why are you so eager to ignore the will of the students?"

Roosenraad responded that the CUL was created "specifically to oversee the residential house system—not to seek the democratic majority vote on what is appropriate." He added, "Student opinion is not the government of this College."

Assistant theater professor Jill Nassivera observed, "Our mandate is from the College. We were told what kind of housing system this College should have."

"Restrictions appropriate"

College Council representative to the CUL Russell Platt '82 argued, "Taking this issue to the whole student body is ridiculous. I think the restrictions are very appropriate."

Nathan asserted that "students are the best judges of their own preferences and needs."

Cheryl Martin '82, also speaking for the Gargoyles, attacked the "enforced diversity" reasoning of the CUL. "If we admit diverse classes, the houses will be diverse anyway... I don't think you can be completely isolated on this campus."

The CUL will vote at a future meeting on whether to "mandate both the Dean's Office and next year's CUL that this committee expects certain general kinds of changes will occur (within the housing system) in the next three years," said Roosenraad.

Tighten up

This mandate will include a recommendation to "tighten the transfer up, but to do it in a way so as to be equitable to current students."

Housing Committee co-chairman Kathleen Merrigan '82 ponders the fate of the residential housing system at last week's CUL meeting. (Farley)

In addition, the CUL will vote on cosmetic changes recommended by the Gifford Report or the CUL Housing Subcommittee, such as year-long terms for house presidents beginning in December 1982 and placing the current Student Housing Committee under CUL control.

Increased cultural funds possible

The year-long term raised some questions among CUL members. "I worry about the number and quality of the candidates," remarked Roosenraad. Housing Committee co-chairman Kathleen Merrigan '82 added that "a lot of people were actually drafted this year" for house offices.

The faculty associate role may be expanded to include an associate selected by each incoming sophomore contingent, so that each house will have three associates. Each house will also have a four-person committee that meets with faculty associates to plan cultural events. The CUL may also look into the possibility of increasing the house cultural funds, currently set at $250 per house.

"An increase in cultural funds will make distribution a more important task and the house will be able to do more worthwhile activities," explained Platt.

Platt also recommended student social committees for each house, with the "main purpose to relieve the president of the burden of cleaning up after parties at three in the morning."

The CUL also briefly discussed the "minority" groups who feel alienated from the house government. Martin pointed out that many groups "are just plain not interested in what the majority wants." Merrigan said that disaffected minorities "can put pressure on the house government to create a balanced social calendar."

Athletes decry ban Post-season sports illegal

by Laura Selgsohn

Although Williams teams qualify for national competition rarely—on average only once every five years—even these few teams are often forced to give up their chance for competition because of a New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) restriction.

The restriction, which prohibits teams from competing after the season is over, is the result of NESCAC's academic policy designed to protect the integrity of a small college. Such schools as Amherst, Middlebury and Wesleyan also belong to the 11-college conference.

Reasons for NESCAC's post-season play rule, noted Soccer Coach Seth Johnson '79 at last week's College Council meeting, are contentions that classes would be missed, pressure would be put on players and coaches, and compromise of admissions policies would occur if the rule did not exist.

Infrequent application

Johnson contended that none of the reasons apply, especially since teams qualify so infrequently for nationals. The dissolution of the restriction, he felt, would precipitate no radical changes in athletics at Williams.

He noted that he played on an undefeated soccer team his senior year at Williams, but the team had to decline its invitation to national competition.

"The rule against post-season play stymies the effort of the athlete," Johnson lamented.

The complaint about lost class time rests on shaky foundations, Johnson said, since little time is actually missed on account of athletic commitments. He said the extent to which classes are missed is "blown up."

Lisa Pepe '83, who has played on the volleyball team for the past three years, pointed out that athletes join teams with full knowledge of the pressure involved. Furthermore, Pepe argued, students at Williams are mature and individual enough not to be pushed into playing post-season games if they prefer not to.

Special skills

Finally, Johnson said, Admissions offers special consideration to all applicants with special skills, "athletes as much as artists." Having worked with admissions regarding soccer players, Johnson said he knows that academic qualifications are far and away primary.

He cited the Ivy League schools, which "have no qualms about letting any team compete in national tournaments if it's good enough."

Johnson's challenge to the post-season policy was supported by most Council members. Representative Paul Sabbah '83 wondered "why the rule has been in effect for eleven years. I don't really see a good reason."

Council President Stuart Robinson '83 affirmed that since "Williams was one of the big pushers when NESCAC was formed, Williams has got to be one of the trendsetters."

The Council decided to send a letter to President John Chandler asking him to investigate the possibilities of post-season play.

Brackets expand catalog offerings

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

Students planning out their majors at registration time often contend with bracketed courses, which are supposed to help students plan ahead but often lead to confusion.

According to several professors, courses are bracketed because the instructor is going on sabbatical that year, because the department wants to increase the number of courses it offers, or because student demand for the course is small.

"Getting a decent replacement for a professor on sabbatical is almost impossible," said Professor James MacFadyen, chairman of the geology department. His department has only five professors, and when one goes on sabbatical none of the others has a sufficient background to enable him to teach the absentee's courses.

"In small departments it's usually not possible to replace the exact specialty of a professor on sabbatical," added Religion Professor Mark Taylor. "We could try to hire a replacement for the year, but that would be expensive and difficult."

Courses of the future

Instead, some departments, including religion, geology and political science, hold meetings with current and prospective majors before registration to give them an idea of future course offerings.

Language Requirement

The word "requirement" seems to have been tossed around fairly often this year, as Williams has adopted a more negative stance towards the freedoms and foibles of its students.

Winter Study faced a serious crisis when the Faculty decided that students were abusing the freedom January affords; it weathered the storm by taking on Freshman Seminars.

And the CEP discussed a proposal to require students to take "non-Western" courses by forming a Division IV.

One version of this proposal included a suggestion that many say will be seriously considered in the near future: a return to a foreign language requirement.

Because of problems particular to the language departments, requirements are a poor way to reach towards the important goal of strengthening the language background of Williams students.

Students recognize that languages are a valuable part of a good education, but make a reasoned decision to forego the foreign tongues in favor of courses more closely associated with their intellectual interests. One only has 32 courses here; many would feel they were losing a great deal of education while taking the six or eight language courses needed to make language study worthwhile. They should not be forced to swallow medicine they do not feel they need.

There are a great number of students who want to take languages, but do not because specific problems exist within the language departments. To attract these students, Williams must make its languages stronger and more appealing. Moving the five-day/ eight o'clock schedule to a decent hour, establishing a French House, and appointing more faculty to these departments are measures that would entice students, not corral them. The CEP should consider such measures next fall.

Clink Clunk

To the editor:

A reader has observed that the main stairway doors in Sawyer Library are noisy.

Massachusetts is a very paternalistic state. Every time something goes wrong in Boston a law is passed to prevent it happening anywhere else. Every "school house" plan must be approved in Boston.

There it was determined that the Sawyer "school house" would contain 2,400 pupils and evacuation stairs to empty the building in three minutes.

The specified doors have an "active" side and a "passive" side. The passive side has bolts which shoot into the floor and ceiling each time the door closes. Clunk, clunk. A lever drops down to prevent the active door from closing before the passive door. Clunk.

In most states the doors could be left open with electric latches which would release if either an alarm sounded or the current failed.

Massachusetts cares.

Inaccuracies

To the editor:

I would like to thank the Record staff for their many attempts at in-depth coverage of Housing Committee activities; we too believe that the issues we've raised merit community concern and discussion.

It is unfortunate, however, that we entrusted a student publication with the responsibility to foster a well-informed dialogue on issues such as the inter-house transfer system. All too often Housing Committee members have been misquoted and more importantly, misrepresented; consequently our discussions with other campus organizations have been hampered. Rather than responding critically to the very basic questions we've raised this year, the Williams Community—and quite understandably—has reacted to the inaccuracies read in this paper.

Our exam schedule seems designed to test not how well we know our material, but how well we can withstand the pressure of often having only a day or an afternoon to prepare for an exam. Finals shouldn't be a contest, yet they seem to be one here. The rules of the contest are quite simple—take your marks, get set, and pray that the scheduling gods have been kind and you don't have three exams in a two day period.

Currently we only have a three or four day reading period, followed by six or seven days of testing. The problem of an inadequately short reading period is compounded by "bunching"—having most or all of one's exams in a short period of time. If this occurs at the beginning of the testing period, the student is cruelly limited to three or four days with which to review an entire semester's worth of work.

The suggestion of a longer reading period is, however, a red flag for many faculty. Citing Harvard's two week reading period as the example, these professors claim that long reading periods only allow students to "put off today what they can do tomorrow" and play "catch-up" during reading period. This problem is easily eliminated by eliminating courses in which the final is the only grade. A regular schedule of papers and hour tests makes a student pay a high price in choosing to "blowoff" work. In addition, such an argument has a dangerous note of paternalism. If we are mature and competent enough to have been admitted here, then we can take responsibility for, and suffer the consequences of our academic actions.

The second complaint that many faculty and most students make about a two week reading period is that it forces exams, in the fall, to occur after Christmas. This makes it a dead issue.

The best solution would be to adopt the system employed at Haverford and Bryn Mawr: completely self scheduled exams. Such a plan would involve no calendar changes at all if adopted at Williams. Haverford, like Williams, allows in its schedule three days for reading and seven days for the taking of exams. The difference is that students may take their exams at anytime within the ten day period, not just during the official "exam" period. Students can thus budget their time most efficiently. The question of having adequate time in which to prepare is thus shifted away from the administration and is, instead, the responsibility of the individual student.

The plan at Haverford works as follows: professors may schedule exams, but with the exception of art history and languages where dictations may be desired, most prefer not to. Most professors prefer self scheduled exams because they feel that the students, as a result, are more prepared. Thus they may expect them to know more of the material than otherwise. Violations are the exception—Bryn Mawr averages about four a year. Students are acutely sensitive to even the most subtle of violations—even comments about a test being "difficult" or "easy" are quite rare. Exams are given in slots—two a day during reading period, three a day during the exam period proper. In total, the student at Haverford has ten to twelve days in which to take exams. At Bryn Mawr, the days average around fifteen.

At Williams such a plan would allow the academic community to take advantage of what could be its greatest resource—its underused, and currently often untrusted honor code. If we do indeed have an honor code, then self scheduled exams should pose no difficulties. If we do not, then we should strike the code from our constitution and instead, have rigorously monitored exams.

The Haverford plan eliminates the penalties currently suffered by students who diligently keep up with their course work all semester and then are faced with a difficult "bunched" exam schedule. Even the best students find that material learnt in September is stale by December and needs reviewing. Yet it is common to have only one day, or even one afternoon, to prepare for a final. And that is unreasonable. Most important, the plan avoids the problems of the current system in which grades are seldom the reflection of only how well a student knows the material.

Twenty-three things we'd like to hear at Williams—but never do . . .

"I should give you a ticket for parking in the middle of campus, but I'm sure you had a good reason, so I'll let you go."

"You and your parents work so hard to earn money, why, we just couldn't rest easy if we raised tuition next year."

Mary Kenyatta:

On Housing And The Role of Dean

(Farley)

The biographical information in Epherspersonnel is deceptively short: Bachelor of Arts, Temple University. But Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta's learning experiences extend far beyond a degree in radio/television film. She has worked at WUHY-FM, a public radio station, as the director of a weekly public affairs program. She has organized extensively; working on a voter registration project in Mississippi from 1966-68; helping to form a cooperative retail outlet for impoverished home craftsmen, 1968-69; anti-Vietnam War work, centered in Philadelphia; and four-and-a-half years with the Presbyterian Church, coordinating the Women in Leadership program, during which time she founded the Third World Record: It seems like the biggest housing issue this year was transfers, which the Gifford Committee saw as no problem. Why the new interest?

Kenyatta: The discussion came up as part of a discussion of the house governance system. People who move into a house with the notion of being there for only one year (will be less) willing to work and struggle to make the house succeed.

Moving from one house to another is really a new trend. It can be changed through education, we think: Junior Advisors talking about the House System, telling freshman to make sure their first or second choice is where they want to stay—and not advocating the short-term approach.

RECORD: Do you feel that you are the token black dean?

KENYATTA: Of course . . .

Women's Coordinating Committee. Kenyatta says of that organization, "it's the thing I'm most proud of," and it still exists today.

Within the past two years, sexual and racial discrimination and student housing, issues with which Kenyatta is deeply involved, have come to the forefront of campus discussion. For all the attention she has received in that time, rarely has she been allowed to speak her mind unencumbered by an ongoing battle. Last week Record Editor Rich Henderson spoke with Kenyatta in her office.

Record: Could you define in your terms the residential ethos of the College?

Kenyatta: Williams College does not have a simple dormitory arrangement; instead the living arrangement is designed to be an integral part of a student's education. I'm not sure how real that is now, but when the Residential House System was set up, it was—the houses were the centers for cultural activities. Today, a much greater number of lectures, concerts and other activities take place all over campus, so the house system will have to find different ways of spending its cultural funds and new ways to draw people to the houses. Houses will also need to find new ways of interacting.

Record: The CUL was charged to begin implementation of the Gifford Report this year. In what areas have you made progress?

Kenyatta: We have made a lot of progress . . . some things, like sophomore advising, have already been implemented. The CUL does wish to reaffirm the Residential House System as originally defined. I expect that it will issue a mandate to this office and the Housing office to take steps to move towards more balance of classes in each house.

Record: There is a lot of talk about how physical plant should not be considered in a housing decision. But isn't that attitude blind to the very real differences in housing quality here?

Kenyatta: I think that sometimes we forget that there are rooms in the Row Houses the size of a closet. I partially agree with Tim Caffrey that there are some things that should override the physical situation: whether people in the house try to be compatible and considerate of individual rights to privacy, whether the government is open to the wishes of small, so-called minority groups in the house.

Gorgeous Prospect House

Record: But wouldn't Williams be better off without Prospect House?

Kenyatta: I've heard people say that it would be better without Prospect or Mis-

"There are those whites who have not dealt with blacks except in the person of the gardener or maid."

sion Park. I had a student tell me he would come back as an alum, blow up the Park, and put up new housing. I told him that would be great as long as he notified Hopkins Hall first.

We also have to remember that on some campuses a Mission Park or Prospect would be gorgeous. We have really gotten spoiled, because we have such a very good housing stock.

Record: How closely do you monitor students who simply move into an empty room somewhere?

Kenyatta: We're really trying to put a stop to that. Unfortunately, the only way we find out is through the custodians.

One thing that concerns me is that every September the telephone book is outdated before the end of the first week. That caused a lot of problems last fall. We'd like students to move into their assigned room and at least to give their house a chance. We would freeze it for a month, and if they still wanted to move then they could.

Record: Do you think the first-come-first-served policy on empty rooms is fair? For instance, it seems like a lot of sophomores who showed up at Housing Office on the right day are living in senior rooms in Dodd, when seniors are stuck in the Annex.

Kenyatta: Next year we want to contact the House President to tell him that someone is moving out of the house and a room is opening up. He can tell house members about it.

Record: Can a student get a new house affiliation not through the transfer process but simply by pestering Dean Kenyatta?

Kenyatta: Well, Dean Kenyatta made a mistake and was misled once this past year. What I thought was a simple room swap ended up an affiliation swap. That will not happen again. But I do get people stopping me in the snack bar asking about such things.

Record: Now I'd like to talk about you as a Dean.

Kenyatta: Uh-oh, here come the tough questions. (Laughs)

The token black dean

Record: Do you feel that you are the token black dean? The circumstances of your hiring definitely point to it.

Kenyatta: Of course. I think that I would be blind looking around Hopkins Hall if I didn't. I think that in this situation I have no problem with that, because the other deans value me as an individual. Yes, I'm a token, but I'm also important here. I'm in a position to stay in contact with members of the black community so that when there are problems and concerns, I can be an advocate for them.

Also, for white students it is important that a black be in a position of some—some—authority. There are those whites who have not dealt with blacks except in the person of the gardener or maid. It is important for them to see blacks who are faculty, administrators, and are competent. When they leave this institution, students should have learned how to deal with diverse kinds of people in diverse positions.

Record: Do you fit in well with the other Deans? Your training and background are so different; you haven't been at Williams as long . . .

Kenyatta: My training and background are very different—I have a degree in communications. I have had a wide range of experiences, and a very strong counseling background. I bring a fresh perspective. A lot of things at Williams are done because they've always been done that way . . . I can ask why.

The Deans work very well as a team,

"I had a student tell me he would come back as an alum, blow up the Park, and put up new housing. I told him that would be great as long as he notified Hopkins Hall first."

and I think it's because we all have a lot of respect for each other—and trust. We talk openly and freely.

Record: Do you think it healthy if students see a Dean as "the one in charge of blacks and women?"

Kenyatta: I think a lot of times white males are hesitant about dealing with black women. Once a male comes in and realizes that I will be honest and up-front if he is honest and up-front, we will maintain a strong relationship. I don't bring a lot of biases into the situation. It's a matter of getting them to walk in the front door. I also think it's important to note that some black students do not want to deal with me.

No improvement since cross-burning

Record: Have any concrete changes occurred on campus to help the black situation since the cross-burning crisis?

Kenyatta: I don't think so. The cross-burning took place in spite of the administration's commitment to black students and the College's support systems for black students. Now it's just a matter of implementing that commitment and support.

Record: Do some people react to you as Mrs. Muhammad Kenyatta rather than as Mary Kenyatta?

Kenyatta: Nope. That is one great thing about being at Williams. Elsewhere my husband was very much a public figure. Though I had my own career and identity I was introduced as "this is Muhammad's wife."

Record: Where do you go from here?

Kenyatta: My husband and I came with the idea of staying until our kids graduated from high school. I have every intention of staying here for five or six years.

Bracketed courses

But those offerings, as listed in the Bulletin, are often confusing and misleading. Eighteen courses which were bracketed in last year's Bulletin and which the Bulletin specifically said would be offered in 1982-83 were in fact bracketed again. Twenty-four more courses will be bracketed in 1982-83 for the second year in a row.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said that some of these errors were due to personnel changes—for example, sabbaticals which were announced after the Bulletin went to press, or tenure and resignation decisions. Other errors were simply inadvertent, he admitted. But courses are not supposed to be bracketed two years in a row, O'Connor added, and courses bracketed for three consecutive years are usually deleted.

Frustrated majors

Another potential problem for students arises when courses which are required for the major become bracketed. This occurred in next year's religion and geology department offerings because the instructors will be on sabbatical, and in the music department because many of the students who would have taken the course will go abroad next year.

"We only have between six and 10 majors a year, and about half of them are going abroad next year," stated music professor Irwin Shainman. "By bracketing the required course we can divert more manpower to another course. The majors will be able to take the required course the following year."

The anthropology department had the largest number of bracketed courses: 44 percent of the total they offered. The political science department was close behind with 41 percent. The chemistry and classics departments were at the low end of the scale with nine and seven percent, respectively.

No anthropology major
Professor Robert Friedrichs,

chairman of the anthropology department, said the department had planned to increase the number of courses it offered, in anticipation that the Committee on Educational Policy would approve a proposal to make anthropology a major. When the proposal failed, Friedrichs said, the two anthropology professors decided that it would be useless to offer upper-level courses with no junior and senior majors to take them.

Professor Gary Jacobsohn, acting chairman of the political science department, said there was nothing mysterious or Machiavellian about the department's bracketing procedure.

"Our courses are routinely bracketed," he said. "There are only so many electives we can offer."

Jacobsohn admitted that the political science department brackets more of its courses than most departments, but added that fewer professors were free to teach the upper-level political science electives because of the department's emphasis on small class size in its required courses.

"We've tried to keep down the size of our core courses—101, 102, 203, and 206," he said. "It's a sacrifice to expend manpower on the sections, but we do it because we think it's important."

The political science department tries to help students plan their major by issuing a two-year guide to the electives, Jacobsohn added.

French house draws fire

by Sara Ferris

The French House once again claimed the spotlight at last Monday's CUL meeting, this time in connection with the housing system in general.

While the CUL had no complaints about the academic value of the French house proposal, they questioned whether it would be consistent with the residential house philosophy.

Looking back to the formation of the current housing system, chairman Cris Roosenraad predicted, "I can't imagine a proposal for a French House acceptable in those days, and I don't think it's fair to say that the housing system is in such sad shape that we'll try anything."

Clientele housing

Kevin Hirsch '82 suggested adapting the co-op system to provide for academic interests such as the French House. "Co-op housing is special interest housing in some regard," he argued, "We should try to contain (the French House) within clientele housing rather than expand clientele housing."

In a fleshed-out recommendation on Tuesday, Hirsch and Russell Platt '82 proposed that co-ops first be assigned to those with "demonstrated need" to get out of the housing system and remaining spaces be allotted randomly, as all coop spaces are done now. This, they argued, would allow for special academic interests, such as language houses, and would also provide flexibility in cases of little interest in such houses. The CUL did not seriously discuss this plan.

Slippery slope

Other members brought up the "slippery slope" problem of what constitutes a legitimate special interest. Tim Cook of the political science department, speaking in support of a French House, argued that "language houses could be the only ones exempt from special interest rejection."

The CUL also touched on the Office of Career Counseling (OCC) interview policy. The Committee tentatively considered two alternatives to the outright ban on discriminatory organizations. One, put forth by assistant philosophy professor Rosemarie Tong, would require OCC to publish a "list of all known discriminatory organizations, both explicit and implicit." In addition, an all-College panel in which representatives discuss and defend their policies would take place.

A second option would require recruiters to discuss their policies with students. OCC advises them to do so currently, but it is not mandatory.

The CUL will decide whether to take the recruitment issue before the faculty after President John Chandler addresses the committee today.

Yes, we will have a buy-back of books early in May.

All dressed up, with nowhere to go?

It's not too late to think about Northeastern's MS in Professional Accounting Program.

This Program is a 15-month course of study designed for graduates of Arts and Sciences and other non-accounting majors. It's a full-time graduate program divided into five quarters, preparing you for the CPA Examination and a career in public accounting. The third quarter is an internship where you are employed by a leading public accounting firm such as Arthur Andersen, Alexander Grant, Coopers & Lybrand, Peat Marwick, or Price Waterhouse. In addition to student loans and tuition scholarships, significant financial aid is provided by internship earnings, which averaged $4,500 for the three month internship last year.

You still have time to apply for the class beginning in June. No prior accounting course is required. Send for brochure, or call (617) 437-3244.

Fix finds fellowship

Stephen Fix, Assistant Professor of English, received a research fellowship from the American Council of Learned Societies.

Fix will use his one-year fellowship during 1982-83 to work on a project called "The Genius of Extremes: Samuel Johnson on Shakespeare and Milton," a study of Johnson's controversial criticism of these writers' moral and literary influence. This work continues interests he developed in graduate school at Cornell where he concentrated on Restoration and 18th century English literature and on literary criticism and theory.

Elise Brown '85 will measure the accumulation of radioactive isotopes in freshwater on Long Island, and Scott Smedley '85 will make an inventory of Cape Cod butterflies.

Raab wins Mass. grant

Lawrence Raab, assistant professor of English, has been awarded a $5,000 Fellowship from the Artists Foundation, Inc. The program, funded by the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities, provides unrestricted grants to Massachusetts residents in recognition of outstanding creative work, and in support of continuing work.

Raab was one of four poets selected from 565 applicants to be awarded a poetry fellowship. His work was judged by a panel of five poets who made their selections "solely on the basis of artistic excellence." In all, 48 fellowships of $5,000 each were awarded in 12 categories: poetry, fiction, playwriting, film, video, music composition, choreography, painting, printmaking/drawing, photography, sculpture and crafts.

Frosh warnings soar

Nearly 19 percent of the freshman class received freshman warnings this semester, compared to 14 percent of last year's second-semester freshmen, 11 percent of Class of '83 and 12 percent of Class of '82 second-semester freshmen. The freshmen received 106 warnings this semester.

Following recent trends, by far the highest number of warnings were generated by Division III classes, which have the lowest enrollments of the three divisions. The mathematics/computer science department led the pack, issuing 43 of the division's 73 total. The chemistry department was a distant second, issuing 14 warnings.

Most Division II departments issued no warnings. The psychology department gave out 12 of the 20, the philosophy department issued five and the political science department mailed out three.

The 13 Division I warnings were more scattered, with no more than three issued for any department. The German and Spanish departments gave no warnings at all.

CC challenges CUL mandate

The College Council and the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) locked horns over the jurisdiction of the Housing Committee at Thursday's Council meeting.

A proposal contained in co-Chairman of the Housing Committee Kathleen Merrigan's report to the CUL would place the committee under CUL control, whereas it currently answers to the Council.

CUL Chairman Cris Roosenraad asserted that the CUL was established with the "mandate" to manage the housing issue. To protests from Council members he retorted, "The College Council doesn't have a mandate to create that policy; the CUL does."

Council objection rested on the contention that since housing affects everyone, the body most representative of campus opinion—the College Council—should have a large say in the formulation of housing policy.

The Council then passed unanimously a compromise motion introduced by Geoff Mamlet '83, calling for the Council to recommend to the CUL that at least five voting members of the committee be Council members. Each housing category would thus be represented in the committee.

Knaves revelling in creative "past-times"

by Jenny Bleks

It's a beautiful Saturday and it's Spring Weekend. You've had a few beers. You're feeling pretty good. You amble by the science quad. As you come over the crest of the hill you are greeted by various and sundry people with large plumed hats and very large swords. The swords look very real. You offer them your watch and five dollars. But all they want you to do is play "Clench a Wench" with them.

What is this? The Twilight Zone? No, it's just the Medieval Club holding their May Day revels. The fair, held on the afternoon of the 1st, came equipped with everything from a maypole, archery contests, and jugglers to the crowning of the "Spring Queen" and the "Jack of the Green." This fair was put on by the Medieval Club and the Society for Creative Anachronisms. To learn more about the club and the SCA I was put in touch with one Ragnar Njaalson, also known as "Ragnar the Unwashed," or as Todd Eitner '84 to the truly ignorant.

Ragnar, in fact, is not unwashed. "It's a vicious lie," he commented, "I make it a point to take a bath once a month." I spoke with Ragnar over the phone, so I cannot verify this fact.

Warfare for credit

The Medieval Club, he explained, has about thirty members on campus. They are dedicated to studying the Middle Ages and bringing the Medieval world to the Williams campus. Saturday's fair was the first real event for the newly formed club.

The SCA is comprised of ten thousand people throughout North America and Western Europe. About seventeen Williams students are members. This elite group is also dedicated to teaching people about the Medieval world and recreating this world as it should have been ("with flush toilets," Ragnar explained.)

In this society, people take on a second, medieval, persona (hence, "Ragnar the Unwashed"). The society has also renamed all of the "known world" into new regions. Did you know that Williamstown is in the East Kingdom, Northern Principality in the Shire of Hills? Boston has become "Carolingia." They have not renamed Hoboken, New Jersey as of yet. The Society and the Medieval Club have been working on campus in subtle ways.

For instance, for all you non-jocks, next year you may take for P.E. credit "fighting practice," which involves, among other things, donning forty pounds of chain mail and wielding a six-foot sword. The physical benefits? "Well, you do sweat a lot," Ragnar asserted. A tournament took place during the revels, with hefty whacks from solid tree limbs leading to at least one injury.

Clench a wench

Another of the main attractions at Saturday's fair was a game entitled "Clench a Wench." The main objective of this pastime seemed to be to kiss a member of the opposite sex before someone else could kiss you. I asked Mr. Unwashed whether he felt the title was not slightly sexist. "Of course not," he responded, "it's just that 'knave' didn't rhyme with 'clench'."

Another highlight of the day was a "lewd, crude and rude food contest." Some of the better entries were said to be vegetable platters and "molded steak Tartare with nothing left to the imagination." This seemed to be Ragnar's personal favorite.

As Ragnar and I said our Medieval goodbyes he asked that I mention that both the Medieval Club and the SCA have undeserved rowdy reputations. I promised Ragnar that I would pass this on. I can see Ragnar's point. I mean, how rowdy can you get with forty pounds of armor on?

Williams people taken in stride

Ed's note: As charter member of the Walk-Watcher's Society of America, Mr. Dodds has the solemn responsibility of monitoring and categorizing thousands of slogs, traipses, plogs, and trudges. The RECORD was fortunate enough to receive a copy of Mr. Dodds' annual spring report to his society's members. Here is the report in its entirety.

by Richard Dodds

Fellow Walk-Watchers: Imagine my joy, when last week the bulky layers of winter clothing were supplanted by shorts and Copper-tone. With limbs being freer to move and more highly visible, walk-watching was at a premium, and I made the most of it. Grabbing a notepad, pencil, binoculars and a thesaurus, I spent the better part of two days observing the peculiarities of one of man's most basic activities. Williams is an especially rich sighting this spring. A virtual panoply of biped propulsions revealed itself to me in full force as I flitted about the Williams campus, temporarily roosting in those places most likely to provide me with the most interesting subjects.

Seductive

In the Freshman Quad, for instance, I had several sightings of the Sophomore Swagger. This common pre-courtship walk is found mostly in males of the Mission Park species. Shoulders are thrown back, pace slowed, and total concentration directed on a point one foot above the horizon. As admittedly seductive as this is, success rate is low. The females of the species have their own more successful walk, "The 50's Fold." A clutching of books to the sweater, with folded arms, an acceleration of pace, and a stare of complete indifference characterize "the Fold." The difficulty level of Frisbee throws and catches increases noticeably in the presence of a 50's Folder, underlining its attractive powers over Freshman males. Experts have proposed that "the Fold" is actually an evolutionary descendent of "The BP Sweep," but a lot warmer and more inviting.

One of the most fascinating walks I found "The Sleer." I first spotted this one in the Row Houses, but now find it mostly outside dining halls. Following a meal, those who have 10 to 20 minutes until departure time for their next class adopt a slower than slow slog, flapping about aimlessly till they see a possible distraction (usually another person). The arms hang loosely and are used only for knocking on doors and flagging down prospective prey.

In a fine example of adaptive evolution, certain species have developed a defensive avoidance behavior called "the Scoot." Imagine little propellers attached to the lower back and neck, hurtling the torso along at a steady clip, while the legs stride to keep up, and you can picture "the Scoot." Although usually effective in combating a "Sleer" attack, "The Scoot" occasionally has to be followed by a slow half- or full turn around which keep "the Scooter" facing "The Sleer" as they pass without loss of forward momentum. The reasons for this are still under dispute, but some officials expect that a primitive form of manners lies behind the action.

Pickled

Skipping over to the gymnasium, I caught a flock of athletes doing "The Jersey Bounce." So named for its Garden State origins, it is a refinement of "The Tough Townie Trudge." It consists of hands thrust deep into pockets, with a slight bounce added to a bow-legged saunter. Later in the evening, at the other end of Spring Street, The Bounce degenerates into what hockey players easily recognize as "the Pratt Fall" one of those rare walks employing all four limbs.

Another rare walk is "the Woops Waltz" indigenous to all dining halls. Two tray-carrying subjects face off, then attempt to bypass each other using a series of side-stepping false starts. Although usually collision-less in outcome, several lucky walk-watchers report having observed Waltzes that have ended in discord.

If you know anyone else who would like a chance to become a member of the Walk-Watchers Society of America and own their very own bronzed sneaker, have them contact me at SU 1136. Who knows? Perhaps one of them will be the fourth walk-watcher in history to actually see the Pickled Prof Promenade . . .

From the director's chair

This Saturday Williams senior Stephanie Voss debuts as a playwright and director with the presentation of her one-act "All the Unripe" in Jesup Auditorium. In this week's "From the Director's Chair," Voss discusses the treatment of terrorist violence in her first play, with Kip Cinnamon, for the RECORD.

Record: You go to Nietzsche for your title and the quote which prefaces the script. He says "All that is unripe wants to live." How does this tie in with your story about Martha, an imprisoned terrorist?

SV: The play is about a woman who wants to live and whose impatience and frustration with the world as it is makes her hungry for more life.

Record: In her pursuit of a better life she destroys others. She is a murderer, right?

SV: Yea, she is. In a way, it's a political play. I want people to understand her. Because of the bombing, the audience will judge her as do other characters in the play. My aim is that people judge her, but also see that she is like themselves.

Record: For those of us that are not murderers, how is Martha like ourselves?

SV: That's why the play is set after the bombing. The word violence doesn't only apply to murders, but also to how we treat each other. All the characters in the play—the guard who has sex with her, the reporter

Union College

The Union Student Forum (College Council) last month fired Paul Grossman, editor-in-chief of the Concordensis. He was fired for printing a confidential report of the Conduct Committee (Honor and Discipline) to the Dean of Students.

The report, printed verbatim in the March 4 Concordensis, analyzed a fight on campus on January 30 that led to numerous arrests by Schenectady (N.Y.) Police. It held an official of the Black and Latin Alliance of Students (BLAS) responsible for conditions at a party that led to violence. The fight erupted after several non-Union party guests urinated on a passing Psi Upsilon fraternity brother.

The report also criticized BLAS, but exonerated four students for self-defense and five arrested students for being "in the wrong place at the wrong time." Psi U was also cleared of wrongdoing.

The Forum acted in its capacity as publisher of the paper to remove Grossman by an 8 to 4 vote, with 2 abstentions, for violating the confidential-ity of Conduct Committee witnesses. The paper printed all names, although witnesses had been promised anonymity.

Students supporting Grossman's removal said the language of the report was "too frank" for publication, and that students would be less willing to testify to the Conduct Committee. "As a newsman I might have printed that report, but as a student, I wouldn't have," said one Forum member.

Grossman explained that his motivation was to make the facts "crystal clear." The suppression of the report would violate his editorial responsibility to supply the facts of the case, he said. Grossman may appeal his decision, but he will not reveal how he obtained the report.

Associate editor Rachel Mandel, Grossman's logical successor, resigned her post in protest, saying that the Forum's "censorship" made her position as editor of an independent newspaper impossible. No other members of the editorial board felt qualified to assume the editorship, so Concordensis is leaderless, although it continues to print.

who pesters her, the attorney, her mother—they all want something from Martha and aren't hesitant to destroy her to get it.

Record: Your heroine Martha is said to have killed 56 people and maimed another 112. Isn't that a lot of death and destruction?

SV: There is a paradox here. As we have become more terrified of violence so we become immune to others' suffering.

Death counts are tossed around by the media and tossed off by the public. I try to show that there are people behind these deaths. We usually think of the victims but the terrorists are human too and have reasons however little they may understand them.

Record: Like the public, is Martha simply immune to the suffering she has caused?

SV: Yes, but it does bother her. Not only the bodies, but the destruction. She wants to be a builder, but when there's so much s--- in the way, she has to destroy first. The bombing is a result of the frustration she feels towards what exists.

Record: How have you achieved this sense of terrorists' frustration?

SV: I wrote it sort of about a friend of mine. This friend and I talked a lot about violence as a tactic—whether it is possible or effective or ultimately beneficial. This friend, like Martha, had a little girl. I wondered if someone like that could set off a bomb. Then I thought of people who do kill other people. I wonder if murder is so much worse than other things we do daily.

Record: Such as?

SV: There's a couple lines in the play. The prison guard says, "How could you hurt people that you don't even know?" Martha replies, "How could I hurt the ones that I know?" Yet people hurt the ones they know all the time.

Instead of talking about the murder, you could talk about the frustrations that lead to murder. Inability to get in touch, playing roles like Mama, being poor, hungry, chronically unemployed.

Record: The play is simply staged; could it be said that there is a minimum of spectacle?

SV: From my viewpoint as a director, it's a very stageable script. I think the script offers some very engaging images. The cage which contains Martha throughout the play becomes a character in itself. There's a lot of action. It's far from a soap opera.

Caught in the act—unlike Florida's Daytona, Dodd's version doesn't allow motor transport, as Jeff Desmond '82 and John Donovan '83 discovered upon their disqualification. (Farley)

Fear:
The Record

Fear: Abrasive wit

by Duffy Graham

Fear's The Record is paradoxical. This album is unlistenable—the music is abrasive, abusive, and irritating, and one can rarely understand the words. When the lyrics are decipherable, however, Fear emerges as a witty insightful group.

Fear is one of many currently active Los Angeles punk bands. Most of these groups make the Sex Pistols seem tight and melodic in comparison. These bands complain of boredom and of life in the city, and abuse every symbol and institution in sight.

The first song on this album, "Let's Have a War", is reminiscent of the Dead Kennedys' "Holiday in Cambodia" in its pointed, wry humor. Lead singer Lee Ving shouts "There's so many of us/ Let's have a war so you can go and die/ We need the space/ Jack up the Dow Jones/ Sell the rights to the network." Other songs worth noting on the album include "New York's Alright If You Like Saxophones" and "I Love Livin' in the City", which feature the same sort of skewed humor set against angry and distorted sounds from the band. But on the whole, the music is limited, and ironically (because Fear gripes about boredom) tends to become boring very quickly.

Beyond the music, The Record is interesting as a subcultural artifact. It raises a number of questions which cities like Los Angeles and moreover our entire country should ask. The four members of Fear are not psychologically deranged. They are clever commentators about the world around them, whether we agree with their position or not. What is it about our society which could bring this group into existence, and lead these people and their culturally significant fans to speak and act as they do?

Lee Ving sings, "Let's have a war/ The enemy is within/ It's already started in the city." Obviously on the surface, our cities are not engaged in internal war, but what is the nature of the underlying rumblings and grumbings which cause a tension so strong that kids find themselves violently beating each other over the head on a dance floor every night? Fear does not have any answers, but the cultural implications of the questions they raise are indeed fearful.

Traditional Reggae

Toots builds "magical rapport"

by Paul Peppis

Last Wednesday night marked an unusual event for Williams College. Toots and the Maytals, one of the original Jamaican Reggae groups, performed in Chapin Hall.

The current growth in the popularity of Reggae, led by groups like Bob Marley and the Wailers, made the time right for a Reggae concert. Williams was very lucky in getting the Maytals, one of the greatest Reggae bands in history. "Toots" Hibbert, the leader of the Maytals, was one of the first people to identify Reggae as a music style.

In Hibbert's words: "Reggae means comin' from the people ... Like a every day thing. Like from the ghetto. From majority. Everyday thing that people use like food, we just put music to it and make a dance out of it. Reggae mean regular people who are suffering, and don't have what they want."

Reggae is the music of poor Jamaica. It is music which binds and strengthens people because of its tremendous power and emotion.

Black leather

The Maytals came on Wednesday night stage resembling a sextiles' Rhythm and Blues group, complete with musicians trained in soul and rock, female back-up vocalists, and a lead singer dressed in all black leather. This R&B look is one of the Maytals' identifying characteristics. They began playing in the early sixties when Reggae was a mixture of traditional African and Jamaican rhythms combined with American R&B. The Maytals started out with American R&B, and Toots still maintains the image.

Drop," recently recorded by the Clash. Unfortunately this number was a bit disappointing—Toots lacking enthusiasm. He seemed both tired and bored. Half way through the song, though, he stepped back from the microphone and energetically danced for a few minutes. At this point the show appeared to gather speed. With each number following, Toots' enthusiasm increased. By the time the Maytals belted out "Monkey Man" most of the audience had become completely involved with what was happening on stage. Across Chapin Hall most people were dancing. The joy and excitement Toots inspired was incredible, creating an almost magical rapport with the crowd.

Toots took the crowd "higher and higher," finishing the show with a twenty-minute encore, with the audience singing and dancing along. It was a great finish for a great show.

Stetson houses rarities

by Chris Howlett

If you're getting tired of lying in the sun and playing Frisbee all day, here's an idea: visit Chapin Library, Williams College's rare book collection.

Tucked away on the second floor of Stetson Hall, the library boasts many rare first-editions and manuscripts which are displayed in periodic exhibitions.

Currently, the library is featuring the works of James Joyce, in conjunction with Prof. Don Gifford's lecture last Sunday and the centennial of Joyce's birth this year. Taken entirely from the library's own collection, the exhibition contains "a few very choice and rare pieces," said head librarian Robert Volz.

Parts of a previous exhibit, entitled "Spreading the Amazing News: European Americana before 1543," will continue to be shown as well. It contains works published in Europe relating to the newly discovered Americas, including the first printed Spanish map of the New World and a map of Mexico City in 1521, prior to Cortes' conquest.

Chapin Library started in 1915 as the retirement project of Alfred Clark Chapin, class of 1869. He donated his collection to the college in 1922 and since then the library has steadily increased in size, largely through the gifts of alumni and friends. Often donated books are sold and the money used to purchase works the library needs more.

Extremely unusual

According to Volz, Chapin Library is an "extremely unusual" collection for a small college or even a university. Other college rare book collections are "a lot of bulk but not much quality," he said. Chapin's collection of 16th, 17th, and 18th century works is especially fine.

Unfortunately, the library does not get the kind of student use that the librarians would like. Volz feels that this is because many students are unaware of the range of the library's collection in relation to classes, paper topics, or special interests. "In more instances than you'd suspect there's something relevant here" and often unavailable in the regular college library, he added.

"We try to dispel the notion that it is a museum or a storehouse of old books. My particular wish is that everyone would feel comfortable wandering in and looking to see what's on exhibit. That would help us to make it a part of the educational process of the college."

In mid-May, two new exhibitions will be set up and shown through August. One, a selection of American botanical works, will be presented in conjunction with Alan Bornbusch's senior honors thesis on the history of botany. The other will display books bought in support of American Studies in memory of Luther Mansfield with funds given by alumni and friends.

Grads go for green

by Donna Imbesi

Whatever your ultimate career dreams may be, the chances are strong that your immediate future may be on Wall Street, if Office of Career Counseling profiles of recent graduating classes are to be believed.

The most prominent change in the last few years is a decrease in the percent of the class attending graduate school directly after Williams from 35% in 1977 to 21.2% in 1981. This change represents a postponement of graduate study, however, rather than a decline in the percent who eventually attend. The estimate that 70% of a given class will hold or be pursuing at least one advanced degree within five years of graduation, and up to 90% within ten years, remains steady, according to OCC.

What are the would-be grad students doing? Working, for the most part. The percent of the class opting for employment immediately after graduation has increased dramatically from 23.7% in 1977 to 51.5% in 1981. Of those people choosing employment, almost half are in the fields of business and finance, and one-third are in the education field.

Put these statistics together and an interesting picture begins to form. More and more Williams graduates are postponing graduate study for high-paying jobs in business and finance.

OCC coordinator Barbara-Jan Wilson points to several explanations for this trend. The first is financial. After four years and $40,000 spent at Williams, and often $5,000 in loan debts, graduates find it difficult to justify or afford graduate school immediately. An increasing number are deciding to use a first job as a time to think, earn, and test their skills in the marketplace.

Given these motives, jobs in business and finance are particularly attractive. For the class of 1981, salaries ranged from $7,000 plus room and board in education to $25,000 in business and finance. The average salary for 1981 graduates going into business is $18,344. In addition, many of the entry level business positions for which Williams graduates are hired involve training programs which provide skills and valuable experience, and some firms will even pay for graduate school. "People look at other options and get discouraged," explains Wilson.

Another explanation for the trend away from immediate graduate study towards employment is impatience to get started on a career, or at least get some practical experience, according to many seniors. The current status of the economy and the tight job market impart a sense of urgency to get going.

Social stagnation?

Regardless of the reasons, the trend towards business and finance is real, and the consequences are substantial. The attractiveness to graduates from top schools of high salaries, training, and prestige in these fields is hurting other career fields, particularly communications, arts and social welfare. A publishing company in New York City, for example, that offers a starting salary of $12,000 or a social welfare agency in Washington, D.C. that offers $8,000 to $10,000 doesn't stand a chance, especially given the high costs of living in these cities.

Sidney Weintraub, visiting professor of economics at Williams, has expressed his concern that financial necessity, impatience to embark on a career, conservatism and fear of taking risks could cause the generation of talented young people graduating from college now to stagnate at a time when society needs new ideas and creative problem-solving.

Crew sweeps Trinity race

In their final race before the Dad Vail Championships, the women's crew racked up another triple victory this past weekend, beating Marist, Ithaca, and Trinity at Lake Waramaug in Connecticut.

The novices got things rolling with an impressive win over Marist by a length, with Ithaca three lengths behind and Trinity off the mark by 35 seconds.

Next off the line were the varsity eights, with Williams overcoming a mediocre start to beat Trinity by 6.5 seconds, Marist by 38 seconds and Ithaca by 30 seconds.

This win was particularly impressive, given the fact that Trinity poses the stiffest competition, traditionally, at the Dad Vail championship regatta in Philadelphia, with the exception of Western Ontario, from Canada.

The final race of the day belonged to the Junior varsity, which beat Trinity by four seconds and Ithaca by 28. Marist did not have an entry.

Golfers win tri-match

The golf team capped off a busy week with victories over Union and A.I.C. in a Thursday afternoon home match.

For the tri-match, the Ephs sent out two squads: one to take on Union, the other to challenge A.I.C. Both squads were victorious, the A Team defeating Union with a five-score 405, and the B Team conquering A.I.C. with 415.

Greg Jacobsen, senior captain of the Ephmen, tied with Mike Hennigan and Charlie Thompson for low honors at 78. "With the second team only ten strokes behind the first," commented varsity coach Rudy Goff, "this match shows how many good players are on the team. A lot of the guys who haven't been starting definitely have the potential."

Laxwomen trimmed

In a game which decided the Little Three title, the women's varsity lacrosse team lost a tough overtime decision to the Cardinals of Wesleyan University on Saturday by the score of 8-7. The loss leaves Williams at 4-3 on the season.

Wesleyan dominated the first half of play and took a 6-4 lead into halftime. The second half saw Williams toughen up on defense and come alive on offense as the Ephwomen scored four times in the second half to send the game into overtime.

Laxmen trounced

The enthusiastic Wesleyan Cardinals thrashed the men's lacrosse team, breaking the Ephmen's two-game winning streak with a 12-6 defeat. The final outcome was never in doubt as the Cardinals steadily added to their early two goal edge.

Williams fans hoped for the impressive fourth quarter comeback seen in last year's game, but they were disappointed; the Ephmen never found the energy to challenge the Cardinal juggernaut. A series of defensive mistakes combined with sluggish play caused Williams' downfall.

Outstanding performers for the Ephmen were attackman Tom Davies '84 and goalie David Flynn '85. Davies' hat trick highlighted an otherwise feeble Williams attack. Flynn turned away ten shots on goal, a strong show in the face of several one-on-one situations.

Other scorers for Williams were midfielders Keith Haynes '84 and Tim Curran '83 and attackman Reese Hughes. Senior captain Ken Miller and senior Jay Wheatley each contributed an assist.

The defeat sets the Williams record at 2-4. This week the Ephmen go on the road to face Middlebury tomorrow and Little Three rival Amherst on Saturday.

Viewpoint:

NESCAC coddles athletes

by Ted Leon

Williams belongs to an athletic conference which calls itself NESCAC, short for the New England Small College Athletic Conference. By and large the conference is overwhelmingly a good one, although there is an issue which concerns me.

The problem with NESCAC is that in a few key areas it does not really reflect the type of competitiveness which is the nature of the classroom and the athletic field.

The problem is highlighted in the NESCAC policy on post-season competition—individuals can go but teams cannot. Whereas most people are in complete agreement with NESCAC's "values"—no recruitment, no out-of-season practice, no purely athletic scholarships—this particular policy makes no sense.

Much of the post-season crackdown started in 1961 when the Williams basketball team travelled to Evansville, Indiana and played in the small college quarterfinals of the NCAA tournament. It was that tournament which gave the first crippling blow to post-season athletics as the Faculty rallied against its recurrence, claiming excessive interference with classes.

NESCAC has tried to reduce sports elitism; programs designed solely for the pro-level competitor. They have gone too far.

Take, for example, the NESCAC track meet. For some absurd reason, team points are not officially tallied. No team wins, no team loses, everybody is happy.

The reality of the situation is this: each team separately adds up the points and everybody knows who beat who.

This anti-elitist attitude is also an element of their stance on post-season play. However, the NESCAC approach inadvertently takes the form of a boycott of the big NCAA competitions.

Isn't this the most elitist attitude of all? Besides, what better way to dissuade other schools from polarizing athletics and academics than to go to these NCAA championships whenever possible and beat them, despite the handicaps and restrictions?

Everyone is disparaging major college athletics today because of enhanced professionalism. What NESCAC is trying to do is to fight that, and with increasing bad press for NCAA big-time athletics, the small college approach looks better and better. But detaching or defaulting from the reality of NCAA athletics with our "above it all" attitude is ego gratification more than an honest reflection of lost class time.

Spikers serve for N.E.'s 2nd

Completing the most successful season in its history, the men's volleyball team placed second overall at the New England Division II playoffs held at WPI last week. The playoffs culminated a long season in which Williams captured the New England Jamboree, the Little Three Title, the Division IIB title and placed fifth at the New England Divisions I and II Open.

The semi-final round proved to be one of Williams' toughest matches of the year. Facing a strong Rhode Island team, the Ephs jumped out to a one game lead 16-14, but could not close URI out in game two, falling 14-16 in a heartbreaker.

Game three found Williams falling behind early, and playing catch-up continually, but finally falling short 15-12.

The format of the tournament was double elimination, so the Ephs were not through for the day. Williams was scheduled to go against the winner of the consolation round, so they took the court against their arch-rival Providence College.

The Ephs came out strong in game one, taking an early lead and never relinquishing it. They captured the game 15-11, and looked for a two game sweep.

Providence fought back well in game two after again falling behind. Williams had three match points at 14-11, but could not convert that final point. Providence came back with five straight to take the game 14-16, setting up an incredible third game.

Neither team could establish a lead of more than one or two points throughout game three, and the two teams approached fifteen in a 13-13 deadlock. The Ephs then fell behind 13-14, but played out match point, and reeled off three more for the game and the match 16-14.

That win took so much out of the Ephs mentally and physically, though, that they had little left to contend with URI. Williams fell 15-6, 15-12, to finish as runner-up, but the loss was made up for by the win over Providence.

One week earlier, co-captain Vicente Brandstein was selected first team All New England by a panel of coaches at the New England All-Stars tournament. He and Steve Brewster represented the Ephs in a tournament of the finest players in New England. In doing so, Brandstein was the first player ever selected All New England from Williams, and the only Division II player selected on the first team.

Track outruns Little 3

by Steven J. Serenska

On Thursday afternoon, Coach Richard Farley gave the Williams spring track team his annual "It's going to be very close, even though I spoke to the other coaches and they think we're going to win" speech. Fortunately for the Ephmen, the Amherst and Wesleyan coaches were accurate in their predictions as Williams ran away with the Little Three Track title, tallying a score of 101½, against Amherst's 57 and Wesleyan's 34½.

Williams was led by several outstanding individual performances, including senior co-captain Jeff Poggi's dual hurdle victories in the 120 yd. highs and the 440 yd. intermediates where he ran times of 16.6 and 56.6 respectively. Finishing with Poggi in the 120 hurdles was Ken James '84 who came in second with a time of 17.3.

In the 440 intermediates, Dan Creem '82 placed second in the time of 59 seconds.

Flying Ephs

Tomas Alejandro '83 also chalked up a double victory in the 100 and 220 yd. sprints. In the 100 he finished with a time of 10.4 seconds, with Micah Taylor '82 following closely behind in second with a time of 10.5 seconds. Alejandro took the 220 in 22.2 seconds and was trailed by senior co-captain Charlie Von Arentschmidt who finished in 22.3. Van Arentschmidt led Williams to an impressive near sweep of the 440 yd. dash finishing in 50.6 seconds. He was followed by John Campbell '84, Ted Leon '84, and Steve Belle-rose '82.

Williams won both the 440 yd. relay in 43.4 and the mile relay in 3:29.8.

Taylor stars

Williams received an "unexpected edge" from the field events, largely due to the jumping prowess of Micah Taylor. In the triple jump, an event in which he had never before competed, Taylor leapt to an impressive distance of 44' 5". Taylor also placed a second in the long jump with a distance of 21' 1¼".

In the pole vault, the Ephmen lofted to a 1-2 finish. John Campbell cleared the bar at 12' with fewer misses than teammate Greg Lao '84 to take the victory.

Williams also placed 1-2 in the javelin with the strength of Jeff Congdon '84 and Steve Graham '82 who threw 179' 7" and 167' 10" respectively.

In the hammer throw, senior Chris McDermott released a personal best toss of 147' 4" which was good for a second place. He was followed by Bernie Krause '84 who finished fourth with a heave of 134' 10½". John Kowalik '83 placed third in the shot with a toss of 44' 7" and was followed closely by Krause who threw 44' 2".

Paul Toland '85 cleared the bar at 6' 5" to win the high jump.

Ephwomen impressive

The women's track team rose to the occasion last Saturday, competing very well in all of the events in which they had entrants. The Ephwomen were paced by junior Sue Ressel who won the half mile in 2:27. She was followed in that race by Marie Antonaccia '82 who took fourth in 2:34.

The Ephs' impressive jumper Lindsay Rockwood '85 won the high jump, clearing a height of 4'11". She also placed third in the long jump with a leap of 14' 11½". This versatile athlete also raced to a second place finish in the 100m hurdles with a time of 19.8.

In the two mile, it was Williams 1-2 with Sue Bragdon '83 crossing the line in 11:54.2 followed by Lynne Vendinello '84 who finished 12:08.1. Bragdon also took a second in the mile with a time of 5:32.8.

Ephwomen nipped in softball thriller

In a seesaw battle, the women's softball team lost a tough 10-9 decision to Mt. Holyoke College Saturday.

Williams took a 2-0 first inning lead only to have Mt. Holyoke come right back in the top of the second to tie the game at 2-2. In the bottom of the same inning, the Ephwomen scored a pair again to go up 4-2.

In the third inning, the teams each scored three times. Mt. Holyoke came in with one run in the top of the fifth and the Ephwomen countered with two in the bottom half of the inning. Going into the top of the sixth inning, Williams had a commanding 9-6 lead.

True to form, the losing team came back to tie the score at 9-9 before the end of the sixth inning, bringing the game into the final stanza. Freshman pitcher Karen Montzka was unable to hold Mt. Holyoke scoreless in the top of the final frame and the Ephwomen produced no runs in their final at bat, so Williams went home with a disappointing loss which dropped their record to 2-6 on the season.

Williams plays tomorrow afternoon against R.P.I. at home.

Hope Bigelow, a sophomore standout on the varsity boat for Women's Crew, is being considered by Coach Buzz Congram for the U.S. National Team. The winter training—weights, circuits, cardiovascular training, ergometers—appears to be paying off for Bigelow as she has steadily improved, moving up quickly to her present position as one of only three sophs on the varsity boat. Like many prospective oarswomen, Bigelow was intimidated as a frosh by the crew workouts under women's coach George Marcus, especially since she had never rowed in high school.

She now reflects, after less than a year with the sport, "I've found it satisfying and challenging. As far as the national team goes, I'll just wait and see and do as well as possible in the varsity boat."

Eph-9 blasts for best week

by John Clayton

Offense was again the key word as the baseball team went 2-1 in Little Three action last week. The Ephmen split a doubleheader with two extra-inning games against Wesleyan Saturday, losing 6-5 and winning 9-6. They also beat Amherst Thursday 7-4.

Two towering home runs gave them the victory in the second game of their doubleheader against Wesleyan (12-2) on Saturday.

Williams went into the bottom of the seventh inning in the nightcap trailing 5-3. Amid cheers of "We haven't lost it yet", senior Dave Calabro walked, and Mark White '84 hit a moon-shot deep onto the left-field concrete.

"It was one of the farthest balls I've seen hit here," said Coach Jim Briggs.

Lawler blast

That tied the game at 5-5, and freshman Dave Moss, who had replaced Joe Merrill in the sixth, held Wesleyan in the top of the eighth. The first batter in the bottom of the eighth, senior John Lawler, blasted another homer to left. Two homeruns—one exciting victory.

Williams had also scored two runs to tie up the first game in the bottom of the seventh, sending it into extra innings. John DeLorenzo had pitched all seven innings, giving up six runs, and he continued fine pitching into the tenth.

But a tired DeLorenzo gave up a couple hits and a walk in the tenth, and Gene Cote's ground-rule double scored the winning runs.

White is now hitting .490 for the Ephmen, and leading the team in RBI's.

Thump Jeffs

The Ephmen erupted for five runs in the eighth inning to get the Amherst victory. Trailing 3-2 to an excellent Amherst team (6-4), Williams finally got to Amherst starter John Pettergill (3-2). When they hit him, they hit him hard.

John Hennigan '84 went all nine innings to get his second win against one loss. He gave up seven hits, four runs (three of them earned), and walked six.

Netmen judged in superior court

Facing the best schools in the region, the tennis team escaped from the New England tournament this weekend in the top half of the field.

The Ephmen began the tourney at a disadvantage because their captain Chuck Warshaver '82 was out with a leg injury.

The tournament was divided into three draws, with each school's one and two, three and four, five and six players competing in the A, B and C divisions. First round losers in each draw moved into the consolation round.

Williams' number one, Greg Zaff '84, lost a tough match to a player from Middlebury whom he had beaten earlier in the season. Zaff lost 6-4 in the third set. He then won his first consolation match against Trinity, but lost to Brown and was eliminated.

Number two player Marc Sopher '83 lost to Brown's number one player and then to Amherst.

Brook Larmer won his first match in the B division with a 6-1, 6-1 triumph over Wesleyan. He was eliminated 6-4, 7-5 by a Harvard player who was an eventual finalist in that division.

Senior Steve Graham was

After a strikeout, two freshmen, Mike Coakley and Phil Lusardi, started off the eighth with clutch doubles. Lusardi's ground-rule shot scored Coakley to tie the game.

But the Ephmen did not stop there. Seniors Bob Brownell and John Lawler singled. Although Brownell got caught in a rundown between third and home after a ground ball, Stu Berger '84 singled to right, making it 5-3, and shortstop Dave Nasser '83 got a double and two RBI's when rightfielder Jeff Hughes missed making a diving catch.

A tired Hennigan gave up one run in the top of the ninth, but was able to hold on for the complete game victory.

ousted from the B draw after losses to Trinity and Amherst. Senior Don Mykrantz reached the semi-finals of the consolation round but was beaten there by a Boston University player.

Kelton Burbank '83 defeated Tufts in the first round. In the second round, he ran into an eventual finalist from Harvard and was beaten 6-4, 6-0.

In doubles play, Williams' first team of Larmer and Craig Hammond '85 lost a close match to Middlebury, 7-5, 7-4. After beating Providence in the first round of the consolations, the Ephmen were topped by Boston U. 6-1, 6-4.

The second doubles team of Zaff and Tim Rives '85 had match point against the number one seed, but fell to the Harvard club 4-6, 7-6, 6-3.

The number three doubles team of Mykrantz and Sopher reached the consolation final, but lost to Boston U. 6-3, 6-4.

Harvard won the competition which included approximately twenty teams.

Earlier in the week, Williams downed Trinity 5-4 to up their record to 7-2. The racquetmen face Albany tomorrow and wrap up their season Saturday at Wesleyan.

Speakers selected Biologist to address grads

Dr. Lewis Thomas, head of the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City, will speak at the 193rd Commencement exercises on May 30 at 10 a.m. Bishop John Coburn of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts will deliver the Baccalaureate sermon at 5 p.m. on May 29.

Thomas will receive an honorary Doctor of Science degree and Bishop Coburn a Doctor of Divinity degree during the Commencement ceremonies.

Thomas has made significant contributions in the fields of medical teaching and research. He has worked, often simultaneously, as physician, biologist, educator and research administrator. He is best known to the public as the author of The Lives of a Cell: Notes of a Biology Watcher, a series of essays ranging from an examination of the biology of one-celled organisms to a discussion of the organization of human society. The Lives of a Cell won the National Book award in the Arts and Letters category in 1975 and has been widely acclaimed both for its humanistic scope and the quality of its prose.

Infectious diseases

After graduating from Princeton University, Thomas earned his medical degree from Harvard Medical School in 1937. In a career spanning more than five decades, his interests have spanned research on infectious diseases and problems of immunology and pediatrics to the position of Dean of the Yale Medical School.

He served 14 years as a consultant to the Surgeon General, U.S. Army, 14 years as a member of the Board of Health of New York City, and as a member of President Carter's Commission for a National Agenda for the '80's.

In addition to his present duties as Chancellor of the Sloan-Kettering Center, Thomas is Professor of Pathology and Medicine at Cornell Medical School, Attending Physician at Memorial Hospital, and Adjunct Professor at Rockefeller University Hospital.

Planetary Biology

He also serves on the Committee on Planetary Biology and Chemical Evolution, the National Advisory Council on Aging, the editorial boards of nine journals, and the board of trustees of many foundations and medical institutions.

Bishop Coburn has combined his duties as spiritual leader to members of the Episcopal Church with active participation in determining changes occurring within the Church. He has been a frequent deputy to the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which meets every three years, and served as President of the House of Deputies at the Convention in successive three-year terms from 1967-70.

A 1936 graduate of Princeton University, the Bishop taught English and biology in Istanbul, Turkey, before attending Union Theological Seminary. He was ordained in 1943. During the Second World War, Coburn served as a chaplain at the Naval Air Station in Hutchinson, Kan., and aboard the USS Sheridan in the Pacific theatre.

Lacrosse coach

From 1946-53 Coburn was the Rector of Grace Church in Amherst, Mass., and Chaplain of Amherst College, where he also coached the lacrosse team. Following four years as Dean of Trinity Cathedral in Newark, N.J., he was Dean of the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, Mass., from 1957-69.

His concern with the needs of the economically and educationally disadvantaged led him to spend a sabbatical year in 1968-69 teaching English to ninth graders in Harlem, under the auspices of the Street Academics run by the Urban League in New York City. After six years as Rector of St. James' Church in New York City, he was named Bishop of the Diocese of Massachusetts in 1976.

Coburn has written many books on religion and theology, including Prayer and Personal Religion; Minister: Man in the Middle; Christ's Life: Our Life; and, most recently, Feeding Fire. He is a member of the board of directors of the Corn-ing Glass Works, and on the boards of Princeton University and the Wooster School in Danbury, Conn.

Dr. Lewis Thomas, head of the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, will deliver the commencement speech this Memorial Day Weekend.

Dr. Thomas is also an accomplished author whose best seller, THE LIVES OF A CELL, is a winner of the National Book Award for arts and letters.

The official groundbreaking for the studio theatre addition to the Adams Memorial Theatre took place last Thursday afternoon. Construction work will continue through August of 1983. Attending the groundbreaking were: William Groener, AMT Technical Director; Jill Nassivera, AMT Assistant Director; Jean-Bernard Bucky, Theatre Department Chairman; William Reed, College Treasurer; Terry Rankins and Mark Hammer, representing the theatre's architects, The Cambridge Seven; Peter Welanetz, Director of the Physical Plant; and Howland Switt, a major fund raiser for the project. CUL frowns on OCC ban

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

The proposal to ban organizations which openly discriminate from recruiting at the Office of Career Counseling was voted down by the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) last Tuesday.

The ban did propose, however, that organizations which discriminate must bring speakers to campus to defend the organization's policies. The proposal was approved by President John Chandler and will go into effect immediately. Dean Cris Roosenraad said the faculty has the right to review the decision.

"Any time a restriction is put on the College community as to who they may hear and talk to, that is out of keeping with a liberal arts college," Chandler declared. He attended the CUL meeting to explain what he said was the view of the Trustees, the Parents' Council, and himself.

CUL representative Kevin Hirsch '82 asked Chandler if permitting the Defense Department to recruit in College facilities meant that the College was in fact condoning and aiding discrimination.

"I believe we live in a fallen world, we're implicated in all kinds of things," Chandler responded. "I look it in educational terms . . . If you tell them they can't come, you've ended the dialogue from within. But if you tell them that their policy is indefensible, with persistent challenge officials will take notice and their policies might change."

Chandler added that the OCC provides a service to students and thus it should be kept as open as possible.

Philosophy Professor Rose-Marie Tong described the OCC as "the place where the values of the real world and those of the Ivory Tower meet." The "real world's" law does not yet protect homosexuals against discrimination, whereas College regulations do, she said.

"I'm not sure that banning a particular group in society will effect change," she continued. "If we say the recruiters should no longer come here, we won't have to face the issue anymore."

The College has to try to turn the values of society at large towards our higher standards so that there is less tension across the boundary, she said.

CUL representative Russell Platt '82 suggested that the College could invite the military to send speakers to explain its policies without allowing them to recruit.

Dean Mary Kenyatta proposed the change in policy which would require discriminatory organizations to bring speakers to defend their policies.

"It might be too big a demand on organizations to make them be prepared to take all comers for answering questions," Chandler objected.

"I don't see it as closing the campus," Kenyatta responded. "It would be up to the Defense Department to decide how much they want to reach Williams students."

"I'm cynical that the requirement would effect change," she added, "but it seems to satisfy the need for discussion."

Committee members questioned whether and how stringently the rule would be enforced. Director of OCC Barbara-Jan Wilson said it would be her job to run the question-and-answer sessions with the recruiter, adding that the responsibility "is not one that I relish."

French House passes

The CUL last week approved a French House proposal to set aside a co-op for juniors and seniors who desire to speak French in an intensive, dormitory setting. Proponents stressed the French House's educational value and said that it would not be for the benefit of those interested solely in co-op living.

Applicants will be screened by the French department and may only live in the house for one year. Sophomores will not be allowed in because the CUL felt they should experience living in the regular residential house system first. Theatre Professor Jill Nassivera objected, pointing out that the house could better prepare sophomores for a junior year abroad.

The French House will begin operation in 1983-84.

The Williams Record

Trapped in Time

When the residential house system was first conceived in 1965, students and faculty worried about the socio-cultural life of the College. Who would sponsor the concerts, lectures, drama, and other events that enrich our campus? The college calendar was lamentably deficient in these activities. The solution called for an infusion of money coupled with direction from the house government to foster a growth in extracurricular events.

Sixteen years later, the Gifford Committee observed that our weekly calendar was burgeoning with extracurricular events. But unexpectedly, it was not because of a stronger residential system, for houses were no longer the main sponsors of these activities. The committee concluded that "... the initiative which crowds the College Register has passed to other organizations and apparently fruitfully so."

This year the Housing Committee has studied the residential housing system to discover why it was established in the first place. Some committee members say that their proposed changes will restore the residential system to what it was meant to be—a social and educational unit.

Before they act upon decade-old preconceptions, they should note the observations of the Gifford Committee and the loud objections of students. These indicate that the residential house controversy runs deeper than the various proposals to repair the house "ethos." It runs to the "ethos" itself.

The Housing Committee is sincere in its zeal to revive the residential ideals of 1965. But it must not be blind to the significant changes that our college has witnessed in a decade and a half—for example, the addition of Mission, Greylock, and Dodd to our housing stock. Perhaps a new "ethos" should be established, supporting the strengths of the housing system in its present state.

The Housing Committee wants to implement the residential housing plan as it was conceived sixteen years ago. The question is, does the student body want to?

Rebuttal

To the editor,

Elsewhere in this issue of the Record there appears a full page advertisement criticizing a research project that I have conducted for a number of years. The ad saddens me for several reasons. The major criticism is that the research has no direct applicability to the human condition. This is quite true. The research was never designed to have any direct application to human sexual problems. Rather, it was hoped that our studies would add to the ever increasing knowledge of genetic and physiological differences that underlie many important behavioral differences. We must keep in mind the distinction between basic research and applied research and the fact that applications come most easily when built on a solid structure of basic knowledge.

It was no accident that mice were chosen as experimental subjects. This species offers a degree of genetic control that was unavailable in any other when the research program began. Such control is certainly not available, and never will be, in humans. Nor could such experiments be accomplished using methods of "tissue culture and computer simulation."

A certain Michael Edison Labhard, M.D. of Ellicott City, Maryland, is quoted in the advertisement. I presume that this Dr. Labhard is one of the 200 "experts" mentioned. Unfortunately, I do not find Dr. Labhard listed in THE DICTIONARY OF SCIENTIFIC BIOGRAPHY, or in AMERICAN MEN AND WOMEN OF SCIENCE, or in any of the other standard biographical volumes available to me. This is perhaps not surprising since this particular physician seems to be entirely ignorant of the peer review system used by governmental agencies charged with the furtherance of American science. Peer review means that my grant applications, progress reports, and publications have been examined and judged by several different interdisciplinary scientific committees through the years. I am quite proud that these several committees have found my research worthy of support both in times when scientific funds were relatively plentiful and in times when they were relatively scarce.

There are many other criticisms that I could level at the ad including the fact that my grant applications have indeed included some possible applications of the research to human health problems, which fact the "Friends of Animals" chose to ignore. But just let me point out the value of this advertisement as a study in propaganda. Note the use of the emotionally loaded word "chemicals" as a substitute for "hormones" and the rather curious reference to mouse pups as "children."

I have not had an opportunity to examine the Congressional Bill that they urge you to support. But it is my belief that any legislation that places quotas on the amount of funds allocated for different types of research will certainly damage medical science.

Requirement—yes

To the editor:

We were pleased to see the Record setting the agenda by discussing the possibility of a foreign language requirement in an editorial. But we were rather less pleased at the conclusions and even less at the logic behind them.

Contrary to the editorial, a language requirement would not overload students' constructed schedules. It is beyond us how the writers concluded that "... six or eight language courses (are) needed to make language study worthwhile." Colleges with a language requirement generally demand no more than the equivalent of three or four college semesters, some or all of which may be met by previous courses at high school. For Williams students, then, the additional workload would be far less dramatic than the editors seem to believe.

Although we find the suggestion appealing that Williams should strengthen its language programs first, it is impractical for the College to commit scarce resources without a promise of enrollments. A language requirement is not, of course, merely a way to assure such enrollments. It fulfills key educational objectives by guaranteeing at least a modicum of proficiency at reading, writing, speaking and thinking in ways different from those we've grown up with and become accustomed to.

We agree with the editorial that the goal of "strengthening the language background of Williams students" is essential. Whether one sees languages as expanding one's horizons beyond narrow, ethnocentric modes of understanding or as providing an invaluable skill for later life, they are crucial for a complete education. However, we differ from the editorial by concluding that a language requirement is the best way for the college to recognize their importance.

Houses: A framework for friends

by Jeffrey H. Bralnard

The chieftains of the Housing Committee are angry and probably confused. They think everyone is being mean to them. They want to cut down on transfers, which they say suck the lifeblood out of the residential house system, which in turn, they say, is an integral part of the Residential Ethos. Why should the student oppose the upholding of our glorious Ethos?

Perhaps it is because few students understand what this ethos is. But as I understand it, transfers have little to do with the success of residential houses and in turn, the success of the houses has little to do with the Williams ethos.

The Gifford Report describes our "ethos" as an atmosphere "congenial to the academic goals of the College, making the 'solitary life of the scholar' more companionable." The Housing Committee's report more ambitiously states the housing system as "a place of intellectual and cultural exchange whose educational value would complement, if not rival, the classroom experience."

If this is our "ethos," an outside observer would have to consider us as pretty stiff. We are not monks; we need leisure time. Heavens that I am occasionally like to drink beer.

So it must be admitted that the residential house is first and foremost a social unit. Intellectual exchange will occur to the extent that people want to share their interests and achievements with others. And that sharing goes on between friends.

The Gifford report correctly recognized the importance of small groups of friends as the basic social units at Williams. The Housing Committee report recognizes this but goes on to say that "although these questions haunt us and should be addressed in future campus discussions, the Housing Committee is nevertheless calling for a reaffirmation of the residential house system in the spirit in which it was first created."

But the question of friends will indeed

haunt us if we focus only narrowly on the house and consider it an end in itself. The house is only one context in which interaction can occur. But the Housing Committee believes that it should be the main context.

What context I interact in is my own choice, not the Housing Committee's. My interest in activities outside the house is not an indictment of the houses' failure but a statement of my own individuality. I see no innate worth in a totally self-contained, closely-knit house, and actually find the concept nauseating.

The success of the house depends on the extent to which friends or groups of friends get along and enjoy doing things together—and if there is such a thing as a residential ethos, it resides in this interaction. Houses which are mostly unified but have a small group of non-participants cannot be forced to cohere by limiting transfers out. Instead, why not jettison the flotsam and get some new blood into the house?

And even though a house might be close, there is the inevitable desire of some to transfer to a "better" house. The Housing Committee wants to downplay the physical differences and try to make each house so socially strong that no one would ever think of transferring. But those differences in physical plant do exist and they are important to people.

When the residential house system began in 1965 the quality of the housing was about the same. But with the construction in the '70s of Mission and Prospect, houses which many consider undesirable, the requests for transfers inevitably went up. The increase in transfers accompanied a decrease in requirements to transfer, and this trend probably indicated more a natural desire to live in different kinds of dorms than a dissatisfaction with house government.

But house government is not sacrosanct and does not require the same people to run it every year. A successful house government does require that people be happy where and with whom they

by Marla Pramaglore

My purpose in writing this article is to inform the Williams College Community of my resignation from the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) and of my reasons for doing so.

I was asked to join the committee last spring, to fill the position vacated by Anita Brooks, who had resigned. At the time, I did not question the assumptions of the College or the ACSR with respect to investment in and loans to South Africa, so I did not pursue the reasoning behind Anita's resignation. I felt honored to have been chosen to serve on the committee, and I looked forward to learning about complex and controversial issues which are important to me as an individual and to the College community.

Over the course of my tenure on the committee, however, it became evident that the ACSR is not empowered to make decisions regarding the College's investment policy. The basic assumptions held by the Trustees and the ACSR are twofold: 1) Investment by U.S. corporations operating in South Africa can serve to increase the welfare of the oppressed black majority (through better standards of living, rights to unionize, etc.); and 2) Loans made directly to the government of South Africa may also benefit the black population (a Citibank loan to build a hospital for blacks, for example). It is within this framework that Williams College makes its investment decisions. And it is within this framework that the ACSR must operate.

Dennis Brutus, the South African poet who is seeking political asylum in the U.S., most effectively refuted these arguments. To the South African government, he states, every dollar of investment is a vote of confidence for their system.

Earlier this spring, Lola Bogoyo resigned from the ACSR. Her resignation, coupled with the uneasiness I experienced at a joint ACSR-Trustee Finance Committee meeting led me to re-evaluate my perception of my role on the ACSR, and the ACSR's role at the college. I no longer accept the assumptions listed above; I have been convinced of the arguments which contradict them. I no longer believe that the ACSR can make decisions in the interests of "shareholder responsibility"—I feel the committee is constrained in its decision-making by the obvious bias of the Trustees.

My resignation in no way reflects on the members of the ACSR. I am indebted to the persons on the committee; I have learned a great deal through my experience with them. I understand they are good-intentioned people convinced of the appropriateness of their approach. But I can no longer believe in such an approach.

The system of apartheid, or institutionalized racism, is abhorrent to us all. In order to combat apartheid, it is necessary to take action; to divest. By assuming that U.S. corporations in South Africa are bettering the plight of blacks there, we are ignoring the fact that we are supporting apartheid. The impact colleges and universities in the U.S. can have on South Africa is enormous; we simply need to become educated about the situation there and let our feelings be known.

College accepts 45 more

by Laura Seligsohn

Fewer applicants than expected plan to join the Class of 1986, forcing the Admissions Office to turn to a substantial number of waiting-list students, according to Director of Admissions Phil Smith.

After 926 of approximately 4430 applications were accepted, 450 to 460 students decided to attend, according to Smith. Aiming for a class of 497, Admissions has already contacted forty-five students from the waiting list.

Because of the high acceptance rate of the nearly 24% of the students it admitted to the Class of 1985, the College took no one from the waiting list last year. Smith said, "I'm always distressed when we're not able to take anybody from the waiting list." He noted that failure to tap the waiting list at all "presumes infallibility" on the part of Admissions.

Asked if the suddenly higher reference to the waiting list marks some miscalculation on the part of Admissions, Smith conceded, "I probably would have added a few (to the original group of acceptees)." He insisted, however, that the relatively large number to be taken from the waiting list is not a bad sign, noting, "In the normal process of things, we expect 25 to 30 kids more (from the waiting list)."

Smith observed that approximately two-thirds of those students admitted to Williams who opt to go elsewhere settle at six schools in particular: Brown, Dartmouth, Harvard, Princeton, Stanford, and Yale. There was "a higher incidence of overlap with Brown this year than with Dartmouth," although it is historically the other way around, noted Smith.

Open meeting debates demise of houses

by Susan Kandel

"There are a lot of self-centered people on this campus," alleged Katie Kelly '83, president of A-Gar-Wood, during last Friday's final Housing Committee meeting, "and this is hurting the residential house system."

Converging on the controversial house transfer policy, 25 students debated the general issues relating to the residential house system at Williams.

"We feel there has been a demise in the residential house system," asserted Kathleen Merrigan '82, co-chair of the Housing Committee.

"As a whole, we're happy, as compared to the dormitory system, but disappointed as compared to the Williams College ideal," she added, "...and our transfer system has helped to work against this ideal."

Merrigan attributed the lack of diversity within houses, the class imbalances and the stereotyping of houses at least partially to the slackness of the present transfer system, predicting that the number of students requesting house transfers will continue to rise until the present system is remedied.

"In 1968, there were 10 transfers, in 1974 there were 70, last year there were 230, and this year, 322," she said.

"We believe they'll probably increase next year," Merrigan added.

Kelly maintained that the abundance of house transfers is a symptom, rather than a cause, of the breakdown of the house system.

"The value of the residential house is going down if people are transferring to have a better room," she said. "Home is becoming just a place to sleep."

In an attempt to ameliorate the situation, two subcommittee reports, suggesting alternatives to the present transfer system, were drafted by the Housing Committee this year, both of which have been submitted to the CUL for consideration.

The subcommittee headed by Perry president Tim Caffrey '82 opted for a return to the original transfer system wherein a student with a legitimate need may transfer at any time during the year, at the discretion of the deans.

According to Caffrey, this will eliminate the March "transfer-time" hysteria, at which time transferring is regarded as the norm, rather than as the exception.

Under the leadership of Fitch-Currier president Jonathan Light '83 and Betsy Horan '82, a second subcommittee report called for a quota system, whereby each house must be composed of 35 to 45 percent sophomores and may include no more than 35 percent juniors and 35 percent seniors.

The strict imposition of quotas, claim the members of the subcommittee, will preclude much inter-house transferring, and will make an all-senior or all-sophomore house an impossibility.

Among those dissenting from the majority motion to tighten the transfer policy was Pratt president John Kowalik '83, who cautioned against the creation of a rigid system that is unresponsive to student wishes.

"The system must be flexible enough to accommodate changing friendships and changing personal needs," he explained. "Students can decide for themselves where they want to live."

The dissenting group released a report on Sunday supporting the open transfer system. They noted the "significant" physical differences among houses and the demoralizing effect of unsuccessful transfers as important reasons to maintain transfers.

The report criticized the Caffrey proposal for increasing "bureaucratic involvement" which would "impose an unfair burden on the administration and on house officers."

The quota system "may not work in practice," predicted the report, and "there is no guarantee that percentages will result in unity."

Kevin Hirsch '82 closed the meeting by chastising the Record for its failure to accurately cover the issues brought up by the Housing Committee this year.

"There is only one body on this campus that regularly reports what's happening with the Housing Committee," he exclaimed, "and you're not doing a constructive job of it."

Welanetz to leave campus he built

Peter P. Welanetz, director of the physical plant at Williams College since 1951, will retire from that position at the end of December. His successor will be Winthrop M. Wassenar, who has been assistant director since 1964.

Welanetz has been responsible for the College's buildings and grounds during the period of greatest growth at Williams. When he arrived in 1950 there were 730,000 square feet of space in the College buildings. Now there are nearly two million.

Welanetz personally supervised construction of 33 of the College's 96 buildings and the renovation or restoration of the rest.

"What many people don't realize," he said, "is that this campus, with its traditional appearance, has been virtually rebuilt since 1950."

The result of his more than 30 years at the helm of the Buildings and Grounds Department is a campus that enjoys a national reputation as one of the best-maintained in the country.

Welanetz recalls that in 1950, many of the College's buildings were suffering from neglect or depreciation from age.

"The Trustees authorized a program to restore the campus," he says. "We've gone through a couple of 10-year plans."

His first project was restoration of West College, the oldest building at Williams, and one that had been gutted by fire. Only the exterior walls of the original College building were still standing.

"The walls weren't strong enough to support much weight," says Welanetz, "so we worked with the architects to devise a structure within the walls to carry the load."

Other significant examples of renovation include Fayerweather Hall and East College as well as the Freshman Quadrangle and Morgan Hall. In addition, all of the former fraternity houses were converted to either student housing, classroom buildings or administrative space.

It is impossible to overlook the scope of the new construction projects done at Williams while Welanetz has been on the job. There is a temptation to think that the Sawyer Library, completed in 1975, was the largest. But Welanetz points out that a couple of others were just as large.

"The Greylock Quadrangle (1965) involved construction of five buildings at the same time," he said. "The Bronfman Science Center (1967) and the Mission Park Housing Complex (1971) were also major projects."

Welanetz can tick off major building projects like most people can list cars they used to own. Baxter Hall, the student center (1953); the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink (1968) and the Herbert Towne Field House (1968); the Bernhard Music Center (1979); and the old Stetson Library, converted and expanded to faculty office space (1975); were all done during the Welanetz years.

Peter Welanetz's career as director of the physical plant for Williams spans thirty-two years. He supervised the construction of over one-third of all Williams buildings.

His work at Williams has earned Welanetz a significant national reputation. In 1976 he was elected National President of the Association of Physical Plant Administrators. He is frequently called upon as a consultant by other institutions, particularly on matters relating to the organization of a buildings and grounds operation. He is the author of a chapter of the book Campus Planning and Construction, published in 1977.

"One of the most interesting features of the Williams College campus is that you can trace its long, tradition-rich history by the variety of architectural styles that were in vogue over the various decades. Very few buildings in its physical plant bear an exact resemblance to one another," Welanetz remarked.

A great source of pride—and frustration—to Welanetz has been the fight to preserve the American elm. Despite a struggle waged ever since his arrival at Williams, Dutch elm disease has cut deeply into the number of elms on campus. The work to preserve the elm is continuing, but Welanetz has also initiated an ambitious program of planting other varieties of trees.

Winthrop Wassenar has been Welanetz's chief lieutenant since arriving at Williams in 1964. A 1959 engineering graduate of Worcester Polytechnic Institute, where he earned his M.S. in civil engineering in 1960, Wassenar, like Welanetz, is a Registered Professional Engineer. He is also a member of the American Arbitration Association and is frequently called upon to arbitrate disputes that arise during construction projects.

As Assistant Director of the Physical Plant at Williams, Wassenar has supervised many of the major construction projects, including the Sawyer Library, Mission Park housing, and the Bronfman Science Center. Wassenar is also working with architects on a feasibility study for new athletic facilities at the College.

News Briefs

Construction commences

Site preparation has begun on the campus' two most recent construction projects, the studio theatre and the Alumni Center. The theatre will be added to the Adams Memorial Theatre and the alumni facility is to be an addition to the Faculty House. Joseph Francescone Construction, Inc. of Pittsfield will carry on work at the sites simultaneously.

"It makes a great deal of sense to build both buildings at the same time," said Peter P. Welanetz, director of the physical plant. "Since the two construction sites lie within a few hundred yards of each other, money can be saved by having the same contractor do both. Also, building both at the same time will keep disruption to a minimum."

The box-shaped studio theatre will have 100 seats and will be built on the west side of the Adams Memorial Theatre, while the Alumni Center will contain banquet facilities, a reception area, and an expanded kitchen. Both additions were designed by Cambridge Seven Associates. The theatre project is budgeted for $900,000, and the Alumni Center is expected to cost $1.25 million.

Overriding the Elections Committee candidate Ned Stiker '84, the College Council voted last Wednesday to name Jon Tigar '84 Student Activities Board (SAB) Business Manager for the 1982-83 year after a heated debate among Council members and representatives from this year's SAB.

The Council approved all other Elections Committee candidates, including Bill Wright '84 as SAB chairman, Maryam Elahi '83 as international student representative to the Council and Dave Roland '84 and Parker Johnson '83 as minority representatives.

Jay Ward '84, Jan Van Eck '85, Derede Arthur '84 and Rob Snow sit on the Elections Committee that nominated all candidates.

Asked later for comments on this year's appointments, Council president Stuart Robinson '83 noted, "There were a lot of difficulties and debate. I think next fall we will review the process."

New Gargoyles named

The Gargoyle Society has named 16 students, 14 juniors and two sophomores, to take over the reins of campus leadership next semester. The Gargoyle, which has existed off and on since 1895, is intended to "work for the betterment of Williams College," according to a statement issued by the group.

"The Gargoyle Society identifies current issues of importance to the community while perpetuating a forum for discussion of long-range concerns," reads the statement.

Conservation payoff

Perry-Bascom added over $380 to its coffers by winning this year's Energy Conservation Contest sponsored by the Energy Conservation Committee. Perry-Bascom's energy use was a third lower this year than its average use over the years 1977-79, the base average the Committee used to determine comparative energy savings.

West College came in second and received $123, while Spencer-Brooks was third. Energy Committee chairman Bob Kozelka admitted that removal of the Row Houses kitchens was not computed in the savings total, but added "(The Row Houses) have suffered enough."

As a whole, College housing units used 10 percent less energy this year than in the past. A total of 161,665 fewer kilowatt hours were used this year, and houses received $8000 overall in return for conservation.

A CALL FOR AMNESTY

A tax-funded research project (Grant #RO1GM07495) entitled "THE GENETICS AND PHYSIOLOGY OF BEHAVIORAL DIFFERENCES" has been funded for over twenty years by the National Institute of General Medical Sciences. The recipient of these grants is Thomas E. McGill, PhD of Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts.

Dr. McGill strives to create an animal model of human female sexual response by manipulating the hormone levels of mice. His "purpose" is to further our understanding of how genetic, environmental, and physiological variables act and interact to produce differences in behavior.

The research began in 1959. The original goal was to examine inbred strains of mice for differences in sexual behavior. This was done by injecting female mice with hormones that induced a state in which she is receptive to a male and then placing her with a male. The resultant behavior was scored by counting the number of times certain things were done to her by the male, including the number of times the male bites the female, the number of head mounts, etc.

In general some characteristics of this behavior were found to show differences between inbred strains, others not. These differences were then focused upon and manipulated by breeding the animals with animals from other strains and examining the children for characteristics. Additionally, a variety of other factors were examined, e.g., the age of the animals when they had their first sexual experience. In addition, the animals were injected with a variety of chemicals.

Friends of Animals has enlisted 200 experts to review federally-funded research using animals. The reviews are based on photocopies of the grant applications and reports, obtained under the Freedom of Information act. The above project of Dr. McGill's was one of those screened.

Michael Edison Labhard, MD of Ellicott City, MD, made this assessment:

"Absolutely no results applicable to problems in human health have come from the twenty years of this research. In fact, no relationship to the human situation has been established, nor has any effort been made to demonstrate any degree of relevance to any species other than rodents. About $400,000 has been spent for two decades to watch mice procreate. And no practical results of any kind have come from this expenditure. During the same period the elegant studies of Masters and Johnson have made enormous strides in our understanding of human sexual functioning by studying humans.

This project clearly had no merit when it was originally proposed and twenty years later it has managed to do no more than reconfirm that complete lack of potential year after year."

The Federal Congress has before it a measure entitled "The Research Modernization Act" (HR 556). It would force an upgrading of research by requiring that 30% to 50% of funds allocated for medical research be used for non-animals methods of inquiry, testing and education. Methods such as tissue culture and computer simulation have direct applicability to human problems in contrast to reliance upon animal research which is generally wasteful and often dangerous when applied to humans.

STUDENTS:

In light of the foregoing, please consider:

- (1) What are the proper goals of an education in an institution of "higher learning"?
- (2) Will you make your voice heard to end such shameful and wasteful experiments at your university?

Grodzins—portrait of a transcendental artist

Ed's note:

This week marks the appearance of Dean Grodzins' first published collection of his strip, entitled, most appropriately, Tangents. Since winning the National College Cartoon Contest in 1980, Dean has had to endure a bit of friendly teasing from his artistic colleagues on the Record. Mike Sutton '82 and Paul Banevicius '82. It seems that the year that Dean won the contest, another unknown college cartoonist, a fellow by the name of Berke Breathed came in third. Today, Breathed's "Bloom County" is a nationally syndicated strip. Tangents, then, is an answer to at least some of this criticism. Ronald Isen and Rosanne Ilario last week met with Grodzins and discussed his upcoming book and strip in general, for the Record.

by Ron Isen
& Rosanne Ilario

Record: Why don't you talk about the new character you're trying to develop in the strip?

Grodzins: Well, it has been a desire of mine for the last while now to develop a female character and I'm slowly moving towards that. I think you'll see that the last couple of cartoons are a marvelous setup for that character for next year.

Record: Is this the mysterious girlfriend that's been running through the whole strip?

Grodzins: I haven't worked out all the relations. I hope to have an answer for that by September.

Record: If you're a character in the strip, the protagonist, and presumably your freshman roommate is the other fellow, is this girl someone on campus?

Grodzins: Now wait a minute. There is a myth here about how closely the strip parallels reality. Now, it is true that the fellow with the glasses has some bearing on myself but he does things that I don't do...

Record: Such as?

Grodzins: (Hesitates) I suppose he's somewhat less inhibited a dreamer than I am.

Record: Is he less inhibited in what he does?

Grodzins: That's kind of hard to say, because quite often my frustrations—what I am, what I can and cannot do—show up in that character. But just to carry this through, I never had a freshman roommate. The other character developed logically as an extension of the first and has been gaining momentum as an independent character. The dog and the cat appeared in the house I was living in last year, Woodbridge, and I became intrigued at the possibilities. Lately the cat has been getting somewhat more attention because it's my idea that human beings are basically klutzes whereas cats are marvelously successful at what they do.

Record: (Getting back to the point of the interrogation...) How much of the real Dean are we getting when we read about asking the girl to the movie two weeks ago?

Grodzins: I won't deny that similar situations have happened to me. As for when they happened...

Record: Well, there are a lot of rumors going around campus.

Grodzins: I'll have to leave that up to speculation.

Record: So the rumor that the depressive period, when you talked about not having a girlfriend on campus having to do with winter carnival, or the more joyous period now occurring around spring weekend have nothing to do with fact?

Grodzins: Un, aah, hmmm... (He hedges.) No, not really, not a bit. It's more my subjective outlook on the world. I think one has to blame the weather.

Record: Describe your relationship with Sutton and Banevicius.

Grodzins: We get along pretty well, though we'll occasionally short-sheet each other.

Record: Sutton has called you a minimalist. Would you care to elaborate?

Dean Grodzins, campus cartoonist, goes off on another TANGENT.

Grodzins: Well, I've never particularly given myself any labels like that. I think what he means by that is that I try to avoid excess details. I draw my characters without much of a background. Usually one line is used to suggest a lot. The reason for this is that I've never taken an art class, or anything like that. My style developed from doodling and stuff like that, although I do sometimes like to fool around with charcoal. My style developed from fooling around. Because I don't consider myself an artist, you might say I like to draw as little as possible. The greatest challenge I have when I draw is trying to make all my panels resemble one another.

Record: Do you see a social or moral purpose to your strip, or is it more nearly art for art's sake?

Grodzins: I always hesitate to call it art, but I suppose if I had to attach a message to it, I'd quote Walt Kelly of Pogo fame, "We have met the enemy and he is us." There's a lot to laugh at close to home. Kelly also said, "We must make democracy safe for the world." I can think of no better way of doing that than through humor.

Record: What made you decide to publish your book by yourself rather than going to a national publishing house?

Grodzins: Well, I never really considered going to a national publishing house. When I first got the idea for this, it was suggested by several friends, independently, though. So, I decided I would get out a book. Going to a national publisher and such takes a lot of time. I also didn't think that at this time many would have a strong financial incentive to publish this type of book, as usually they publish books from guys who have much more of a national audience. So, I went and published the book on my own. I think that a successful private book will be a plus in my favor if I should ever want to try for national syndication. In part, I wanted to get a book out before the end of the year so that my friends who are seniors would be able to get a copy.

Record: None of your characters seem to have names. Is there a reason for that?

Grodzins: When I first created the characters around 1970, they all had names. The only problem was that I didn't like the names that I had given them. Actually, I've dropped most of the characters I had at that time, except the fellow who is the central character in the strip. But I didn't even like his name so I dropped that also. Unfortunately, I haven't been able to come up with any good ones since either. When people ask me about them, they refer to them as "The guy with the glasses," "his roommate," "the dog," or "the cat". And when I talk about them they generally seem to know what I'm talking about.

Erudite Englishman always active

Derede Arthur

Although Williams has an excellent faculty, every semester it gets a transfusion of "new blood." This year, one of the donors speaks four languages and has written nearly twenty books. He also has won international recognition in two specialized fields—German medieval history and international history—and sports one of the most delicious Oxford accents on campus. This professor is of course, the well-known British historian Geoffrey Barraclough.

A Bernhard Visiting Professor, Barraclough has taught two history courses at Williams this semester, one in each of his special fields. Noting that Williams is "extremely pleasant," Barraclough says he has enjoyed his semester here. "I like the people I teach," he comments. "What astounds me, really, is the enthusiasm. I got a very good impression in that respect." Barraclough, who retired from Oxford in 1974 but has been teaching at Brandeis for seven years, was invited "out of the blue" by the College to teach two courses, "The Making of Europe, 300-1300" and "The World Since 1929", which had not been taught for several years.

Barraclough cites a number of reasons for accepting Williams' invitation. "Williams has a good reputation, fairly widespread," he notes, adding that he has found student work to be of a "pretty good standard—which is as it should be in a place like Williams."

Also interested in international and Third World economics, Barraclough was attracted to the College because of the "very good reputation" of the Center for Development Economics. Although Barraclough originally intended to spend much of his free time at the Center, large delays in his scholarly work precluded such involvement.

This same work, which he had hoped to have completed before the semester began, also prevented him from becoming very involved in the college. "I haven't participated nearly as much as I had intended or wanted to. I'm sorry about that; I would have liked to be more into things."

History has been Barraclough's lifelong love. "Almost from the moment I could read, I found myself reading historical novels," he states. "There was never any question in my mind that I would continue to be interested in history." He originally intended to enter the foreign service but "slipped into teaching," a decision he rarely regrets—"about the twelfth week of each semester!"

A 1929 graduate of Oriel College at Oxford University, Barraclough did his postgraduate work in Munich and Rome in the field of medieval history. He returned to England in 1934 to teach at both Oxford and Cambridge before joining the Royal Air Force at the outbreak of World War II.

Barraclough first came to America in 1966 and held successive posts at UCLA, University of California at San Diego, and Brandeis University before returning to England in 1970 following an invitation from Oxford. Upon his retirement from Oxford in 1974, he returned to Brandeis, preferring Boston, "a very civilized city," and changing seasons to Southern California's constant climate and lack of an "intellectually stimulating" environment.

What of the future? Always in demand, and never in one place for long, Barraclough has commitments in Switzerland this summer, and has agreed to teach political science at the University of Munich beginning January 1983. In between, there is scholarly research to attend to and students to be taught. The pressures of his profession leave him little time for rest and relaxation beyond occasional chess games and hikes into the wood, but Barraclough says he does not mind this: "My hobby is my work."

Globetrotting historian Geoffrey Barraclough is stopping at Williams long enough to teach two courses this semester. (Milloy)

The Williams Experience: we came, we . . .

...partied, we left, or something like that
by John Segal '82 and Jim Pettit '82

by John Segal and Jim Pettit

Ed. note: The authors of this week's Outlook are two graduating seniors. They are both weird, anti-social, but friendly residents of the Berkshire Quad. Segal has been involved with many campus organizations and committees. Pettit has not. Segal has a job next year. Pettit does not. As these two have spent four years (more or less) at Williams, we thought they might have something interesting, intelligent, or intellectual to say. We were wrong. Enjoy.

"Liberal institutions straightaway cease from being liberal the moment they are soundly established."
—Friedrich Nietzsche, Twilight of the Idols.

"Stereotypes are, in essence, a very good and necessary thing."

—David Moro

"Legalize harassment. Hear, hear."
—Library graffiti

"There is no particular major at Williams that is designed as preparation for the business profession."
—The Williams College Bulletin

"What?"
—James Pfeiffer (and others).

Using these five quotes as a starting point, you are to compose an essay which attempts to define the Williams Experience. You may wish to focus on the issues raised in these quotes, but do not feel restricted by them. Traverse, if you will, such diverse and rewarding avenues as: La Coste shirts, ECK, nicknames (e.g., Steve "Spearsle" Spears, Steve "Eppie" Epstein), vegetarian noodle surprise, the 'libes', and the emotional elite. By all means, go for it. It's the balls. Avoid clichés.

My approach is this: to relate a basically factual event from each of the four years, and to allow that incident to serve as a partial metaphor for the "Williams Experience" (or, at least, my "Williams Experience"). It is an idea with more faults than merits, but, then again, remember our trope.

Just to make it slightly more pretentious and self-indulgent, I'll also set each year to appropriate music.

Freshman Year: (music, "Like a Hurricane", Neil Young). For the time being, let's establish a shattered jar of peanut butter as the key to this year. The story begins, as they so often do, with grain alcohol. Some conversation and dancing followed. Soon, however, we were bulleting home in unusually high spirits. Explosives seemed the next logical step, but the best we could manage were some accurately delivered fireworks and a relatively successful bonfire. The remainder of the night, it seems, involved quite a bit of noise, much running, and almost as much falling down. I awoke the next morning to the unfamiliar sound of a jar of Skippy's Peanut Butter crashing through my second floor window (a nice shot, that). It lay on the floor, oozing slightly, amid a wild array of broken glass. I thought about it for a minute, and went back to sleep.

The Record: For the past four years, Williams College's only student newspaper has been plagued by two problems: sensationalism, and an insistence on publishing personal opinions as "news". The first of these, sensationalism, simply comes from the fact that not much happens around here in a week. Williams is very slow to produce newsworthy events. The Record acknowledged this several years ago, when it cut back from two to one issue a week.

The tendency The Record has to distort "news" with the personal opinions of the editors and staff writers stems from a long tradition. Editorials and headlines have taken shots at ex-boyfriends, personal enemies, political adversaries, and anybody the editors don't like. But this is not the main problem; it is only fact.

The main problem is that The Record will continue to print this kind of "journalism", because present editors select future editors. In fact, the editor selection process ensures that the paper will never improve. Future editors must practice the same sensationalism and personal bias in their reporting, otherwise they will never move up in the organization.

The obvious solution here is to have The Record staff elect their editors for the upcoming year. The details could be worked out so that only those who have written a minimum number of articles (say four or so) could vote. The current problems would not be perpetuated, and the paper would be more responsible to the students, whose S.A.T. money supports The Record in the first place. Of course, no editor-in-chief would ever agree to this plan once he or she has been selected.

Taking a break from John's pseudo-analytical-quasi-political arguments, I'd like to consider: Sophomore Year: (music, "Quadrophonia", The Who). This year is easy. The metaphor is very appropriate, and, in fact, true. It involves a broken hand, as well as the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Olympic Hockey game, "Starsky and Hutch", the news, a case of cheap beer, and my family. Not necessarily in that order.

The beer was something of a constant. You can probably imagine the hockey game and "Starsky and Hutch". It's not really necessary to differentiate between them. The news contained quite a few stories about the economy. You know, rising prices, increasing unemployment, blah, blah, that sort of thing.

The mixture of these elements, in addition to my own awareness of my family's financial troubles, and, specifically, my sister's doubtful ability to afford a decent college education . . . well, the combination of all these things produced a considerable explosion of beer cans (all in good fun), and an even greater barrage of bitter words. But was anybody listening? Yes, probably, but I didn't think so at the time. I still felt the need to express myself. So in a splendid display of angry defiance—I punched a metal locker. And broke my hand.

College Council: The problem College Council now has is one of personnel. The Council is lacking both the leadership and make-up to be the significant body we want it to be. This is because many of the most energetic and dedicated students are devoting their time to other political or quasi-political bodies or organizations on campus: C.U.L., H. & D., W.A.S.H., and publications (non-literary).

The solution will come when Council leaders (not necessarily officers) undertake to represent student opinion, deal with the administration, etc., in the name of the College Council, not in the name of themselves. For example, College Council did not rally support behind Proposal A, the former Council President did. Similarly, College Council is not spearheading an anti-NESAC movement; the current President is, entirely on his own.

Alternative Paper Topic #1:

"As flies to wanton boys, are we to the gods; they kill us for their sport."

—Shakespeare, King Lear, Act IV, scene 1

"Sport?" Compose a set of rules and regulations. Try to avoid spurious arguments (and clichés). Consider such things as penalties, bonus points. Most Valuable Players, Rookie-of-the-Year, game time, time outs, substitutes, off-sides, three-point plays, mid-season strikes, and the role of the locker room and shower.

Be brief. I haven't got all day to read these papers.

Junior Year: (music, "Back-to-School Days", Graham Parker, or "Imagine", John Lennon).

This story is, unfortunately, not true. But it might be more interesting that way. Oh, it happened; it's true in that sense. It just isn't true as a symbol. So, an arbitrary choice: reading James Joyce. (Finally, an academic concern).

But that's only part of the picture. Maybe this will fill in the blanks: Some friends and I drove to New Orleans during Spring Break. We had a great time. (You know, we got psyched, it was totally key, etc.) We slept on the floor of the living room in a house owned by some Tulane students whom we didn't know.

Asleep on the floor one night (or early morning) we were awakened by the returning owners. Rollo, their cat, had been killed—the victim of a hit and run driver. One of the kids was inconsolable. Another tried to explain to him that man was inhuman to his fellow man, so no one could be expected to care about a cat. Another passed out on a glass table. A burial service was held.

"In our new enlightened state we drink wine with dinner in long-stemmed glasses. It is the American Way of Life!"

Two days later, Rollo sauntered into the living room. The buried corpse was exhumed and found to bear no resemblance to the beloved Rollo. Maybe Joyce was a better choice . . .

Art: What this campus needs is more Art. What we need is to bring the artists we do have out of the remote studios at the far reaches of the campus, and spread them around so everyone can see them and their work daily. Between classes, we should be able to stop and comment on the progress, monumentality, or soaring verticality of some art form.

Similarly, literary magazines should come out weekly (different editors each time), an art gallery should be added to Baxter Hall, and two- and three-dimensional design should be required for all students (instead of a "great works" course). We could also stipulate that all Art History courses start at 1880 or later, but that's just my personal preference.

Gargoyle: Most people don't know what Gargoyle is. Those who do say: Oh, yeah, it's that elitist thing. Well, they're right.

Despite vehement objections by current members, Gargoyle will never amount to any more than a group of secretly selected students who pretend they are doing something important (all except Jill Klein). All talk, no do. It's just resume point city. (It's even on my resume).

Why, then, have we been hearing about Gargoyle recently (i.e., reading in The Record what Gargoyle members have to say about various issues)? Well, guess. Uh-huh: At least one Record editor is a member of Gargoyle.

Everyone has opinions. No one's opinion should be made any more important by tagging a "Gargoyle Spokesman" at the end of it. It doesn't mean anything special.

"Jim—Your response to the topic is a strange one. Rather than developing a consistent, objective argument, you have rambled on about a series of, to be perfectly frank, marginally interesting and completely irrelevant events.

You avoid real issues. Don't you have anything meaningful to say? C+/C-."

Well, I do have a few more anecdotes, just to fill the page. These are true, I guess, and they might even be meaningful to someone, somewhere, maybe.

When I came to Williams, I was stereo-less. I did have a small portable radio, though, and was even able to pick up WCFM on it. My lack, however, was something of a social sin.

"That's your stereo! Christ."

During freshman year, I worked for Food Service—One day, early in the year, I was asked to be a waiter at a guest meal. The pay was pretty good. The experience was not. One of my tables contained an obnoxious and grouching rug-head who felt compelled to comment upon my every action—in a less than complimentary fashion. His companions were amused and joined in the fun. Ha, ha.

At the beginning of sophomore year, there was a scramble for student jobs. I wound up working several hours a week for four different departments. As I related this to a friend, the person standing by us (a non-financial aid student) told me: "It's because of people like you that I can't get a job around here."

In a Political Philosophy course, we read an article which argued that higher education was meant for the wealthy. Among the financially less fortunate, the "exceptional" few would rise to the top naturally, but should be given no assistance. I remember being pretty pissed off about the article and was expecting an interesting class.

I got one. The majority of the class seemed not at all disturbed by the article. Those of us who were had a difficult time arguing our case. One student claimed that she knew "lots" of poor people who could go to college if they wanted to work hard enough.

Four friends and I planned a trip to a bar in Washington, Ma., to see Rick Danko and Paul Butterfield. We borrowed a car and were just under way when we were pulled over by a Williamstown Police officer. He asked for some identification. I gave him my driver's license. He asked for the registration. I gave it to him and explained that I had borrowed the car.

He shined a light into the car, revealing a generally long-haired, scruffy bunch. And some beer. He asked our ages. One of us was underage. He asked me to get out of the car. He went back to his car and spent a few minutes on the radio. He came back and asked to see everyone's identification. One of my friends handed him a Williams I.D.

"You're a Williams student?"
"Yes."
"Ha, you should've shown me your Williams I.D., and we wouldn't have had this problem. I thought you guys stole the car. Sorry about that. Oh, don't worry about the beer, just keep it down."

Committees: In the Rules and Regulations of the College it must read somewhere: "Give me an issue, I'll form a committee." There are committees for everything around here, Ad-Hoc and standing. There are even two Committee Committees; the Steering Committee and the Elections Committee, both of which spend most of their time putting people on committees.

What does this mean? Nothing, really, only that there are more resume points available for all of us. It also means that too many of us (especially the artists) are spending too much time stuck in committees. And there's only so much we can do to establish a meaningful interface to serve as a spring board for further discussion.

I went to "Breaking Away". I liked it, but I felt depressed afterwards. ("How could you get depressed by Breaking Away?") Well, confused loyalties . . . "you better decide which side you're on" . . . all that stuff. But, I guess I got no sense of humor . . .

Alternative Paper Topic #2:

"Nothing belongs on a poker table but cards, chips, and whiskey."

—Stanley Kowalski, A Streetcar Named Desire.

Is the issue as simple as Stanley would like us to believe? How closely do Tennessee Williams' views on the subject matter concur with Stanley's? Is Stanley perhaps (hopelessly???) (tragically???) (rightly???) bound by certain cultural, ethnic, and psycho-sexual restraints? And ultimately, is there a clear center of moral order? N.B. Feel free to go beyond these limitations.

"There were drums and guns, and drums and guns, Haroo, Haroo . . ."

WCFM: "My name is . . . the name of my show is . . . and stay where you are. Stereo 92 and it's 7:32. Weather for the Berkshires . . . 15 degrees calculus. Winds . . . cool and cloudy . . . chance of pretic-percitapa-ah, you know, rain is . . . winds from the southwest."

Problem: Too much New Wave. Aggggggh!! Every time you flip the radio on, it's Gang of Four or XTC. What every happened to classic rock? The succinct guitar work of Jimmy Hendrix, the emotional synthesizers of Yes and E.L.P., the boogie of Southern Boogie???

Solution: Shut down the FM studio, and go back to WMS, the AM station. Keep A.J., Mr. Brad, Bear on the Air, Eppy, and J. Eric all here to run it. Make sure they play a lot of classic rock. And, for the love of God, no more of that New Wave stuff.

Alternative Paper Topic #3:

"If dreams came true, oh, wouldn't that be nice But this ain't no dream we're living through tonight Girl, you want it, you take it, you pay the price."

—Bruce Springsteen, Prove It all Night, 1978.

"Is a dream a lie if it don't come true or is it something worse?"
—Bruce Springsteen, The River, 1980.

Is this a logical progression? Trace dream imagery in the works Springsteen, paying close attention to Freudian theories. Is Springsteen "the balls"?

What's the point of all this? Anyway . . . what does it all mean?

Before I came here, my friends at home warned me: "watch out around those rich kids, don't take any of their shit." They assured me that I was just as good as anyone else, that I could handle it.

Well, I guess I've handled it. At times, not so painlessly. But, time and experience made things easier. It could be said, I suppose, that I've been "co-opted by the system". Maybe. But, if given my preference, I'd like to say that I've learned something.

Among all the crates and suitcases that arrived here four years ago, there was a good deal of prejudice crammed in there among the bed-sheets, posters, no exceptions. I came here with just about as many "stereotypes" about the wealthy as you can imagine. And I can still be as intolerant as all hell, much too often.

I think, though, that my experiences here, good and bad (oh, yeah, surprise, there were plenty of good ones), have opened my eyes to the fact that no group of people can claim a significantly greater percentage of virtue or love or morality or whatever you'd like to call it. My only addition to this somewhat less than profound conclusion is that I would have expected intelligence to be more closely related to these things. But even that isn't that true.

Senior Year: (music: "Lost in the Supermarket", The Clash). As yet, there is no readily available metaphor for this, the ultimate Williams year. If an appropriate experience should occur, we will certainly be in contact with you. Thank you for your interest . . .

Seniors create unparalleled jazz

by Matt Shapiro

Last Thursday night darkened slowly, slipping by on warm gentle breezes and muted glows. The wood-paneled, crystal skylight elegance of Currier Ballroom was broken up by rows of hastily arranged metal folding chairs, the kind you find in trade union halls. The staid, sober uniformity of a recital hall had been jarred apart. The audience, in the casual dress of T-shirts and jeans, conversed loudly, their anxious words joined by the sounds of highway and sidewalk that seeped in the room through ceiling-high French windows thrown wide. This was neither the crowd nor the setting for a Williams College Music Department recital featuring, say, the cool precision of a solo piano performance. But then, seniors Jeb Gist and John Russell had works to perform that were well apart from the Western tonal music tradition.

As Williams College music majors, Gist and Russell were treading in the artistic under-world of jazz, bent on upholding that synthesis of African and European styles which places its members in the roles of ensemble player, composer, and constant improviser.

Despite its status as the only purely American musical form, jazz has few who respect it and even fewer who receive the instruction and support to create it. At Williams, considering the size of our musical facilities and the extent of the department, this dilemma seems particularly ridiculous. The work done by Gist and Russell as jazz musicians is viewed at best as a pleasant novelty. The proposal that jazz would be the medium for a senior recital was met with benign acceptance by the vast majority of the Music Department. But during the performance, timid applause gave way to exuberant bursts of excitement as the audience warmed to the wide open risk-taking styles of musicianship and composition.

Only a few years ago, Gist, a pianist, and Russell, trumpet and flugel horn, were hard at work as yeoman classical performers. Both had trained in classical music since childhood and continued on this vein in their early days at Williams. In the past few years they have moved away from the usual academic fare both musically and physically. Russell spent last year in England composing and studying. Gist spent a hectic but enlightening year at Wesleyan University exposing himself to jazz performers and the University's superb ethnomusicology department. Although senior year meant returning to the less than invigorating atmosphere of the Purple Valley, the prospect of a senior recital to demonstrate their abilities as performers and composers was definitely appealing.

Throughout the Thursday night recital, the surge of pent-up energy, like the sudden freedom of a caged animal, swept out from these performers and their music. The emotional and technical authenticity of their works touched all those in the audience, jazz zealot and curious friend alike.

In the big band works Gist's "Mo-Fo" and Russell's "London fog," the idea of improvised music as a vital means of expression and as an expressive voice that can reflect upon itself came through time and time again.

Finally, this performance, although a testament to the maturing musical choices and creativity of Jeb Gist and John Russell, is at the same time a reminder of how much further we, as listeners and Williams as an academic institution have to go in accepting and encouraging American improvised music—jazz. This was the first such advance in a long time and according to Jeb Gist it may be quite a while before jazz appears in a senior recital setting again.

"Gag rule"

To the editor:

Taking a break from numerous papers, we recently received an educational experience of a very different kind at the most recent CUL meeting. This "open meeting" was to discuss a proposal before the committee that, if adopted, would deny the use of OCC's recruitment facilities for organizations with written policies of discrimination that go against the College's guaranteed statement of personal rights in the Student Handbook. This would apply most obviously to the Department of Defense's policy of discrimination against gays.

We soon learned the committee's definition of "open meeting." Following President Chandler's entrance, the chair informed the audience that the President was at the meeting to answer the committee's questions, not the spectators'. This "gag rule" included even the author of the proposal who had been allowed to speak at the two previous CUL meetings.

The committee members' discussion of the proposal was polite and well-informed. The President's responses were equally polite, but, unfortunately, were also muddled, confused, and contradictory. As soon as the President left the meeting, the chair recognized the proposal's author—seemingly in contradiction to the stated gag-rule policy.

After four years at Williams College we cannot pretend to understand what goes on in Hopkins Hall much of the time. What we have learned to recognize is when something, indeed, is going on there. A reasonable proposal was presented to the CUL. The President expressed his opposition without reference to that same process of reason and mobilized the Administration's forces to get that message across.

Message received: the rights of gay people are given low priority by the Administration. Despite the facade of committee input, the President has made the decision to kill this proposal.

Crusade

To the editor:

I have recently received a letter from David A. Moro '82 soliciting my financial support for his endeavor to launch a newspaper, The Williams Republican. The purpose of the proposed weekly will be, inter alia: to oppose "liberal and leftist views" on campus; to recall Williams to "its finest traditions . . . (and) historical roots"; to improve "dismal social life" at Williams; to "seriously consider bringing fraternities back"; to promote "supply side economics"; and to restore "a sense of humor and proportion" to campus social and intellectual discourse.

In the letter, Mr. Moro portrays himself and his fellow campus Republicans as a somewhat beleaguered minority struggling to uphold tradition against a motley group of "gays," "blacks," "feminists," and "self-righteous leftists." Apparently, he believes that he will find a more sympathetic ear and more tangible support from rock-ribbed conservative alumni of my generation than from among his fellow students.

What concerns me most about this letter is not Mr. Moro's Republican viewpoint. The troublesome aspect of the letter is that he appears to be positioning himself to foster and promote a confrontation between certain of Williams' wealthy and most conservative alumni and the college's finest traditions of pluralistic intellectual excellence.

Many private colleges, most notably Princeton, have suffered in the past from this kind of fratricidal conflict. The lesson of these "no win" battles is that the College becomes diverted from its primary objective—namely, to promote the highest standards of intellectual achievement.

I remind Mr. Moro that President Baxter, whom Mr. Moro admires because he was an enthusiastic participant at torchlight football rallies and who was a quintessential establishment figure, hired an allegedly leftist professor of political science from the University of Chicago because Baxter thought that Fred Schuman would contribute to the intellectual vitality of an undergraduate education. Schuman, needless to say, served with great distinction for many years and was repeatedly voted by the conservative undergraduates of my generation as one of the most outstanding members of the most. These same undergraduates who admired Schuman in the classroom often referred to him as "Red Fred."

President Baxter's decision to hire a controversial professor was in the best Williams tradition of academic freedom and excellence. If Mr. Moro's objective is simply to obtain a better airing for Republican views on campus, he has my support. I caution him, however, that the college he and I love will suffer if the college's conservative alumni are enlisted in what can easily become a crusade against the college's best traditions of intellectual diversity and excellence.

Academics first

To the editor:

Ted Leon's claim that NES-CAC's rule against post-season competition "makes no sense" is, I think, demonstrably false. The reasoning behind the policy is not, despite Leon's claims, anti-elitist. Rather, this policy, as most NES-CAC Policies, is a result of the Conference's concern with placing academics before athletics. If sports teams engage in post-season play, the individuals on those teams will no doubt have to make some sacrifices of classroom and study time in order to play. Great, if that's what they really want to do. What happens, though, when some members of a team want to make that sacrifice and others (let us assume a minority) do not? The majority, then, exerts explicit or implicit pressure on the minority to conform to its decision. A coercive situation has arisen . . .

It may be objected that athletes would know in advance that this type of conflict could occur. If they wished to avoid the issue they would not have to join the team to begin with. But, do we really want to force our potential athletes to make this decision? It seems to me to be contrary to the purpose of athletics at Williams. If that purpose is, as I believe, to provide as many students as possible the opportunity to participate in intercollegiate competition as a complement to their studies, the NES-CAC Policy is a good one and should remain.

SCIENCE and ENVIRONMENTAL REPORTING PROGRAM

Scientific and technological advancements are having a profound impact on society and have created an urgent need for knowledgeable, skilled science, medical, and environmental affairs communicators to inform the public about these developments and their consequences.

The Science and Environmental Reporting Program, given under the auspices of New York University's Department of Journalism and Mass Communication, has as its goal the training of communicators for the news media, industry, government, and public interest groups. Degree candidates take 48 points in three regular semesters and part of a summer and, upon successful completion of the program, are awarded an M.A. in Journalism and a Certificate in Science and Environmental Reporting. Course work includes a year-long Science Survey course team-taught by several scientists and a journalist; Basic and Advanced News Writing; science and medical reporting; Press Ethics; Science, the Press, and the Public; The History of Science; and an internship. There are also frequent field trips to scientific and medical facilities and special seminars conducted by experts in several areas. For application material, write to: William E. All the Unripe is stale

by Eric Johnson

Martha, the protagonist in Stephanie Voss' play, All The Unripe, is caged throughout the play. The work, is also confined. From the minimalist set design by Laurie Palmer, to the very premeditated speeches delivered by Alice Comiskey as Martha, the entire play is caged and limited by its dependence on cliché and stock characterization.

The work's effect seems to depend on the tension produced by the differences between Martha's sanguinary act and her personal appeal. Her guard, Richard (known as Dick), asks her how she could kill people with a bomb when she didn't even know them. Her reply is, "Why not?" She takes the world personally—and is angry about it. Unfortunately, she neither seems appealing nor coherent enough to provide the tension the play needs as a focus. With jargon and frenzy as her main expressive aids, Martha is not absorbing. She is irritating.

Other irritations are provided by the play's conventionally avant-garde approach. For one, the audience is cast as a character. As the antagonistic jury, supposedly alienated by Martha's terrorist act, the audience in theory should be involved in the exposition of Martha's story. But, as Martha has said in one of her few lucid moments, she hasn't brought terror into the world. Sadly, she hasn't brought even a ghost of it onstage. She brings no terror and no interest. For the convention of the audience-character to work, it must either feel involved or must be deliberately alienated, not lost to boredom.

Another less-than-fresh approach is to give an inanimate object a persona. This has been done by Beckett in Endgame, for example, to better effect. In Voss's play, the cage that defines Martha's world in the play is such a character so well. No other character's influence is so strong throughout the work. However, the combined inarticulateness of Martha's prattle and the cage's silence strikes the play dumb.

The nexus of stage design, acting, and writing has come upon hard times in this creation. It is so limited that it offers nothing in the way of spectacle, insight, or meaningful experience. The saddest thing about this production is that Martha and all her cares don't matter in the way they are conceived and presented. One hopes that in Stephanie Voss's next effort, her confinement isn't so sterile.

President of L.L. Bean Leon A. Gorman commented, "We are most appreciative of the intrinsic human value in a quality liberal arts education and of the outstanding educational opportunities in liberal arts provided by these Maine colleges." Preference in use of the funds will be to aid Maine residents. Gorman did not even attempt to estimate the amount spent annually by students of the three colleges on L.L. Bean goods.

Bergen Community College

A bomb made from a candle and a stick of dynamite exploded last Friday in a locker at Bergen Community College's College Center building in Paramus, N.J. Shards of metal flew 25 feet from four shattered lockers, according to the New York Times' account, but there were no injuries.

Only 15 minutes before the 8:33 A.M. blast, the hall was filled with students going to exams on the last day of the spring term.

"It's just a miracle no one was there," Police Chief Joseph Delaney commented. "If there were, there's no question they would have been killed or maimed." About 2,000 people were evacuated from the building for two hours following the explosion.

The locker was registered to a 20-year-old Saddle Brook, N.J. woman. She had reportedly vacated it on Thursday, however, so there are few leads in the case.

Netmen wrap up with two victories

by Gordon Celender

Finishing their season with an impressive 9-2 record, the men's tennis team posted wins over Albany and Wesleyan last week. The team's only losses were close 5-4 decisions to Colgate and Amherst, with both defeats coming when the Ephmen were not at full strength.

Although the Little Three Championship had been decided two weeks previously, the pride of both teams was still at stake when Williams took on Wesleyan Saturday. With Captain Chuck Warshaver returning to the singles lineup for only the second time since being injured in the Colgate match, Williams won easily, capturing five of six singles matches (all in straight sets) and sweeping the doubles.

In singles, premiere racqueteer Greg Zaff '84 pushed his personal record to 10-1, the best on the team, with a victory at the number one position. Seniors Warshaver, Steve Graham, and Don Mykrantz were all victorious, winning at numbers two, five and six, respectively. Sophomore Brook Larmer added Williams' fifth singles point with a win at the number four spot.

Doubles victories went to the dynamic duos of Warshaver and Zaff, Larmer and Craig Hammond '85, and Mykrantz and Tim Rives '85.

The Ephmen picked up their eighth win of the season last Wednesday, defeating Albany by a score of 7-2. Courts one and two featured the two finest matches of the day, as Zaff survived six match points to defeat his opponent 10-8 in a third set tiebreaker, while Marc Sopher '83 rallied from a 5-3 deficit in the third set to win at the number two position.

Also victorious in singles were Larmer and Kelt "the Celt" Burbank '83 at numbers four and six. Burbank blanked his opponent 6-0, 6-0.

Although they were unable to hold onto the Little Three trophy this year, the varsity tennis team enjoyed a very successful season in which every singles player compiled a personal winning record.

Baseball fluctuates - drop 3 win 1

by John Clayton

The baseball team (5-10) went 1-3 last week, dropping a doubleheader at Amherst on Saturday, 5-2 and 4-1, beating Middlebury 12-1 on Wednesday and losing (gulp) 20-4 to AIC Monday.

Freshman Mike Coakley had a tremendous home run with Mark White on first in the fourth inning of the first Amherst game to score both Williams runs. John DeLorenzo pitched the game, giving up five runs on nine hits. The Ephmen had good defense behind DeLorenzo (1-4), with two double plays (four on the day), but Amherst scored two in the fourth, one in the fifth, and two in the sixth to get the win.

Senior co-captain Joe Merrill (0-5) went the distance in the second game, getting the loss.

"Joe pitched well," said Coach Jim Briggs, "but he was hurt by too many baserunners." Amherst got the leadoff hitter on base every inning, and scored their four runs on eight singles.

Williams finishes their Little Three season at 2-4. Amherst is 3-1, Wesleyan is 2-2; they face each other in a doubleheader next week.

Every ball bounced their way as the Ephmen beat Middlebury last Wednesday. John Hennigan (3-1) went all nine innings for Williams to pick up the victory. He gave up four hits, four walks and struck out seven. Middlebury's only run came in the second inning on a couple of singles.

Breaks for Ephmen

Meanwhile Williams batters got every possible lucky break, with bobbies and bloop singles accounting for many of their runs. Senior Dave Calabro was the offensive star for the Ephmen, going four-for-four with two runs scored and an RBI.

Coakley also had a good day, going two-for-four with three RBIs. Senior co-captain Tom Howd was also two-for-four with three runs scored.

Middlebury's hard-luck day was exemplified by an appeal play in the eighth inning. Hoping to get Coakley out for leaving third too early on a sacrifice fly, pitcher Mike Maxwell threw a casual toss to third—which went over the third baseman's head. Eph baserunner Phil Lusardi went from first to second on the play.

Williams scored two runs in the third, but in the fifth inning they opened the deluge, scoring two, one, four, and three runs in the next four innings. In the fifth, two walks, a double steal, and a Brownell single scored the two runs.

In the sixth, Calabro singled, stole second, took third on a wild pitch, and scored on Brian Rutledge's '85 sacrifice fly. In the seventh, a bloop double, bloop single, infield single, two conventional singles, a steal and a sacrifice fly produced four runs.

AIC fiasco

But the Middlebury game was only making up for the bad luck the Ephmen encountered against AIC last Monday. The 16 run margin was not indicative of the relative talent, as some players claimed they could have had a reasonable score, if not a win, on a better day.

It was a game best forgotten—the less written the better.

Mark White '84 now leads the Ephmen in batting at .500 (24 for 48). Mike Coakley '85 is the team leader in RBIs, with White second. Hennigan's 3-1 record is the best on the team.

Williams A-side scrum-half Louise Hurd '85 tries to outflank her Amherst opponents during the 4-4 tie Saturday. The Ephwomen B-side defeated the Ledy Jeffs, 4-0. (Farley)

Laxmen downed in OT

After coming from behind to force an overtime, the men's lacrosse team fell to Amherst 11-10 Saturday. Earlier in the week, the laxmen received an 11-1 thumping from Middlebury. Williams' record is now 3-6.

In a game in which Amherst held the ball most of the time to control the tempo, the Ephs found themselves behind 6-3 at halftime. The Jeffs lead looked safe as they used their meticulous passing game to protect the ball and keep the game in the Williams end.

Eph comeback

Williams came back in the second half with seven goals. Sophomore midfielder Keith Haynes put the Purple and Gold ahead 10-9 in the fourth quarter, but Amherst scored with four minutes left in the game to deadlock the score at ten.

The overtime was brief, as Amherst took the face-off, moved the ball in their usual patient style and tallied the winner 1½ minutes into the period.

Davies shines

Sophomore Tom Davies upped his season total to a team-leading fifteen goals by netting four against the Lord Jeffs. Also scoring for Williams were senior captain Kennon Miller with two goals, and Junior Tim Curran, senior Jay Wheatly, and senior Dirk Ritenhouse with one apiece.

Ritenhouse played a fine game overall, particularly on face-offs where he had great success.

The 11-1 loss to Middlebury is best described by the score itself. Davies was the only Ephman to manage a tally against the powerful Panthers.

The team's last chance to up their 3-6 record comes tomorrow when they finish their season at home against Springfield.

Track fourth in NE Div. III

by Steve Serenska

Two school records were broken last Saturday as the track team rolled to an impressive fourth place finish in the Division III New England Track Championship.

The 400 meter relay team, staffed by Micah Taylor '82, Ted Leon '84, Charlie Von Arentschmidt '82, and Tomas Alejandro '83, blazed to a first place finish in 42.4 seconds while establishing the new Williams mark. In the 400 meter dash, Von Arentschmidt took a second place and also set an individual school record with a time of 48.7 seconds.

In the running events, Alejandro placed second in the 200 m with Von Arentschmidt taking third. The Williams relay team also placed third in the 1600 meters.

Williams was also well represented in the decathlon by John Campbell '84. In the two day event, Campbell placed a third.

Women in championship

Oarsmen flail at Vail

Reaching the climax and conclusion of their season, the men's and women's crew raced this weekend in the Dad Vail Regatta, the largest collegiate regatta in the world. Although the men were eliminated early, the women made a strong bid for the championship, but fell short in the final race.

The women clearly dominated their first heat on Friday, whipping past UNH and a host of others by five lengths. They also cruised to victory in the semi-finals on Saturday morning with a two-length lead over Navy, their closest competition.

Judging from the results of the other heats, Western Ontario was to be their stiffest competition. The finals were billed as a showdown between Williams and Western Ontario, a school of 18,000 students.

Women's championship

The championship provided a great letdown for the Ephwomen who had been building for that goal all season under Coach George Marcus. Chance stepped in to stop Williams as sophomore Hope Bigelow (featured in Record May 4) had a recent hernia flare up and cause her to row in pain. The injury cost the boat its usual rhythm and took Williams out of the race. Western Ontario cruised to the championship.

The men's heavyweight and lightweight varsity boats did not fare as well as the women. The heavyweights, stroked by junior Peter Detwiler, rowed the first half of the 2000 meter race at an unusually high rating (number of strokes per minute). The high rating put the boat in third place at the halfway point, but it also exhausted the crew, allowing the other crews to pass them by the finish.

The lightweights were also eliminated in their first heat as their relative lack of experience showed through.

Gold medalists

The big winners for Williams were the women's JV who garnered a gold medal by triumphing in the Women's Junior Varsity Eight division. The Ephwomen beat second place Navy by 1½ lengths. The gold medal winners were juniors Trish McHugh (coxswain), Martha Platt, Sara Newman, Carol West and Cary Gaunt, sophomores Allison Tucher (stroke), Leslie Pratch and Nica Faulkner, and freshman Ann Fetter.

The women's novice and men's freshmen heavyweights reached the semi-finals, but were eliminated there. The men's lightweight freshmen were eliminated in their first heat.

Peinert departing

Men's varsity coach John Peinert is leaving that position after serving for five years. In his five years as varsity coach, his crews won three Little Three heavyweight titles (which they'd never won before). He has also led the crew to impressive performances in the Dad Vail, including last year when the heavyweights went into the finals of the Vail and later went to the Henley Regatta in England. His successor has not yet been named.

Post-season races

Consisting mainly of seniors, the women's eight will mostly be lost to graduation. The seniors are captains Kippy Liddle (stroke) and Sue Smith, Janet Harmon, Kaja Kool, Sherry Johnson and Leslie Weckstein (coxswain). Completing the boat are sophomores Bigelow, Mara Bun, and Julie Woodward.

A combination boat consisting of people from the varsity, JV and novice boats will compete in the women's nationals in June at Lake Waramaug in Connecticut. Bun, Harmon, Kool and Johnson will enter the trials for the prestigious Henley Regatta in England this summer.

Two valedictorians

497 EARN DEGREES

The undergraduate career closed for the 497 members of the Williams class of 1982 as they received their Bachelor of Arts degrees this Sunday morning.

Today's commencement ceremony, Williams' 193rd, featured several guest, faculty, and student speakers including two valedictory addresses.

The commencement address by Dr. Lewis Thomas was entitled, "Things Unflattened by Science."

Beginnings of wisdom

Gerald Carney, elected class speaker, delivered an often amusing address entitled "Everything and Nothing." Carney explained to the Record what he was trying to impart to his listeners.

"The most important thing you should learn at Williams College is that there's a hell of a lot more of what you don't know than what you do know," he observed. "You should try to avoid the self-importance of thinking that, just because we are Bachelors of Arts, this means that we are wide-ranged, incredibly intelligent people. The beginning of wisdom is... to figure out what the question is, what you don't know." Carney concluded, "It's not just learning facts."

Mark Raffman and Richard Hirsch tied for valedictorian, so they both delivered speeches to the assembly.

Raffman entitled his speech, "Long Hours, Short Years." This message of the speech, according to Raffman, was that "our lives exist in a series of moments which are separate and distinct from each other and also exist in the sense of one long, continuous entity encompassing birth, growth, maturity, and then decline and death." He summarized, "It (the speech) deals with the philosophy of, 'How can I make the most of my life?' thinking about both ways in which time passes."

Bottle of tequila

The speech was a product of Raffman's night in a Michigan motel room, where he celebrated his birthday alone with his thoughts and a small bottle of tequila.

Co-valedictorian Hirsch entitled his speech "Dungeons, Librarians, and Windowshades," and dedicated it to the people who made his Williams experience enjoyable—parents, faculty, students, and campus staff.

Hirsch told of his inauspicious early contacts with Williams—the neighbors who thought Williams was "a Southern Bible college" and the first blizzard—and lamented his unfortunate room placement of later years. Yet Hirsch was happy: "Despite such discouraging moments, I believe that I found what I was looking for when I decided to attend Williams. Instead of a larger and more accessible institution," he concluded.

Howard Shapiro, elected Phi Beta Kappa speaker, delivered an address called, "Morality and the Useful Alumnus." As Shapiro explained it, "The point is that since all of our actions necessarily have moral implications,....it makes sense to act from moral principles to begin with." Shapiro concluded that the College has "an obligation to divest" of South African-related interests, and he further urged students to pressure the College to divest.

College President John Chandler

delivered the charge to the graduates, encouraging them to include in their lives "three fundamental ingredients...continued learning, relationships of love and trust, and useful work."

The class of '82 included a wide variety of honors and distinctions. Of the 497 students, seven graduated summa cum laude, with cumulative point averages of 10.5 or better. Fifty-one students graduated magna cum laude with cumulative averages between 9.8 and 10.4. There were 122 cum laude graduates, meeting the grade point average requirement of 9.0 through 9.7.

Thirty-five degrees with highest honors were conferred, and an additional sixty degrees with honors were awarded.

Yesterday's Baccalaureate service featured an address by the Right Reverend John B. Coburn, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts. Following the service, renowned Doonesbury cartoonist Garry Trudeau spoke to an assembly of parents and students.

Thirty-three master arts

Williams granted 33 Master of Arts degrees today in two of its special graduate programs and one unique instance.

In an unusual occurrence, Martha Asher of Williamstown was awarded a masters degree in English.

Twenty-three foreign students received Master of Arts degrees in development economics today after completing a year of advanced study as Fellow at the Williams Center for Development Economics.

The Center for Development Economics serves graduate students from throughout the world, who come here with professional experience in business or government to concentrate on the economics issues and problems unique to emerging nations.

Nine students who have completed a two-year program in the History of Art with the Williams College/Clark Art Institute master's program also received degrees. Graduates of the program usually go on to museum administrative or curatorial work, or continue their studies in doctoral programs.

The art history students are Wanda Bubriski, Maura Feeney, J. Minott Kerr, Paul Kozol, Sandra G. Ludig, Anne M. Reed, Nancy Sojka, Maureen Walsh, and John Wetenhall.

Development Economics graduates include Umaru Sunday Aliyu of Nigeria; Moses M.O. Beilo, Nigeria; Gil Sotelo Beltran, Philippines; Ullatli Sarat Chandran, India; Salma Chaudhuri, Bangladesh; Mohamed Ahmed Elbushra, Sudan; Fernando Flores Fernandez, Mexico; Maria Leonida M. Fres, Philippines; Stanley Mburu Gachau, Kenya; Flavian Hermann-Klnunda, Tanzania; Jackson Matibo Kitili, Kenya; and Blackie Marole, Botswana.

Also receiving degrees are Ahmed Mahmoud K. Nos'hy, Egypt; Ferdinand A. Oguntoye, Nigeria; Amabel Orraca-Tetteh, Ghana; Shella N. Patawaran, Philippines; Leticia Orozco de Rubio, Mexico; Indomen Saragih, Indonesia; and Patrick Nalobi Sinyinza, Zambia.

Wide range of pursuits

Nine garner honorary sheepskins

Nine men and women recognized for achievements ranging from urban planning to cartooning were handed honorary degrees by President John Chandler today.

Commencement speaker Lewis Thomas was awarded a Doctor of Science degree, while Episcopal Bishop John Coburn delivered the Baccalaureate sermon and received a Doctor of Divinity degree.

George Brockaway '36, chairman of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., book publishers, and Garry Trudeau, known for his award-winning comic strip, "Doonesbury," picked up Doctor of Letters degrees.

Doctor of Laws degrees went to Gregory R. Anrig, former commissioner of education for Massachusetts and current president of the Educational Testing Service in Princeton, N.J.; Jill Conway, President of Smith College; Gordon J. Davis '63, Commissioner of Parks for New York City; and James A. Linen '34, former President of Time, Inc. and retiring senior member of the Williams Board of Trustees.

A Doctor of Fine Arts degree was presented to Dorothy Canning Miller, former curator of the Museum Collections of the Museum of Modern Art in New York City.

Lewis Thomas, head of the Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City, has contributed to an extraordinary variety of activities related to medical teaching and research. He has served, often simultaneously, as physician, biologist, educator, and research administrator.

Thomas is best known to the public as author of The Lives of a Cell: Notes of a Biology Watcher, essays ranging from an examination of the biology of one-celled organisms to a discussion of the complex structure of human society. The book won the 1975 National Book Award in the Arts and Letters category.

John Coburn is the Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts and has been a frequent deputy to the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which meets every three years.

His concern with the needs of the economically and educationally disadvantaged led him to spend a year in 1968-69 teaching English to 9th graders in Harlem under the auspices of the Street Academics run by the Urban League in New York City.

George Brockaway can trace his literary interests back to his undergraduate years at Williams, where he edited a literary magazine and graduated with honors in English. He joined the editorial staff of W. W. Norton in 1942, was named President in 1958, and attained the chairmanship in 1976.

In a continuing program, he edits and publishes the posthumous papers of John William Miller, who taught philosophy at Williams for 35 years and influenced many generations of students.

Brockaway contributes a monthly column, "The Dismal Science," on broad aspects of political economy, to the New Leader. He is on the Board of Governors of the Yale University Press, and the Board of Directors of the Fund For Free Expression.

Trudeau's syndicated strip "Doonesbury" is a national favorite, with its wry observations on everything from the current political scene to college reunions.

In 1975, Trudeau became the only comic-strip artist ever to win a Pulitzer Prize for Editorial Cartooning. He received an Academy Award nomination and the Cannes Film Festival Special Jury Prize for his animated work, "A Doonesbury Special," first shown on television in 1977.

He has contributed articles to publications such as Rolling Stone and the New Republic. He has received 11 honorary degrees already.

Gregory Anrig's 20-year career in education began as a history teacher and Assistant to the Principal at a junior high school in New York. He lived in Williamstown from 1964-67 when he was the superintendent of the Mt. Greylock Regional School District. After three years in Washington, D.C., with the U.S. Office of Education, Anrig returned to Massachusetts to direct the Institute for Learning and Teaching at the University of Massachusetts in Boston, leaving that position to become Commissioner of Education for the Commonwealth from 1973-81. Last year he was appointed President of the Educational Testing Service.

A native of Australia, Jill Conway came to the United States for graduate work at the University of Toronto from 1964-75, and served as the Vice President of Internal affairs there for two years.

She was named President and Sophia Smith Professor at Smith College in 1975. Conway is the author of many articles on the history of education with particular focus on women and women's studies.

Gordon Davis first joined the New York City government in 1967, when he was appointed assistant to the Budget Director under mayor John Lindsay. In 1973 he assumed an eight-year term on the New York City Planning Commission. Mayor Edward Koch named Davis Commissioner of Parks and Recreation in January 1978, commending his wide experience in government and deep understanding of the issues confronting the park system in New York.

James Linen worked for Time, Inc., from his graduation from Williams in 1934 until 1977, with the exception of 30 months during the Second World War when he was in the Office of War Information. He was the publisher of Time magazine from 1945 to 1960, a period which saw its circulation double and its advertising revenues more than triple. He served as president of Time, Inc., from 1960-69, and retired from its board of directors in 1977, remaining active with the company as a consultant.

He served for three years as president of the National Urban League, and is a member of several international committees and panels. Since retiring from Time, Linen has started a new career as chairman of Linen, Fortinberry & Associates, Inc., an international consulting firm.

Dorothy Canning Miller retired as senior curator of the Museum of Modern Art in New York City in 1969 after serving there in various capacities for 35 years. She was regarded as one of the most important people in the art world in the '40's and '50's because of her ability to spot new talent and bring to the attention of a large audience the work of artists whose names are now familiar, but who at that time were all but unknown.

She travelled across the country looking for new acquisitions, and organized many exhibitions.

In 1969 she organized the first and only exhibition of Nelson Rockefeller's art collection. Since her retirement, Miller has been active as an art consultant.

The Williams Record

Gone, but not forgotten

Fred Rudolph

Frederick Rudolph, Mark Hopkins Professor of History and one of the country's leading authorities on the history and philosophy of higher education in America, will retire this June.

During his professional career, covering more than 30 years on the faculty, Rudolph has written extensively about the development of the college and university system in the United States, as well as on those factors which shape the direction of higher education. He has served frequently on national panels and commissions dealing with various aspects of higher education.

A 1942 graduate of Williams, Rudolph recently described himself as "A very unofficial keeper of the College's historical consciousness," a very modest appraisal of his painstaking research of the College's archives. In addition to teaching a course on the history of Williams, Rudolph has written a book about the Williams years under the presidency of Mark Hopkins, from 1836 to 1872, when, says Rudolph, "many of the directions of the 20th-century college were being set." This book, "Mark Hopkins and the Log," was a study originally undertaken by Rudolph as his doctoral dissertation at Yale.

Rudolph says that a major project after he officially retires from teaching will be to continue work on the history of Williams. "I intend to write about Williams from 1872 until 1961, the end of Phinney Baxter's presidency," says Rudolph. "This is a period in which Williams was definable as a small New England men's college, with an active fraternity system and homogeneous student body." "The period since 1961," he adds, "has seen the abolition of fraternities, the introduction of co-education, and the development of Williams into a 'national' institution which is larger, considerably more diverse, and more intellectually oriented."

Fred Rudolph

After graduating from Williams in 1942, Rudolph served in the Army until 1946, discharged with the rank of Captain. He returned to Williams as an instructor for a year before going to Yale where he earned his master's degree in 1949 and his Ph.D. in 1953. In 1949 he married Dorothy Dannenbaum. They have two children, Marta Rudolph MacDonald, and Lisa Rudolph Cushman.

He returned to Williams permanently in 1951, was promoted to professor in 1961 and was named Mark Hopkins Professor of History in 1964. Rudolph served as the Chairman of the American Civilization program from 1971-1980, and since 1978 has been College Marshal.

Ralph Townsend

Coach Ralph Townsend, director of the Outing Club and former Ski team coach, brings his 32 year Williams career to a close when he retires this June.

Townsend made himself a fixture of winter athletics at the College. Townsend was ski team coach from 1950 through 1972, heading teams that were consistently among the best in the East and top twelve in the nation. In 1975 Townsend was named to the National Ski Hall of Fame in recognition of his contributions to the sport, both as competitor and as a coach.

The Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Association recently awarded its highest honor, the Service Award, to Coach Townsend. Townsend is the first person ever given the Service Award, which is presented only when a deserving candidate arises, rather than annually.

Skiing is an integral part of Townsend's life. He was a four-event skiing star as a student at University of New Hampshire. Between his undergraduate years, Townsend served with the U.S. Army's famed 10th Mountain Division during World War II.

Townsend's major triumphs as a competitor include National Nordic Ski champion and Eastern Alpine champion in 1947 and a second National Nordic title in 1949. He also competed for the United States ski team in the 1948 Olympics at St. Moritz.

John Peinert

Usually one measures the mark someone has made at an institution by seeing how long that person was there. That's because it usually takes a long time to make an important contribution to a program.

But John Peinert, departing men's varsity crew coach, has left an indelible mark on the Williams College crew program in his brief but busy five year stint as coach. Before Peinert's arrival, the Ephemen had never won the Little Three men's heavyweight title, but under his leadership Williams took three of five championships.

Overall Peinert was 8-3 in Little Three competition over his five years as varsity coach and one year as frosh mentor. His teams won over 70% of their races against the toughest small college competition in the Northeast. He coached the Lightweight boat to a silver medal in the Dad Vail, and last year's heavyweights to the quarterfinals of the Lady's Plate at the Henley Regatta in England.

Peinert's accomplishment was turning the Williams crew around from being a bunch of nobodies that the College didn't know or care about to being a bunch of nobodies that the College didn't know or care about but who expected to win.

Winning means a lot to Peinert, and he doesn't think little things Custodian Joe King, a fixture at Baxter Hall since he first came to the College in August, 1978, has left Williams. He currently has no future plans and says he will "play it by ear from here." We will sorely miss his presence in Baxter, and we wish him the best of luck in his new endeavor.

The Year in Review

by Eric Schmitt

SEPTEMBER

School opened in early September with students returning to find elements of the dreaded Gifford Report already implemented. Row House dining had been eliminated over the summer, along with the Thursday night guest meals. The College also used the summer to install a new computerized I.D. system which promised to pay for itself in two to ten years, depending on who you talked to.

Congressman Morris Udall focused on "Energy, Environment, and Economics for the 1980's" in the keynote address of the 1981 convocation. Udall was one of seven local and national authorities on energy who received honorary degrees from Williams as a part of the ceremonies.

Controversy flared as a Greylock party was shut down by intrepid agents of the College Security staff led by the College's own Dean Daniel O'Connor. O'Connor subsequently apologized and negotiated a cash settlement with the houses sponsoring the party.

Another blow to returning students was the discovery of the theft of more than $1000 in stereo equipment from a storage area in the basement of Morgan Hall. Although students had stored belongings in the storage room under the assumption that it would remain locked, Norman Tremblay, a Morgan custodian, said that the room "was open all summer to do rewiring . . . anyone could have got in there." A rash of stereo thefts from dorms all over campus occurred during the summer months.

Oarswoman Sue Tuttle '78 took a bronze medal in the 1981 World Rowing Championships which were held in Munich. Tuttle was the third Williams oarswoman to row on a U.S. national team.

As students returned to classes, work on the new art complex continued, although projected cost overruns threatened the completion of the full renovation. In cost-cutting moves, more than 2,000 square feet were cut from the original plan and a $700,000 renovation of the existing structure of Lawrence Hall was shelved.

OCTOBER

Williams gained the status of a minor world power when it signed a formal agreement with the nation of Botswana to provide assistance in recruiting specialists in economic and political affairs. Professor Steve Lewis was named to lead the College's half of the new program.

The Winter Study Review Committee began formal meetings with faculty members to discuss the educational value of Winter Study. The meetings, which lasted through January, were characterized by general support for the principles of Winter Study but real concerns for the current implementation of the Winter Study system.

Stone Hill made the news as sixty acres of land on the hill were put up organization banquets. The issue was initially raised in a Record investigation of College Council spending which revealed that more than one quarter of the Council's $2,000 budget was spent in violation of Council funding guidelines. Highlights of the spending ing included two dinners attended solely by the four Council officers at Mill on the Floss, with an average tab of $40 per person per meal. Council officers explained the banquets as "traditional." Similarly, the Record was discovered to have treated 26 staff members to its own year end fling at the River House for a more modest $10 per person. The College Council quickly cut $260 from the Record budget. The Council then declared its own budget to be "discretionary."

The Housing Committee sought, with CUL approval, to merge West with Spencer and Woodbridge houses in what proved to be an unpopular move with students affected by the change. At an open Housing Committee meeting, students protested the change and the action was eventually withdrawn. West was subsequently merged with Spencer and Brooks.

The football team suffered through the 1981 season as it lost to an Amherst team that won its first Little Three championships since 1968. The Ephs finished 3-5 for the season.

Two assaults on female students occurred in rapid succession, sparking one of the year's major issues—sexual harassment.

Several students protested on-campus recruiting sessions of the CIA. Protesters charged that by allowing the visit, the College was implicitly condoning CIA activities.

Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes kicked off Homecoming Weekend with an electrifying concert in Towne Field House. Williamstheatre's production of Twelfth Night drew rave reviews.

DECEMBER

On December 6, Dean O'Connor announced that he had expelled the male student involved in the first of the sexual assault incidents revealed in November. After a four and a half hour meeting however, the College Discipline Committee overturned the decision and a new penalty was determined. This reversal was unpopular with some students who asked for stricter action in such cases.

Eight out of eleven professors eligible for tenure received the coveted nod. The tenure decisions resulted in the complete tenuring of the Spanish and classics departments, but ruined hopes of making anthropology a full department next year.

JANUARY

For the second time in two months, the Honor and Discipline Committee overturned the Dean's expulsion of a student involved in a sexual harassment case. According to two witnesses of the proceedings, the committee met the week before Christmas break, found the defendant guilty and suspended him for one year. The defendant appealed though, and the punishment was adjusted to permanent probation.

Concern over the issue of sexual harassment led to a campus-wide meeting in Chapin Hall. Three professors and three students presented statements on sexual harassment before some 800 students and faculty. President John Chandler authorized Dean O'Connor to judge all cases of sexual harassment, and suspended the right to appeal to the Discipline Committee. The authorization continued pending a faculty study of the Honor and Discipline Committee and its procedures.

FEBRUARY

The Winter Study Committee released its long-awaited interim report which outlined two proposals that would revise the January term. Proposal A provided for freshman seminars, sophomore and junior electives and senior project. Proposal B offered an alternative two-semester calendar in the event the faculty decided to abolish Winter Study completely.

Heavy snowfall blessed Winter Carnival for the first time in recent memory. Despite some near-crippling vandalism, A-Garwood's rendition of Humpty-Dumpty took first place among several strong entries in the snow sculpture contest.

Director of Admissions Phil Smith found himself embroiled in the sexual harassment issue when an alumni newsletter, sent out to several hundred alumni admissions contacts, significantly downplayed the campus controversy. Smith explained that he was only trying to put the issue into "an understandable context for alumni of a different generation . . ."

The Record withheld its usual endorsements for College Council officers, criticizing the candidates for a lack of specific campaign proposals.

Ross Keller, after six years as Food Services director, announced he was leaving Williams in May to manage an inn on the coast of Maine.

Keller, who oversaw the closing of Row House dining facilities and brought several innovations to Food Services at Williams, was succeeded by Assistant Director Jim Hodgkins.

MARCH

that tuition and fees for the 1982-83 academic year would rise to $10,731. Adding to this grim news for students and their parents was the announcement that the College would suffer a 35 percent cut in federal aid as a result of reductions in student loans and grant programs proposed by the Reagan Administration.

Stuart "Smokey" Robinson and Jay Ward were elected College Council president and vice-president, respectively. Patricia Chaplin and John Small ran unopposed for the offices of secretary and treasurer, respectively.

Williams prep survived a serious scare. The House of Walsh, a Williamstown clothier for over half a century, was purchased by two entrepreneurs when it appeared the store was on the verge of bankruptcy.

A record 320 students applied for house transfers, fanning the flames of debate that the residential housing system was inadequate.

quate. Housing Committee meetings would focus on whether an individual's right to switch houses was greater than residential house unity.

No one moved from Vincent Price's lectures as the famous actor captivated the College community for two days with dramatic addresses injected with impromptu performances.

In March the College sponsored one sports championship and feted another. The best men's collegiate squash players in the U.S. and Canada met in Laseil Gym. Harvard captured top team honors with the Ephmen finishing sixth. The women's swim team crowned an undefeated season with the NCAA Division III championship. The title, the first won by a women's team, was the first national championship for a Williams team since 1958.

beefed-up academic format of freshman seminars, sophomore and junior electives and senior projects, would go into effect for the 1983-84 school year. Outgoing College Council president Freddy Nathan, Winter Study's most effective lobbyist, celebrated with champagne after the vote.

The shroud of the sexual harassment issue still hung over the campus. A woman student thwarted the attempts of an unidentified man to force her into his car. The incident was linked to the disappearance that same evening of a Florida, Massachusetts woman.

Williamstheatre presented a delightful production of Noel Coward's comedy Hay Fever. Reggae rocked the venerable walls of Chapin Hall when Toots and the Maytals brought the forefront of Jamaican reggae to the Berkshires.

Splashing to its best finish in a national meet, the men's swim team placed second at the NCAA Division III national championships.

MAY

Construction crews flooded Williamstown after official groundbreaking ceremonies for additions to the Faculty Club and the Adams Memorial Theatre. Construction also continued on the College's third ongoing project—the College Art Museum's addition.

Peter Welanetz, the "Robert Moses of Williams," announced he would retire as director of the physical plant in December. Welanetz, who has been director since 1951, has personally supervised the construction of more than one-third of all Williams buildings.

After much controversy, the CUL approved a French House proposal to set aside a co-op house for juniors and seniors who desire to speak French in an intensive, dormitory setting. The French department will screen all applicants, who will be allowed to live in the house only one year.

Dr. Lewis Thomas, director of the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City, addressed the 193rd graduating class. Thomas's The Lives of a Cell won a National Book Award in 1975. Bishop John Coburn of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts delivered the Baccalaureate.

Foundations honor Ephs Watson

Senior Eban Goodstein was awarded a Thomas J. Watson Fellowship for study abroad this spring.

Chosen from 180 nominations submitted by 40 colleges, Goodstein will receive $10,000 for a year of work as a volunteer for geological surveys in Botswana, Zambia and Zimbabwe in order to study mineral resource development there.

Truman

Sophomore Allison Tucher has become the first Williams College student ever to receive a Harry S. Truman Scholarship. Tucher, an economics major, will receive $5,000 annually toward her college expenses for her junior and senior years and for up to two years of graduate study.

The Truman Scholarship Program was established by Congress in 1975, and is awarded to students nominated by their colleges or universities, on the basis of academic performance and potential for leadership in government service.

Poetry

Seniors Susan Edwards and Rilkka Melartin were chosen co-winners of the Academy of American Poets Contest at Williams this month.

English majors Edwards and Melartin both completed honors theses in original poetry this year.

The Annual contest recognizes the best poem or group of poems submitted by an undergraduate. Judged this year by Phillip Levine, author of several volumes of poetry including "Seven Years from Somewhere," "Ashes," and "The Names of the Lost."

The competitions, held at over 115 colleges, are judged locally by poets of national prominence—often those who have been resident or visiting poets at the schools.

should stop the Williams crew. And there are "little" things which the crew has to put up with: being a club instead of a varsity sport and competing against varsity teams at other schools; driving an hour each way to and from practice while their lake is frozen through mid-April; sharing limited facilities across the men's, women's and freshmen programs; and raising much of their own money.

But Williams, oarsmen never focused on these circumstances because Peinert always moved ahead with such unquestioned determination that the crew just followed behind and learned to look for advantages instead adversity.

Original oarsmen

Peinert knew the athlete's point of view at Williams because he was on the first crew at the sport's inception here in 1968. The crew then was terrible because, as Peinert put it, they expected to be terrible. Things have changed since then with silver medal boats in 1976 and 1979 and trips to the finals of the Vail virtually every year.

Peinert plans to attend some Williams races next year and his influence will still be strongly felt by all those who rowed under him. His motivations, aspirations, and determination will be a part of Williams crew for a long time.

Wet and wild year for Ephs at play

by Dan Keating

When I think back on the whole thing, this year stands out as an awfully wet one in Williams sports. Though certainly not all the wetness was awful.

From the water dripping off the bathing caps of our national champion women's swimming team to the water rolling off the shaved heads of the second in the nation men's swimmers.

NO KEATING

From the fluid in John Lawler's knee which he battled all season to overcome to the frost on Dan Flynn's pads after the last game at North Adams.

Senior John Lawler, always a battler, struggles for the extra yard that the Ephs needed this season.

From the tears of the women's crew after their dream of being champions crumpled in their final race to the beer that flowed from the ruggers cups and won them $2000.

From our almost snowed-out Spring to the rain-soaked Saturdays we had this fall.

From the blood pouring from Barb Riefler's eye which couldn't make her quit in her squash match world—just because you don't get many chances to take on the best. She didn't win, but everyone came away from the women's squash nationals admiring the gutsy, never-say-die kid from Williams.

From the soggy gloves you get during a night of great traying to the ever-present sweat the wrestlers squeeze out to make weight.

From the ice lovingly dispensed by Gary (Guerlin) and Ron (Stant) in the training room to the show ungraciously dumped on us by Mother (Nature).

We had a fumble-fingered football team, two soccer teams that had trouble scoring, an undermanned but never outmanned wrestling squad and a sophomore-packed squash team which raised Williams to a high peak in national against the best woman in the rankings (with great hope for the future).

We had a hot and cold men's hoop team, a men's cross country team that won all its races but lost its bear, two volleyball teams which rolled all over New England and a mile relay team which similarly dominated New England but couldn't showcase their stuff anywhere else because of a NESCAC ban.

We had a tennis team which started off like a ball of fire, a women's cross country which sent two women to the nationals, and the best looking women's tennis team in the area, according to its coach!

We had medieval-style battles in the science quad and fewer dog fights.

And last of all, but certainly not least, we had the athletes who never got mentioned in flashy

"We have Dr. Ellison who has fixed more joints than Bob Marley."

We had Terry and Anne, the Dancewicz twins: the best pair for Williams sports since the invention of the sneaker.

We had Crawford Lyons coming back from a knee injury and leading the Eph skiers in their own Carnival on only his second day back on skis.

We had Micah Taylor catching and running (Fall), jumping and running (Winter), and triple jumping and running (Spring).

We have Dr. Ellison who has fixed more joints than Bob Marley.

We had senior Steve Doherty, who got so psyched at the beginning of football games that his eyes bulged out so much he looked "like a squashed-on toad."

Running coach Peter Farwell ran in the Boston Marathon, Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin had her first baby—Seth, and Carmen Palladino made his debut as a fight announcer.

We have Joe Sanlga and Art St. Pierre in their outpost in the basement of the gym keeping everyone equipped and happy.

We had the Mission Olympics, the Superteams, Miller 2-on-2, Intramural everything (Garfield captured the final house championship), broomball, Sunday Night Basketball and an all-college tug-of-war.

We had a basketball game against a group of traveling Yugoslavians and a swim meet by telephone against a California college; not to mention the national squash Intercollegiate championships right here in Lasell.

headlines, lead paragraphs or even dangling participles. But they were there, being the foundation that the Williams student-athlete system is built on. The people like Barry Craig, Joe Daignault, Missy Hunger, Rick Versace, Carol Sutton, Marc Rubin, Greg Narver and Kenwyn Fuller. This list is only a fraction of the real number of athletes who stuck it out and gave their all without the benefit of glory and stardom.

Although we seldom, if ever, hear about these athletes, we all appreciate them. But since it wasn't our appreciation that they were playing for anyway, they've already received what they sought most—the satisfaction and joy of just playing.

This collection isn't nearly a comprehensive review of this year's sports; it's some of the outcroppings, peaks and plateaus on the mountain ascended by Williams athletes this year. Anyone who doesn't know the success and fun of Williams sports probably also doesn't believe in purple cows.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1982

Let me tell you . . .

Well. You're in for it.

The madness of the next few days is comfortable and familiar to us. It's thrilling but sometimes frightening to you freshmen. You'll be dressed up, shuttled around, dragged to parties and lectures, and advised about all aspects of Williams life. You'll be told and shown how to act, what to avoid, and where to go by always friendly, occasionally misguided people who are eager to help you out. Stay loose, don't believe everything, don't rush into anything. But avoid doing nothing. Plunge into college life with joy and curiosity and spirit . . . it's a happy, wonderful experience. Treat the next year as an experiment.

Try new lifestyles, new subjects, new sports. Be an individual—don't be afraid to appear silly; instead, be eager to appear unique. Don't worry about grades, either. You may not get the grades you got in high school, but none of us do. It's OK. If you work hard, you'll do well. And if you study what interests you instead of what you think is "good" for you, you will work hard because you are enjoying it.

But don't try to go it alone. Your JAs and entymates can become your closest friends, and their aid and companionship is essential. Your professors and the administrators are always friendly and willing to help, too.

Finally, rely on the gems of information contained in this booklet. We're trying to give you a handle on Williamstown—where to go for sheets and suntans, where to go for a 3 a.m. snack or a Parents' Weekend feast, and where to go to get out of this place.

Williamstown Treasures

Little things we've discovered over three years here. We thought everybody knew about them, but a disturbing number of friends have graduated without having done, or seen, most of them. So we'll give you a head start on what to look for:

- Ice Cream Cones at the Tash Store. The two Tash sisters, each about four feet tall, have been running the place for sixty years, and haven't changed a single thing for the last fifty-nine. Wonderful old posters, old cabinets, old flooring, and old people. It can take twenty minutes for Fanny to scoop out your ice cream, but you'll get a fascinating conversation in the meantime and the huge cone is well worth the wait and the thirty-five cents. On Water Street.

Williamstown has a lot of colorful people.

The pastoral landscape of Stone Hill.

- A walk along Deer Ridge. You'll be trespassing, but during the foliage season nothing is more beautiful than a stroll along this grassy lane in the woods. And you may see a white-tailed buck bounding through a field on the Mount Hope Farm.

- College tiljinks. Sure, you're not supposed to go steam tunnelling, or break into the pool for 3 a.m. skinny-dipping, or enjoy throwing buckets of water on Sage F, or test your strength at cow-tipping, but you only live once. Just be careful and make sure you're reasonably sober.

- The Green Mountain Racetrack. No, it used to be horses like a normal track but now it's dogs, which necessitated a few interesting changes in physical plant. You won't believe you're watching dogs run, but it's a great time. In Pownal past the soon-to-be familiar adult book store.

- Picnicking on Stone Hill. Walk up the hill behind the Clark and you'll vaguely think you're in Scotland or something. The view of the Village Beautiful is so nice it's a cliché. Eat some bread and cheese and wine and fruit, another cliché. Then go to the back left corner of the field to pick up the old High road to the south. It wanders around forests, fields, and hilltops. Watch out for the cows, however; one of them is a bull who likes to chase people.

- The Center for Development Economics. Williams' most beautiful residential house belongs to a fun bunch of foreign economics grad students who love visitors and information about the College. Drop in some day to marvel at the panelling, furniture and huge rooms. You may wind up in a fascinating conversation with a Somalian.

- Climbing a Mountain. An easy one at least, like Pine Cobble. Or drive if you must, up Greylock. But do it. What'd ya come up here for anyway?

- The Clark Art Museum. For God's sake, get over there. It's wonderful, especially on beautiful mornings, and you'd be surprised how four years can pass. Go frequently and buy their classy notecards, which will impress your mother.

- Phillips General Store. A real store, not for the tourists. If you can't find it anywhere, they've got one squirreled away somewhere. Penny candy, creaky wooden floors, and crusty New England service.

- The Williamstown Public Library. A big white house with lots of books Sawyer won't have—like travel guides, cookbooks, and trashy novels. The reading room is like your grandmother's living room and for some reason features twenty-six issues of Oklahoma Today Magazine.

The Tash store twenty years ago. Go in today and see the identical scene.

Getting Out Again: A Travel Guide

You can go in style . . .

Thoreau was referring to Williams when he said, "It would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain." It would be an even greater advantage if a train station, bus depot, or airport were located here. As it is, finding transportation into and out of Williamstown can be as challenging as getting an A from Kurt Tauber.

Buses provide the most reliable means of escape. Five buses leave the Williams Inn daily for Boston, the first at 6:15 a.m. and the last at 5:15 p.m. The ride takes about 3½ hours. The infamous New York-via-Pittsfield-and-every-small-town-along-the-way bus sets off at 7:35 every morning and arrives at the Port Authority terminal 5½ hours later. An extra run at 11:55 a.m. is added on the weekends. More information about schedules, fares, and routes is available at the Williams Inn (458-9371). The bus stop is right outside the Inn.

Ugly orange buses

The county bus system (those ugly orange buses with big B's on the sides) provides hourly service to North Adams. Buses leave the Williams Inn starting at 6:30 a.m. (8:30 on weekends) and can be boarded in front of the gym on Spring Street. Why would anyone want to go to North Adams, you may ask? Well, it only costs 70¢, and North Adams was once named one of the 10 most beautiful small cities in America. It has a very high teenage pregnancy rate, and the only arcade in the area is located there. Besides, you can catch a bus to Pittsfield at 7 after every hour.

Pittsfield is much like North Adams, except bigger and uglier. Pittsfield also has a train station (actually a large plexiglass telephone booth) with connections to Boston at 11:20 a.m. and Chicago at 8:15 p.m. The Chicago train stops in Worcester, Cleveland, and Buffalo, among other places.

Albany also offers railroad access, most notably 7 trains each weekday to Grand Central Station in New York. For more train information, call Amtrak: 800-523-5720. Albany also has the airport of preference for Williams students. The Travel Store on Spring Street can help with rail and air tickets and information.

No cars allowed

The easiest way to travel is by car. If you own one, you're in luck. Well, almost. As a first semester freshman, you're not supposed to be driving one, so you can either put it in storage or hide it from the authorities. Thereafter, you must pay a $55 registration fee each year to Security and park in an assigned lot—in the case of freshmen, behind the tennis courts.

If you're daring, the best way to conceal an illegal/unregistered car is to talk a faculty or staff member into giving or selling you their parking sticker, which will let you park anywhere you please. The second best method is to park the car off-campus (easier than you may think—church parking lots are empty six days a week.)

Cars not registered, or parked illegally, face fairly substantial fines if found by a Security officer, who seem to spend most of their time patrolling the parking lots.

Car connections

If you don't have a car, you can often find one that's going your way with a little effort. Informal contacts are often the most fruitful. Ask JA's, friends of JA's, and any other upperclassmen you know about people with room to spare in their cars. Remember that guy from your high school who told you to look him up sometime when you got here? Don't forget fellow freshmen—their cars can come out of storage on breaks.

The ride board in Baxter fills up with "rides wanted" around vacations. Post a notice (the more creative the better) and keep your fingers crossed. WCFM broadcasts a ride board with both offers and needs, as does WJJW, the North Adams State College station. WJJW's board usually has rides to the Boston area offered every weekend, and they play better music than CFM.

With a little planning, you should be able to get to just about any place you want during your four years here. But after paying $10,000+ to get here, who wants to leave?

. . . or on the ugly bus.

Some Important Faces

Dean O'Connor

Dean Daniel O'Connor is the Administration's point man for campus crises. As Dean of the College, he is responsible for the day-to-day operation of the College and supervision of student life. Students usually call him "Dean Dan," but not to his face, please. O'Connor's pet crusade is to combat grade inflation, which is something like what happens to our tuition each year, only not so drastically. O'Connor had little time for personal crusading last year as he walked the difficult line between student concerns and Administration policy. O'Connor is a philosophy professor, but fortunately he doesn't talk like one.

Dean O'Connor in the days when he fought ballooning grades.

The President will look more serious when you shake hands with him this week.

President Chandler

President Chandler is a highly visible college president. One can usually see him commuting to and from the office, watching football and basketball games, and at graduation. The President's job is to lead faculty meetings, explain what's going on when the Trustees visit the College, and pump alums for money. President Chandler holds degrees from Wake Forest and Duke—you would never guess his Southern background by looking at him, but Mrs. Chandler's accent gives it away. Chandler was a member of the College classics department from 1955 to 1968. He left the College for five years, but before long his heart pined for the Purple Valley. The offer to become College president might have made his choice a little easier.

Dean Oakley presides over the unruly bunch below.

Dean Oakley

Dean of the Faculty Oakley oversees tenure decisions and faculty hiring, and represents faculty opinion to the administration. He also teaches Medieval History, and you can find his name on the check-out card of many an obscure, heavy tome in the Library. The man himself is not obscure, however; while his Dean's Office duties bring him little contact with students, you can easily distinguish him from other professors by his wonderful Oxford accent.

Some of the happy folks who'll be teaching you this year.

Dean Roosenraad

Roosenraad is the radical in the Dean's Office. He hung around with Tom Hayden at Wisconsin and was one of the early members of what became the SDS. Much later he gained notoriety for expelling dogs from the Williams Campus. Nowadays he deals with much less serious issues as Dean of Freshmen.

Though he frowns on waterfights and boys-will-be-boys vandalism, Roosenraad is very friendly and understanding. Better yet, he gives extensions easily.

A friendly face: Dean of Fresh Roosenraad

The Recorded History of Williams College

In the early 1750s, British Army Colonel Ephraim Williams Jr. bequeathed several thousand dollars to establish a free school in West Hoosuck, Massachusetts. The result was today's elite and expensive Williams College in Williamstown. How did we get from there to here?

Col. Ephraim Williams held a series of commands in colonial Massachusetts, although in his day they spelled it "Maffachusetts"—King George had a speech impediment, but no one dared embarrass him, so they changed the language. The colonel held a series of commands because he managed to lose forts as often as he was assigned to them. Williams met his end in an Indian ambush near Lake George, New York in 1755.

Williams' will provided money to establish a boys' free school in West Hoosuck, but only on the condition that they change the town's name to Williamstown. With a name like

West Hoosuck, one would imagine that the folks would jump at the chance. The town dragged its heels though, finally agreeing to the change in 1765 (and Mr. Bronfman settled for a mere science building?)

A series of legal disputes stood between the dream of a school and its realization. It took over two decades to decide whether Williamstown was in New York or Massachusetts. The struggle was resolved when some crafty Williamstown lawyers put up a sign ten miles to the west that read, "Welcome to New York—Hugh Carey, Governor."

By the time the trustees were ready to build the school in 1785, they learned that Williams' accumulated estate of $9157 would not cover the cost. They held a lottery to raise the remaining funds. Construction on West College finally began in 1790. The College's first building still stands on its original site, and some West College residents maintain that nothing has been changed in two hundred years.

Another judicial stumbling block was thrown by Harvard College. Harvard insisted that it was the only college the state needed. Williams won in court, but Harvard clings to the idea to this day. Litigation completed, the Williams free school officially became Williams College in June of 1793.

The College held its first commencement exercises in September of 1795 with a graduating class of four. Two became doctors and two became lawyers, setting the tone for nearly two centuries of Williams graduates.

The trustees of the late 18th century called for a curriculum that included three foreign languages, mensurations, conic sections, navigation, civil polity, surveying, and arithmetic. They threw in the arithmetic for students seeking an easy way out of Division III.

The College had a troublesome start, with most of its problems stemming from the isolation of Williamstown. Faculty were disappointed by the "country bumpkins" that were attracted to Williams. The College was continually in need of money. To resolve its problems, the trustees tried to move the college to a more convenient location, but the request to move was denied by the Massachusetts government (King George was dead by then, so the "g" came back into the alphabet).

Frustrated by the state's decision, Williams' second president, Zephaniah Swift Moore, scurried to the Connecticut River Valley in 1821, taking a number of faint-hearted students and faculty with him. They founded Amherst College, named after a British Lord whose most notable achievement was to wipe out an entire Indian tribe by giving them smallpox-infested blankets. The Williams-Amherst rivalry has endured as one of the nation's oldest college rivalries, although respectable Williams students deny any association with the Lord Jeffs.

The list of Williams alums does not contain many commonly recognized names. One of our better-known graduates is President James A. Garfield, who was assassinated minutes before boarding a train headed for a Williams reunion. Another well-known alum is George Steinhilber, owner of the New York Yankees. Some people have been heard to suggest that Steinhilber should be shot and that Garfield buy the Yankees.

Benchmarks in recent Williams history are the banning of fraternities and the switch to coeducation. In the early 1960s many faculty and students decided that there was too much drinking and carousing at Williams, so they tossed out the fraternities. A few years later, when the campus was deemed safe for women, coeducation was introduced. Then the new women students formed the Women's Rugby Team, and we were back where we started.

Amherst was founded by Williams' second President, who decided that a college could not survive in the Berkshire wilds. Every year we prove on the playing fields that we're doing quite well, thank you.

Batson used to be the library. While the reference room was nice, students who see the old stacks breathe a sigh of relief and thank the Trustees for Sawyer Library.

Where to eat in the town

BERNARDY'S—Adventure across from the wire plant. We walked in, noticed that steak goes for $1.90. Saw that two of the three customers were about to have a fist fight. The bartender was huge and not particularly friendly. We left.

BETTE'S—Closes at three p.m., when most Ephs are waking up. Students are never seen in here, but the pancakes are good, the atmosphere is nice, and patrons get a great view of Spring Street.

BURGER KING—Not only is Joe King down there now, but it's open until three a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays. Grab yourself a paper Burger King crown and try the circular slide in the restaurant's playground. Withn walking distance on Route Two, near the all-night Grand Union.

COLONIAL PIZZA—Cool people call it Constantine's. Real cool people don't talk about it at all. Awful pizza, but amazing things happen around 2:30 in the morning. Juke box has Greek folk songs and, for Christmas, singing dogs.

LIBRARY VENDING MACHINES—The weekday social center of the campus. Convenient to the main bathrooms, and open until 1 a.m. Terrible coffee, terrible sandwiches, overpriced candy.

THE LOG—Get there early for superior Alpha Pizza pie 'za—before they run out of things like crust. Beer and all the accessories.

PAPA CHARLIE'S DELI—Expensive, but the only good sandwiches on Spring Street. Huge variety, Haagen-Dazs, and newspapers while you wait.

PURPLE PUB—Upper classmen like to think of this as their turf, but frosh can often get in. See if there is a guy sitting next to the door, checking IDs. Good lunches.

SNACK BAR—Baxter burgers with a twist—they're good. The grilled honeybun with ice cream is a campus classic. So is everything else. The big library social crowd gets there at 11:00 every night.

Out of Town

BOSTON FISH MARKET—Near to Napolitano's in North Adams. Family restaurant atmosphere. Good, really cheap fish. They give you plastic forks and knives, so bring your own.

COZY CORNERS—Legendary. Good spaghetti, cheap pizza, good cheap drinks. Go with a crowd. Five minutes drive north on Route 7.

DUNKIN' DONUTS—On Route 2 in North Adams. Great as entry snacks. Call ahead for big orders.

GOLD COIN—At last, a Chinese carryout! The place can't be beat for good inexpensive food, and lots of it. On Route 2 across from Zayre's.

LA COCINA—Those who know Mexican food say it's lousy. Those who don't say, "who cares?" The only reasonably priced place decent enough for a date. Bring IDs to buy sangria.

LUAU HALE—This is someplace special. On Route 7 south of Pittsfield, but well worth the trip, especially with a crowd. Amazing drinks with unbrellas in them. Get trashed and marvel at the Polynesian wall murals. And order the PuPu Platter.

NAPOLITANO'S—Best local pizza. Now has sit-down dining too. Go behind K-Mart in North Adams and look around for it.

Check from home

BRITISH MAID—English country house atmosphere w/English country cuisine. The most reasonably priced nice restaurant in town. Live band at the upstairs bar.

LE COUNTRY RESTAURANT—Varied menu of good but overpriced food. Service is slow. Behind Greylock quad on Route 7.

RIVER HOUSE—The place that everyone goes to. Pleasant atmosphere, good daiquiris. Specializes in meat and shellfish dishes. A civilized late-night alternative to the Pub and the Log. Call ahead for reservations.

WILLIAMS INN—Well suited for grandparents—you'll see plenty of them during leaf season. Overpriced drinks, decent food.

We extend a warm welcome to the incoming Freshmen and to the returning upperclassmen of WILLIAMS COLLEGE.

The Eph Shopping Guide

Furniture—Most freshmen arrive in their spacious suites and are pleasantly surprised to find couches, rugs, and tables already in place. Unfortunately, they probably belong to someone else, and if you have not been hit already, you probably will return to the entry one day to find your suite stripped to the bare walls. Refurnishing can be painful.

Most people get furniture by haggling with upperclassmen over some decrepit sofas, chairs, and tables. As a general rule, offer half of the asking price and settle for a little more.

A decent couch should go for about $30. Chair prices vary depending on the amount of padding—the less bare wood, the higher the price. If you can get out to Pittsfield, you can try the Salvation Army. One need not worry about being gypped there.

For freshmen whose parents are bankrolling the decoration, there is Hopkins furniture on Spring Street. This is the new stuff, not what you see thrown out of freshman quad windows. Hopkins also sells lamps, kitchen appliances, and other household accessories.

Hardware and Lumber—For do-it-yourself freshmen, there is Taconic Lumber and Hardware and Phillips' General Store, both on Water Street. A wide variety of tools, paints, etc. are there within walking distance of the campus.

A popular shelving idea is using brick and board shelves. Red bricks and pine boards (stain them if you are ambitious) make attractive and very sturdy storage units, especially good for stereo equipment.

Banks—Weighing the advantages of the checking accounts offered by the three local banks could occupy most of your Freshman Days, what with check charges, minimum balances, and NOW accounts to consider. Williamstown Savings' NOW account has no check charge and requires a $10 minimum deposit if you want interest. Customers of the First Agricultural Bank and the Williamstown National Bank often complain of the high minimum balance needed to get free checking. The First Aggie does have the longest bank hours in town, however, while the National offers big books of matches. The Savings Bank has matches and lollipops. The First Aggie gives away free key chains for opening an account, so you might want to open one there and move it elsewhere after a respectable time has passed.

Records and Tapes—The Record Store in "Eph's Alley", around the corner from the First Aggie Bank, is the place to go for speaker wire, jacks, and other stereo set-up accessories. The Record Store also has albums, tapes, and a disorganized cut-out bin.

Toonerville Trolley Records, on Water Street next to the River House restaurant, has an outstanding selection of new and used albums (great bargains in the used section). Cut-outs are well-organized. Hal, the owner, is a walking encyclopedia of album information.

Food—One can accommodate any palate in Williamstown, all within walking distance of the campus. Check out the cheese selection at the Slippery Banana on Spring Street. They have lots of foreign-looking crackers for your foreign-looking cheeses, and plenty of fresh fruit and vegetables. They still carry a lot of "health food", but it would be unfair to call it just a health food store.

For cheap eats and 4:00 a.m. hunger spasms, the Grand Union on Route 2 is open 24 hours a day except Sundays. Whether you need food or not, you have to try the Tash store on Water Street (see Williamstown Treasures, p 2).

Liquor—"I thought they'd never get to it," you were saying to yourself. The Massachusetts drinking prohibition for anyone under twenty is a problem, but not insurmountable.

King's Liquor on Spring Street and the Spirit Shop on Cole Avenue are the most common local purveyors of spirits. King's stocks a wide variety of beers and hard liquor. The Spirit Shop is good for kegs and party orders. Your JAs can buy for you (what else do you think they're there for?), or you can head north to the Vermont border where they sell to eighteen year olds.

The best place of all, however, is West Package Store on Rte. 2 towards North Adams. The lowest beer prices, (try their Carlings 16-ouncers) and friendly people.

Clothes—Spring Street prices are high, no matter where you go. But there is no tax on clothes in Massachusetts (apparently crew-neck sweaters are deemed a "basic necessity" in prep New England), so you even out some. For great bargains on crazy clothes, hit the Women's Exchange on Cole Ave. (for men too).

Miscellaneous—If you can get a car, you'll have access to the Zayre and K-Mart discount department stores in North Adams. They have everything. It may not be name brand, but it will usually do in a pinch.

Japanese and American flags on Chapin Hall marked this year's Convocation theme. (Farley)

Family, trade, education

Japan's culture defined

"If you are not worried about Japan, you ought to be," declared history professor Peter Frost in opening Friday's panel discussion of Japanese-American relations. Five distinguished panelists spoke to the large Chapin Hall crowd, detailing the causes and consequences of the Japanese "economic miracle" and emphasizing what economic lessons the U.S. could learn from the Japanese example.

"The Japanese are not doing it with mirrors," said panelist William G. Ouchi '65. "Instead, we must change our fundamental institutions before we despair and give up."

The panelists included Akio Morita, Chairman of the SONY Corporation, Cornell Professor of Linguistics Eleanor Harz Jorden, former U.S. Ambassador to Japan Robert S. Ingersoll, Ouchi, Professor of Management at UCLA and author of the well-known study of Japanese management Theory Z, as well as Frost. Professor of Political Science Fred Greene moderated.

Boom and Disaster

Frost spoke on the dynamic nature of the Japanese economy, noting a 55-fold increase in GNP since 1946 and a recent unemployment rate of only 2 percent.

Morita stated that Japan's massive economic growth resulted in part from the ability of Japanese industries to diversify markets and products in the face of crisis. "Time and time again, Japanese industry has managed to avert economic disaster by finding new sources of business," he asserted.

These adaptations provide continuity within each company. As a result, there have been fewer layoffs in Japan and corporate loyalty is very high. "All employees from top to bottom share the same fate," explained Morita. "This is why all employees do their best to develop new business"—technological improvements, expanded markets.

Professor Ouchi expanded Morita's observations on individual corporate success to the entire Japanese economy. He explained prosperity depended directly on a close dialogue between business and government. Unlike the United States' anti-trust policy, "the Japanese government confers legitimacy on discussions between corporations."

Un-American Activities

Japan-U.S. ties explored

In an urgent and forceful attack on the policy of trade protectionism, former U.S. Ambassador to Japan Robert Ingersoll extolled the virtues of free trade and comparative advantage in his address to Saturday's Convocation audience. Japanese Ambassador to the U.S. Yoshio Okawara spent most of his address on the subject of defense, suggesting that Japan's role in its own defense is larger than most Americans think, and that that role will continue to grow.

Ingersoll warned that establishing a policy of "pernicious reciprocity" with Japan would only hurt the American economy. He explained that although the U.S. has a trade deficit with Japan, this deficit is lower than our trade surplus with Europe. Such a policy therefore would only encourage Europe to use a similar policy against the United States.

Universal free trade, on the other hand, would stimulate economic growth and increase productivity through use of the economic principle of comparative advantage. Ingersoll denounced reciprocity as the "antithesis of comparative advantage" and argued that such a policy would tarnish the image of the U.S. as "a bastion of free trade."

Although Ingersoll believes that "nothing would improve our relationship with Japan more than the speedy revitalization of the U.S. economy," he also blamed Japanese for some of our trade difficulties. "Japanese leaders must change their siege mentality," he said, and open their markets to more American products.

No nukes

As a means of coming to agreement on trade issues, Ingersoll suggested that leaders from the two countries must form an agency to mediate disputes and form agreements "before (these issues) reach the front pages."

Okawara also stressed the importance of the economic relations between the United States and Japan, particularly since both countries are suffering from the world-wide economic recession.

Okawara, however, used most of his time to refute the contention by many Americans that Japan spends too little on its defense budget. The U.S. government recently has been putting pressure on Japan to increase military spending so that America would not have to bear so much of the burden for Japan's protection. Okawara reminded his listeners that Japan has increased its efforts in this direction and that Japan's defense system is now the eighth strongest in the world.

Wary of too great a build-up, Okawara cautioned that the Japanese are "committed to maintain an army solely for defense." He also asserted Japan's continued refusal to allow the production or storage of nuclear weapons.

And then there was one . . .

Dewey owns sole sales rights

Ending a feud which had extended from Spring Street to the pages of the Record, the two Williamstown bookstores have reached an agreement with the Administration which transfers all right to sell textbooks to a new partnership between Joseph Dewey, owner of the Williams Bookstore, and former Renzi's employee George Coussoule.

The agreement stipulates that this new partnership shall pay Ralph Renzi monthly for ten years to compensate him for the loss of textbook sales. Neither Dewey nor Renzi was willing to disclose the exact terms of payment. Because he will now handle all textbook orders, Coussoule's salary will increase. This will allow him to purchase a 50 percent share of The Williams Bookstore, making him a partner in the payment to Renzi. Coussoule could not be reached for comment.

College pressure led to the agreement. "There were uncertainties and underbuying last year," said College Treasurer William Reed. Other problems included disputes over whether one store had the exclusive right to sell the books for a particular class. "It became uneconomical for both stores . . . the Gargoyle Society (an advisory committee composed of campus leaders) were instrumental. They brought the situation to our attention and tried to resolve it," said Reed.

College store an option

Matt Simon '82 and Freddy Nathan '83 were leaders of the Gargoyle effort. Simon in particular served as an envoy between the stores and the College. "We exerted some influence," said Nathan. "We submitted a formal proposal." This proposal, submitted to Reed in February, was similar to the final arrangement worked out in June.

Part of the pressure included the threat that the College would establish its own bookstore. "We encouraged the

The high-way to world peace

by Dan Keating

Have you ever read something and suddenly had a blast of future-sight come into view? A headline of fifteen years from now appear in your head? I had such a moment while reading a recent issue of Time magazine. Two articles came together for me in a moment of vision.

You see, marijuana is now the fourth leading cash crop in this country, and production is increasing. The $8.5 billion harvest is now so big that "many Government experts fear that domestic marijuana production has gone too far to be undercut at this late date." That means jobs, money, and stability for our economy. But the problem I immediately deduced is that we will soon be overproducing, making even more pot than our dedicated "heads" can consume.

President Jerry Brown will be in big trouble then. I figured we would soon have federal subsidies and loans to growers, not unlike we now do with tobacco growers (anybody under 30 will tell you that marijuana is a lot better for you than cigarettes). Meandering through the rest of the magazine, I stumbled upon the answer.

The "Living" section has an article about Soviet teenagers scooping up Wranglers, Walkmen, pop records, punk hairdos, pizza and posters. It seems that they want more than our wheat. With a little clever maneuvering by Foreign Trade Secretary Dr. Hunter S. Thompson, we can dump our excess marijuana on the Russians.

Government satellites indicate that the Russians are well behind us in marijuana production, although a Pravda editorial recently claimed that pot was invented by the Party. With American growers pressuring President Brown about low prices due to overproduction, we can surely negotiate a multi-year, minimum-level, set-price, whatever-whatever deal. Our trade imbalance will be solved.

All sources agree that Japan has too dry a climate to steal our market with government-supported companies dumping cheap produce. Our big competitors will probably be Colombia and Mexico. But not to worry. Shrewd fore-planner that he is, President Reagan is already leaning on Colombia to spray its crop with paraquat, a powerful weed killer. Our domestic pot production took off when Nixon convinced Mexico to spray its weed fields.

Why Reagan is having their crops sprayed while leaving ours unmolested is a tough question. At least it's a consistent policy from the man who blocked the Siberian pipe-line while selling grain to the Soviets in record amounts.

With our trade balance evened and huge tax revenues rolling in, pot might get our economy high again. Marijuana might be the solution that Keynes never thought of. I can see ex-President Carter, in his jeans overalls, strolling through his peanut-converted-to-pot farm, talking about the success of his brother's latest venture, Billy Boy's Body-Whipping Weed.

Get out of the sandbox

by Katya Hokanson

I have decided to risk my neck. Quite a bit of complaining goes on around here by people who have not investigated the possibilities of what is available to do, see, and learn. Specifically I have noticed that what people complain about most is that this school is too small, in a real hick town, and dizzilying far from any decent big city. We are nowhere near the Real World, they say. We are just in a big sandbox, it is not real, it is all academic whatamacallit. They play this tune over and over, sometimes varying the lyrics. It's not the real world, it's not the real world, it's not the real world.

Frankly, I am sick of hearing it. A lot of the complainers have not made the least effort. They cannot bother to open their eyes and see a part of the real world right here. There is culture here, there is a degree of political activity, there are interesting and worthwhile things to do, there are communities and the humdrum of daily life. It is not perfect here, it is not ideal; the real world aspects of Williams won't ever come up and knock on your door.

Freshmen, a goose, and A. J. Moor

by Steve Epstein

I miss A.J. Moor. I know I'll take some heat for that statement, but it's true. It's one of a few observations I've made upon arriving back from the summer that surprises me. Let's look at some others that might surprise you too...

1.) I don't mind having only one bookstore.

When I received the letter that, quite subtly, informed us that there was to be only one bookstore on campus this year for texts, I was ready to scream bloody murder. Words that came to mind were "restraint of trade," "monopoly," and "robbery without a gun." But things are apparently going to turn out all right. Lines at Dewey's are long, but lines at Renzi's (where students used to buy most, but not all of their books) were just as long. My books were all in this year, for the first time ever, and purchasing them wasn't all that tough. Dewey will take plastic money or bill books home, which makes things easy. Prices have

To start with, a lot of those people who deplore the smallness of the town have never even been to the Clark Art Institute. I picked up a book I just bought for a course and I recognized on its cover a work hanging at the Clark. Major exhibitions in Boston often include works borrowed from the Clark. The Clark is more famous than Williams College. But I know seniors who have not been there. How many times have you heard someone say, "Oh, yeah, the Clark, I'll have to get there some time"?

Then there's the Alice-in-Wonderland image of the Berkshires—lots of nice green lawns, neat houses, cute mini-downtowns like Spring Street—a place to retire in, right? The real world encroaches, though—you might have noticed the Williamstown Nuclear Freeze Office. A talk with any Lehman Service Council spokesman will tell you that there are hospitals, nursing homes, a boys' reformatory, kids who want to be matched up with a "Big Brother" or "Big Sister" because they don't get enough attention at home.

Politics here are harder to judge. A good friend of mine complained a lot about political life here last year. She was a doer though—she organized things and then was upset that no one came to participate. She could not believe that only five people cared enough about El Salvador to come to an event she put together. But she tried, and when it came time for her job interview, she knew about real world politics.

Issues of racism and sexism are probably so real here that they are too close for comfort. Violence against women can occur even here, we discovered last year. A lot of people had to face the fact that they or their closest friends could be in danger of being attacked right on campus. Quite a few people spoke of the need to redefine sexual harassment. Few people had ever spoken of sexual harassment at Williams before then. Racism also came too close with the cross-burning two years ago.

One need not feel isolated and powerless here. There are too many opportunities which enable individuals to make a difference. Though miles from what some people call "real civilization," this is the real world.

gone up, but what hasn't in the past few years?

2.) The Class of '86 is with it.

In just over one week the freshmen are proving themselves as social animals. Their Las Vegas night was one of the most successful freshman days parties seen in recent years. People were actually meeting each other and dancing. Three or four freshmen were heard to exclaim that they were enjoying themselves. Just as quickly, freshmen have learned the lingo and the tricks of the trade. Their JA's should be commended. Already they have been seen steam tunneling,

"Excitable Boy" coming

by Jim Corsiglia

By a lucky scheduling quirk in the music world Warren Zevon will be appearing at Chapin Hall on Thursday, September 23rd. He is indisputably one of the most respected rockers in the United States today, and he has earned his respect the hard way.

In 1978 the nation's most prestigious rock 'n' roll magazine published an article with the following line, "Thus far the seventies have introduced three major American rock 'n' roll artists—Browne in 1972, Springsteen in 1973 and Zevon."

The same year Warren Zevon called his wife to tell her that he would soon be returning to the West Coast, but he wanted to see a concert with Bruce Springsteen and producer Jon Landau before he left New York. Zevon's wife told the alcoholic that he had just seen that concert the previous night. He did not remember.

Zevon has since conquered alcoholism and remains at the top of the industry. He plays his own style of music that defies easy labeling, though connections to the West Coast are strong. He used to open for Linda Ronstadt and wrote her hit song "Poor, Poor, Pitiful Me." Members of the Eagles occasionally sing backup vocals, and Jackson Browne has had a hand in producing three of his six albums.

Still, this artist does not pump out mindless, Beach Boys blather. On his most famous album, Excitable Boy, songs like "Lawyers, Guns and Money" and "Werewolves of London" pummel the listener with fast piano playing, deep, rich vocals, and weird lyrics.

He writes about ghosts, headless warriors, and guerrillas, but there is more to this wacky cast of characters than a jolt of extremely unusual humor.

His modern, blood and guts image is balanced by a sizable group of long and emotional ballads and a heavy dose of classical string arrangements on some of his best songs. Zevon is excellent proof that a bizarre medium need not obstruct meaningful observations.

Just a few years ago Zevon was an alcoholic. He was sick in the same way that Keith Moon, Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, and Jim Morrison were sick, but those artists could not regain control as Zevon did. His new album which came out this summer is a brilliant testimony to his recovery.

Williams College students will have the chance to see one of the most powerful rock performers at the height of his career.

change," commented Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, "since we had unsatisfactory service... we said, 'Work something out.' One sold its rights to the other, and we greeted this development with enthusiasm."

"The administration was tired of shortages," said Renzi. "Any student should be able to get his books on time. The College said 'solve the problem or we'll start our own bookstore.'"

Soul-searching

There were about three weeks of negotiation," continued Renzi. "We had our accountants look at the books." "There was a bit of soul-searching this summer," agreed Dewey. "At first Ralph didn't want to sell... then I almost did... then at the last minute he agreed to."

"Joe finally made me an offer I couldn't refuse," said Renzi. "I am very happy, and I assume he is too. This should go far toward solving the problem." Renzi emphasized that he will continue in the book business. He noted that while textbooks comprised two-thirds of his gross turnover last year, the low profitability of the textbook business means that his profit loss should be much less than that.

Textbooks normally carry a 20 percent suggested retail mark-up, compared to 40 percent on standard books. Under the new agreement, Dewey is allowed to charge this 20 percent, plus an additional seven percent, which he maintains is necessary to cover costs. The College will maintain the right to audit his accounts.

"Selling textbooks is not a profit-making operation," admitted Dewey, "but we get a flow of cash and customers through the store to help pay basic expenses. We couldn't keep a well-stocked store otherwise. Even with small margins you can make money if the volume is large enough."

Both stores believe they will survive. "Viability is a big question," said Reed, "but they're more viable now than when they were competing for textbook orders."

Although no faculty were consulted about the agreement, faculty opinion was generally muted. "So far I have no complaints," said Chairman of the Russian Department Michael Katz.

"It makes sense to me," said History chairman Dudley Bahlman. "It's better to order from one store. The major problems are generated by publishers, I think."

Ralph Renzi had unaccustomed leisure time last week after selling his share of textbook rights.

Campus sports summer action

If you think the Williams campus settles down for a summertime slumber when we pack our trunks to go home, think again. From June to August, the purple hills hum with activity, hosting tourists, summer conferences and Hollywood stars.

In addition, a hundred or so Williams students stay here each summer to work, do research and convince friends that they are not dying of boredom. In fact, many would claim that there is more to do here in the summer than during the school year. And there's more time for it.

Sharing the campus with everyone from grave-stone fanatics to Blythe Danner leads to some interesting encounters, however. Students watching TV in Mission Park were rudely told to leave by the head of a businessman's conference. When they pointed out the little stickers that say the building is open only to "all Williams College students, etc.," the Conference Office's reply was that one "loses student privileges over the summer."

Being a non-student does not deter most from doing what students usually do—partying, reading (trashy novels from the public library) and sleeping. The steam tunnels are easy to enter during the summer, and rumor has it that one enterprising student painted a picture on a wall down there. But they can do all that during the school year. What makes Williamstown during the summer so special?

Well, the Williamstown Theater Festival is largely responsible for keeping the town on the map. One of the most esteemed summer theaters in the country, it attracts such talents as Blythe Danner, Dick Cavett, Tom Atkins and Michael Ontkean (still trying to live down "The Rookies").

Equity actors work with interns and apprentices to produce plays, cabarets and special event. Monday night rehearsals are open—free to anyone who shows up; regular tickets run seven dollars.

Tennessee Williams dropped by for the season premiere of "A Celebration," a mishmash of scenes from all of his plays. The honors for arousing the most popular interest, however, go to Tom Selleck of "Magnum P.I." fame, who stopped by for a few days of vacation. Theater regulars are visible around campus and on Spring Street. Edward Herrman once autographed a roll of toilet paper for a Williams student.

Looking beyond Williamstown, almost all of Berkshire County comes alive culturally. The Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox features the Boston Symphony Orchestra while the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, founded by Ted Shawn, brings top-notch dance groups to the area. The Berkshire Theater Festival in Stockbridge competes with Williamstown for tourist dollars. The Mount in Lenox, the renovated home of novelist Edith Wharton, is the headquarters of Shakespeare and Company, noted for its outdoor settings for the Bard's works.

Saratoga Springs, with its schedule of both classical and popular concerts, attracts some Williams people. Those tired of classical music can go to the Lebanon Valley Speedway for stock, modified and funny car action.

Closer to home, Adams celebrates Susan B. Anthony Days in August and has a polka festival almost every other weekend. North Adams doesn't do much.

Such a mecca of opportunities would surely attract more than a handful of students who couldn't find a job at home, right? That's what the college figured when it started offering its facilities to summer conference groups.

Over twenty groups used the campus this year. Doctors and doctors-to-be shared the biology building, including the usual pre-med program for 15 college-bound students and a Nephrology Seminar attended by 75 kidney specialists from all over the country.

High school students also studied "Human Thought and Artificial Intelligence" under the auspices of the Telluride Association in its first year here.

In contrast, the American Studies for Executives program completed its 27th year here. It features crash liberal arts courses taught by Williams professors for businessmen in finance, communications, high technology, and other fields.

The high standards of Williams prepdom are upheld by the tennis campers who occupy the freshman quad. The Conference Office draws the line at cheerleading camps, it is reported.

remarked, "but in the development of a major new industry the public must bear the risk so that the infant industry gets off the ground."

The U.S. had valuable dialogue between business and government up through the 1950's, according to Ouchi, but it was then defined and rejected as a harmful "military-industrial complex." He predicted a redevelopment of such a central network in the 1980's.

Although Frost agreed with Ouchi and Morita that "we have a lot to learn" from the Japanese economic boom, he warned that growth has produced many negative side-effects. He pointed to "urban sprawl" and a national budget that includes a higher percentage of deficit spending than that of the U.S."

Moreover, Morita noted that the "Japanese economy is in a serious situation." Poor domestic consumption, the worldwide recession, and "Japan's own blundering export restraints" have all hurt Japanese industry, according to Morita.

All the panelists expressed concern over strained Japan-U.S. relations regarding such matters as protectionism. Morita defended his country against U.S. charges of illegal trade barriers by stating that "American business presence in Japan is greater than the Japanese presence in America." Ambassador Ingersoll disagreed, citing retaliatory measures that several Asian countries have aimed at Japan's "closed" markets.

Exam Hell

Jorden spoke on Japanese social issues, emphasizing that "although Japan often shows startling change, it is only on the surface—the foundation of society remains stable." She noted in particular that family structure is still strong despite increasing urbanization and decline of the extended family.

Jorden severely criticized the Japanese educational system, however, noting that students' efforts are completely devoted to passing extremely competitive university admissions exams. Preparation for "Exam Hell" begins early. Jorden told of a Japanese friend who "said only half-jokingly, 'If you do not make a prestige kindergarten you are doomed.'"

Jorden commented that the fierce competition to get into college "stifles the imagination" of young children. After college, according to Jorden, it becomes the responsibility of the corporations to educate their employees and redevelop their creativity.

budget is the Japanese national budget deficit. Okawara indicated that balancing the national budget and lowering inflation are high on Japan's list of priorities.

Saturday's Convocation saw honorary degrees awarded to Ingersoll and Okawara, as well as to Friday night's panelists: William Ouchi, professor at the UCLA graduate school of management and author of Theory

Z; Eleanor Jorden, linguistics professor at Cornell University; and Akio Morita, chairman and chief executive officer of the Sony Corporation.

Dean Daniel O'Connor announced the new members of the Phi Beta Kappa honor society from the class of 1983. The Williams chapter uses grade point averages to elect the top ten percent of each senior class at the beginning of the school year.

College cancels semester to protest Vietnam War

"The sky was red over Greylock, merging in perverse symbolism with the purple mountains."

by Christian K. Howlett

Most of you probably think Williams College is a fairly sedate place, and assume it always has been. What you don't know is that a mere 12 years ago the faculty actually voted to abolish classes for the remainder of a semester so that students could become full-time political activists. The reason for all this uproar—the Vietnam War.

It is the fall of 1969 and the United States has been fighting in Vietnam for five years. As peace efforts continually fail, national frustration and outrage rise beyond control. Even Williams is not immune to this national feeling.

It all starts innocently enough. Two National Vietnam Moratorium Days are set for October 15 and November 15, featuring chapel services, silent processions, petition drives, and even folk concerts. Some students, worrying about appearing too militant, prove their constructive nature by cleaning up vacant lots and renovating an old North Adams church.

Cancel Homecoming?

Despite these activities, the biggest conflict in the fall of '69 occurs over whether to cancel the November Homecoming parties for a Moratorium Day. In spite of alumni protest, students succeed in cancelling the festivities, but even the Vietnam War can't stand in the way of the traditional Williams-Amherst football game. After November 15, campus protest reverts to dissatisfied murmurings and occasional armbands. Winter Carnival passes; things seem quiet.

Until May 2, 1970, that is.

Friday, May 1, several Williams students attend a national protest meeting at Yale. One of the speakers there urges a national student strike protesting everything from civil rights violations to Vietnam to ROTC. Filled with revolutionary fervor, several freshmen return to campus determined to bring about a strike at Williams. They manage to drum up enough support for a planning meeting the next day.

Luckily for Williams, two newspapers cover these tumultuous times. The Williams Advocate, in its first year as a purveyor of laid-back journalism, describes that first meeting: "Some people thought the strike would need direction. Some thought it already had too much. Everyone agreed they needed a meeting, even if it was only to say they didn't need meetings."

Kent State

Soon the freshman quad is covered with banners proclaiming "Strike Now!" and "Even Williams." Faculty and students meet in the Greylock quad the next afternoon. The Advocate reports: "The sky was red over Greylock, merging in perverse symbolism with the purple mountains. Nostrils flaring, a thin, wispy student cried, 'Stop all activities in the Greylock quad! ... Burn your frisbees for peace!'"

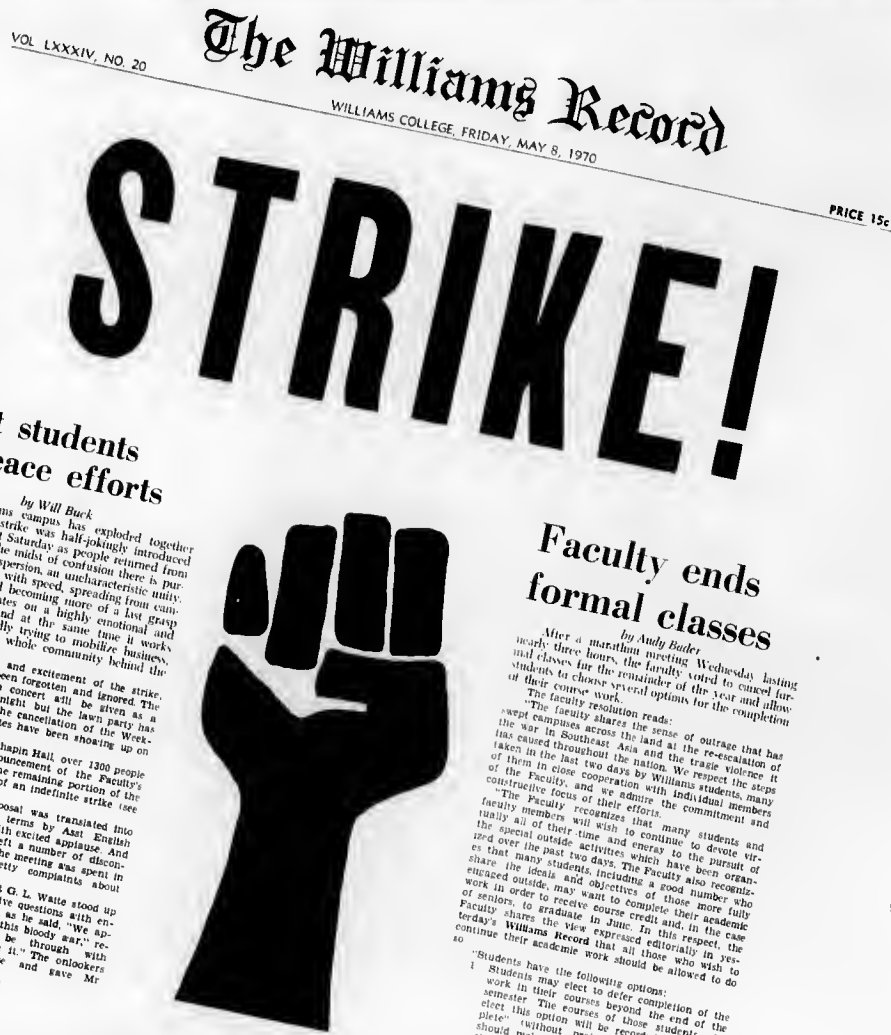

But the levity ceases as someone announces the deaths of four students at Kent State University in Ohio, protestors fired upon by national guardsmen during an anti-war rally.

The stunned crowd breaks into small groups to digest this news. It is announced that there will be an all-campus meeting in Chapin at 10:45 the next night to discuss the strike.

Meanwhile, various groups get busy publishing their particular statement. A letter urges seniors to resist the draft and refuse induction. The Young Republicans announce that while the strike may be all right for certain individuals, the main purpose of the college is academics and this should be recognized by the strike's organizers. The College Council also tries to get into the act, but nearly half of the members abstain from a motion to support the strike.

Students strike

Finally, a standing-room only crowd of 1300 squeezes into Chapin Hall. The first hour is complete confusion as more people try to worm their way in. Many students are also confused because no one on stage is recognizable. College Council president Greg Van Schaack opens the meeting but is soon replaced by Jim Lobe. Few people know Lobe; there are rumors he spent the pre-

The Williams campus has exploded together since the word strike was half-jokingly introduced to the college last Saturday as people returned from New Haven. In the midst of confusion there is the strike runs on with speed spreading from unit to unit. It operates on a highly emotional and spectacular level, and at the same time it works humbly and devotedly to mobilize, educate, and finally the whole community behind the strike effort.

In the enthusiasm and excitement of the strike, many Williams students have been forgotten and ignored. The benefit for the strike itself will be given as a benefit for the strike itself, but the very purpose of the strike is to bring about a change in the way we live. The strike is not a means to an end, it is an end in itself. The strike is a way of life, a way of thinking, a way of feeling, a way of acting. The strike is a way of being.

Faculty ends formal classes

By Judy Buder
After a marathon meeting Wednesday, lasting nearly three hours, the faculty voted to cancel formal classes for the remainder of the year and allow students to devote their time to the strike and other activities. The faculty's decision was a landmark one, as it was the first time in the history of Williams that the faculty had ever voted to cancel classes. vious year in Moscow or that he is an "outside agitator."

Eventually a semblance of order returns. Van Scaack reads President Sawyer's statement, which supports the students, opposes the war, and doesn't mention the strike. Students then learn that the faculty have voted to suspend classes for two days. Students had hoped for more. They are told the faculty will review the situation in two days.

After more bickering about semantics and issues, students vote 1054 to 141 to strike. Students linger to find out how long the strike will last, but debate passes on to other issues. The Advocate describes the waning moments of the meeting: "1:10 AM—Stagnocracy, mutters one frustrated onlooker. An ambiguous strike led by an unknown group for an unclear reason, says another. 1:15 AM—A number of disgruntled radical freshmen leave through conveniently placed windows. 1:18 AM—The Record reporters turn their attention to a nearby dog."

Those who lasted until 1:45 AM discovered they had approved three "demands." In addition to a call for immediate U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, the audience demanded an end to government racism and repression of dissidents. As the Advocate noted, "The college was now on strike against the war, political repression, and racism."

Faculty end classes

By now it is Tuesday, May 5. A few diehards return to Chapin the next morning to organize the strike. They plan road trips to Bennington, Skidmore, and the Five-College area to help those students with their own strikes.

Wednesday afternoon the faculty has its own marathon meeting to decide the fate of the remainder of the year, including finals.

English professor Fred Stocking is a vehement supporter of the strike, reports The Advocate. "We just can't go on with the usual routine," he says. "This is more important. The students I've talked to are troubled. These aren't bomb-throwing kids. They're standing around puzzled, kind of humble... History has given us the strike. I think we've got to take the chance." The faculty finally vote to cancel classes for the remainder of the year. Students have the option of completing their work now or waiting until the beginning of next year. Seniors may choose a grade of "Pass" in their courses.

The decision, which is read to students gathered in Chapin, is met by a confused silence until translated into understandable terms by one professor. Some students are still unclear, and, as the Record reports, "the next half hour (1s) spent in insignificant questions and petty complaints about the proposal."

At this point, history professor Robert G. L. Waite makes history by jumping up and exclaiming: "We applaud our common effort to end this bloody war. Let's be through with this chickenshit and get on with it."

And the strike begins. Williams goes from academic institution to center for political action. Seeley House is christened "Strike Center" and committees upon committee upon subcommittee forms to handle various projects. Groups of students write congressmen and political leaders while others canvas the area or write alumni. Strike organizers fan out to other campuses to keep lines of communication open.

The college looks like a campaign headquarters two days before an election; typewriters, telephones, mimeograph machines and messengers are busy 24 hours a day. Spring Weekend is largely ignored, except by the incoming, confused dates. Even the annual trivia contest is cancelled.

Suddenly, the whole thing runs out of gas. The strike's most ardent supporters head for Washington to take part in anti-war rallies and marches, leaving the strike in the hands of the less committed. At the same time the pause for Peace Movement, a favorite campus cause, folds overnight.

Led by political science professor George Marcus, the National Pause for Peace Coalition pushes for a national, hour-long work stoppage at some appointed time. Lack of union support, not to mention lack of funds, dash that dream in a matter of days.

Dissillusionment and fatigue set in on campus. The students are working long, hard hours with little or no results. Not surprisingly, those hours dwindle to almost nothing.

Many frustrated students turn to partying. When the Washington delegation returns, most of the students are too deep in apathy to rouse themselves again. Many leave for home and, quietly, the school year ends.

A few of the most dedicated students remain on campus through the summer to continue the spring's activities. They publish a few progress reports, but become disillusioned as most students fail to keep in touch. Fall rolls around and the strike is now a thing of the past, discussed in retrospect. Williams feels like home again as everyone's mind is once more turned towards academics, particularly last spring's incomplete work.

The war did not end, little was changed. The issues are old and there is too much work to do and not enough time left over for politics. Williams is back to normal.

A goose and A. J. —

ordering beer at the Log, and eating brunch at Dodd.

Freshmen could be seen everywhere at the Daquiri party last Saturday night, participating in all of the traditional entertainment. Yes, they were dancing, drinking and having a blast. A casualty list will be released by the Freshman Council some time this week. Wow! We need more geese. Napoleon is the greatest pet act on campus since Ben, the puppy in 1980 who found the cutting room floor when he hobbled behind Anthony Hopkins and Bo Derek during the filming of "A Change of Seasons" in the freshman quad and left a reminder of his previous night's repast of Alpo.

The Deans have often attempted to outlaw dogs and cats on campus, but a goose has never been an issue. It gives us character, it gives us style, and maybe it will give us eggs...

4.) The football team just might be really good.

In the spring Bob Odell looked glum. He had 22 senior starters to graduation, and two prospective freshman linemen had been lost to the Ivy League. In short, things looked bleak. Now, four months later, the squad has beaten the Dartmouth J.V. and there is cause for some optimism. Both quarterbacks, Scott Garabedian and B. J. Connolly, are proving to be experienced leaders.

Sophomore running back Ted Thomas is back, and he looks ready to pick up where he did last season. Halfback Sean Crotty is another factor. He's in the greatest shape of his Williams career. Receiver Mark Hummon is a sure bet to please, and tight end Paul Coleman's hands have been excellent.

Andy Robison and Bernie Krause anchor the offensive line and Gary Stosz has switched from offense to defense as well as from tame to threatening as a football player.

Timmy Curran anchors a secondary that may hold all the marbles for the Ephs this season.

But win or lose, it will be a great season. We'll all get drunk at the games, Andy Crain will lead our undefeated and alcoholically induced Moccow Band into battle, and Dick Farley will lose his voice. In short, all is well at Weston Field. Which brings me back to...

5.) I miss A. J. Moor. I'm not sure why. Take my word for it.

Trustee named

Jean Bernhard Buttner of Piedmont, Calif., has been named to a five-year term on the College Board of Trustees.

Buttner is vice president of the Buttner Companies, which consist of ComPath, one of the largest distributors of private terminal equipment in the United States, and Coastcom, a manufacturer of microwave digital equipment. She is also on the Board of Directors of Arnold Bernhard and Co., Inc., publishers of the Value Line Investment Survey.

A graduate of Vassar College, Buttner's interest in Williams spans several generations. She is the daughter of Arnold Bernhard, a 1925 graduate of Williams, and the mother of Ned Buttner, a junior at Williams.

Buttner received training as a Montessori Teacher at the College of Notre Dame, and was formerly a director of the Berkeley, Calif., Montessori School, and on the board of the Emma Willard School in Troy, N.Y. She is currently on the Board of Trustees of College Preparatory School in Oakland, Calif., and was a member of the Piedmont Board of Education from 1976-80, serving as its President during the last year of her term.

Buttner attended the Harvard-Radcliffe Program of Business Administration, and is on the Executive Committee of the Harvard Business School Alumni Board of Directors of Northern California. She is former president of the Bay Area Vassar Club, and has done admissions interviewing for Vassar, Harvard College and Harvard Business School.

Stewart promoted

Henry M. Stewart, who was Data Base Administrator at the College's Computer and Data Processing Center, has been promoted to Associate Director of Data Systems.

In his new position, Stewart will assume supervision of the work of other programmers in addition to continuing with his own programming responsibilities. He will also be in charge of internal training and education, and involved in recommendations concerning the acquisition of new hardware and software for the Computer Center's Univac 1100/60 system.

Stewart received a bachelor's degree from the State University of New York at Plattsburgh in 1969 and an M.S. degree from the University of Southwestern Louisiana in 1971. He has also taken a series of short courses at the Sperry Univac Education Center focusing on data base concepts, design and programming.

Before coming to Williams in 1978, Stewart taught mathematics and computer science at the Woodstock School in India, the City College of Chicago and the University of Maryland's European Division.

Stewart is a lecturer in computer science in the continuing education program at North Adams State College, and also does independent consulting for local firms. As Chairman of the Data Base Administrative Committee of Sperry Univac's national users group, Stewart has been responsible for organizing and evaluating data base seminars.

New staffers join Admissions

Williams has announced three personnel changes effective immediately in the College's admissions office. Thomas H. Parker, a 1969 Williams graduate, was promoted to associate director, Maureen E. Walsh was named an assistant director, and Beverly D. Stevens was appointed office manager.

After graduating from Williams, Parker taught for three years at Detroit Country Day School. He got his master of arts in teaching degree from Harvard in 1973 and then became an administrator and teacher at Marshfield (Mass.) High School. After seven years there, Parker came to Williams in 1980 as an assistant director of admissions. He is married to Jeanie Parker and lives in Williamstown with their three children, Emilie, aged seven, and twins Katie and Beth, aged three. Walsh is a 1979 graduate of Wesleyan University where she was an admissions intern during her senior year. She taught English for a year at Phillips Andover Academy before spending two years as both an admissions officer and English teacher at Groton School. She is currently a Master of Arts in Liberal Studies degree candidate at Dartmouth College. Stevens, as office manager, will be responsible for coordinating the material which pours into the admissions office from nearly 5000 applicants each year and the information which flows from admissions to the other sections of the College. A 1964 graduate of Wheaton College, Stevens lives in Williamstown with her husband Lauren R. Stevens and three children Rebecca, 15; Jeffrey, 13; and Jennifer, 4.

Williams oarswomen win national medals this summer

Unlike other Williams sports which measure success by the Little Three or small college standards, the women's crew continues to place oarswomen on the top level of American crew.

Hope Bigelow, a member of the women's crew, won a gold medal this summer at the National Sports Festival in the four-with-coxswain rowing event. Another member of last spring's varsity crew, Janet Harmon, was in the same race, giving Williams two of the 16 competitors in that event.

Held this year in Indianapolis, the National Sports Festival is staged in non-Olympic years by the U.S. Olympic Committee for American athletes. The festival this year included 33 team sports and individual events with 2,600 athletes, most of whom are in training for the 1984 Olympics.

Bigelow's rise to the level of an Olympic-hopeful oarswoman has come with less than a year's experience. As a sophomore last year, she began rowing in the fall under the direction of woman's coach George Marcus. By the spring season, she had earned a position in the varsity boat and attracted the attention of national team coaches.

A resident of Houston, Bigelow was rowing for the South. Harmon, who lives in Wayland, Mass., rowed for the North. Both were in the 1982 Williams women's crew which went to the finals of the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia, the largest collegiate regatta in the world. Harmon was then invited to the Olympic Development Camp which led to her appearance at the National Sports Festival.

Olympic hopeful

Harmon rowed for four years at Williams and graduated with a degree in psychology in May. With her experience in the development camp and the festival, Harmon is also a likely prospect for the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles.

Two other rowers won a silver medal at the Women's National Crew Championships held in June on Lake Waramaug in New Preston, Conn.

The Lightweight Pair of Cary Gaunt '83 and Nicole Faulkner '84, practiced together in a pair for only two weeks preceding their silver medal performance. Earlier in the year Faulkner and Gaunt were members of the Junior Varsity eight that won a gold medal at the Dad Vail Regatta.

Winning attitude

Their coach, Dinnie Sloman, says the lightweight pair began training for the Nationals feeling that all they wanted was to row for a couple more weeks. By the time those two weeks had elapsed, Sloman says that "not only had their rowing prowess improved, but they had acquired winning attitudes. They entered the Nationals thinking that they could win." Sloman graduated from Williams in 1980 after stroking the men's eight which went to the Henley Regatta in England.

Faulkner and Gaunt finished third in the final, behind a pair from the Potomac River Development Camp of Washington, D.C. and the current Lightweight National Champions from Canada. The Canadian crew was not eligible for a U.S. medal, so the Williamstown Boat Club pair took home the silver medal.

Three other boats of Williams women competed at the Nationals. Class of 1982 graduates, Kaja Kool, and Harmon rowed in the Elite Pair, which Head Coach George Marcus says is the toughest event because it is the proving ground for potential National Team members. As one of only two entrants without at least one current member of the National Team, the pair got past the first heat but was eliminated in their second race.

The selection of Harmon and Bigelow for national team attention continues a pattern of Williams women emerging as national-class oarswomen. Nancy Storrs, a 1975 graduate, and Susan Tuttle, a 1977 graduate, are both current members of the National Team.

A handful of other Williams women have been invited to the Development and Olympic Selection Camps over the years, including Dixie Rhodes, '76, who was on the National Sculling (rowing with two oars apiece instead of one) Team in 1975.

Ephmen topple Dartmouth

Despite the loss of 19 starters from last year's squad, the football team has shown promise in its pre-season work.

The Ephmen crushed the Dartmouth J.V. 27-14 on Saturday in Hanover, N.H. Passing was the key to the Williams offense, as quarterbacks Scott Garabedian '83 and B.J. Connolly '84 completed 12 of 14 passes for 136 yards and all four Williams touchdowns.

Both quarterbacks went six-for-seven, with Garabedian throwing for three TD's, and Connolly throwing 92 yards, including a 47 yard touchdown pass to Paul Coleman '85.

Less than ten seniors will be starting this year, as compared to 17 last year. The inexperience shows especially on the offensive line and the defensive front seven.

Odell optimistic

Head Coach Bob Odell, however, is optimistic about the team. "We're farther ahead than where I anticipated we'd be," he said after the Dartmouth game.

"This was our first eleven-on-eleven except for about five minutes on Thursday," Odell said, "and I have to be pleased with what we did."

Williams jumped out to an early lead in the Dartmouth game, scoring 14 points in the first quarter. Garabedian threw passes to tight end John McCarthy '84 and a 16 yard pass to fullback Sean Crotty '84.

Dartmouth came back with one touchdown in the second quarter, but the Ephmen countered with Connolly's bomb to Coleman at the close of the half.

A Garabedian toss to running back Jeff Congdon '84 finished out the Williams scoring in the third quarter. The Green added a final touchdown in the fourth quarter.

All the scores except the Coleman bomb were off short drives coming after turnovers. Dartmouth fumbled four times.

Q.B. battle

Garabedian and Connolly are fighting it out for the quarterback spot, with Ted Thomas '85 the only sure starter in the backfield. Thomas had 270 yards last year vs. Amherst and Wesleyan.

Senior co-captain Andy Robison and Bernie Krause '84 are the starting tackles. The other line positions will be filled by players with little varsity experience.

The defense also lacks experience, especially with the recent loss of senior linebacker Mike Hawkins for academic reasons.

The defensive line will be anchored by seniors John Kowalik (a co-captain) and Gary Pfaff. Both have been starting since their sophomore year. Their experience will be badly needed amidst the Cross Country opens promising '82 season

by Lyman Casey

The 1982 season promises to be a banner year for the Men's Cross-Country team. Last year's top five runners return. Added to that is junior co-captain Bo Parker, who was away last year and is a good bet to go to the Nationals this year if he stays healthy.

Also back are juniors John Nelson, last year's number one harrier, Brian Angle, who is coming off a fine track season, and senior co-captain Lyman Casey.

Vying for spots on the varsity are seniors Dan Riley and Steve Cagulat and junior Bennett Yort as well as a promising group of freshmen which includes high school standout Ian Brzezinski.

Further bolstering the Ephs lineup is the beloved mascot BEAR, whom the team will try to protect this season.

Coach Peter Farwell encourages everyone interested to come watch the opening home meet against Middlebury on Saturday, Sept. 18 at 1:00 in the Science Quad.

Booters seek improved scoring with veteran squad

With 16 returning lettermen and his strongest recruiting year, Head Soccer Coach Mike Russo can afford to be optimistic.

The defense has been the strong point since Russo's arrival in 1979 and will probably continue to be this season. Senior Aytac Apaydan holds down the back four from his center back position. Returning seniors Kris Strohben and Willie Stern hold down the wing back positions.

Junior John Campbell will be moving from midfield to the sweeper back position to direct the defense. The goalkeeping position is being hotly contested between two sophomore standouts, Ken Rhodes and Ted Murphy.

Many players are competing for the three midfield positions. Seniors Rob Kusel, Mark Koenig, and Eric Smith return, as do sophomores Mike Sullivan and Dan Aramini. Also, Marty White, a key performer from the 1980 Williams squad is back after one year away.

The problem last year was scoring, but there is reason to expect better this year. The goal scoring will come from sophomore Doug McKenney and seniors Jeff Sutton and Dave Nassar. Freshman Jeff McEvoy, an All-American from Duxbury (Mass.) High School, will be counted on to bolster the productivity of the forward line.

Other freshmen who Russo will watch closely are Paul Williamson, a 6'3", 190 lbs. striker and Mark Schroeder, a midfielder.

Scrimmage victories

The steadfast defense and improved scoring have already surfaced in the scrimmages Williams has played thus far. The Ephmen played Albany State twice last week, beating them 4-0 and 1-0. Murphy and Rhodes split both games and sophomore John Pier scored in both contests.

The team opens its regular season a week from today at home against R.P.I. at 4:00 p.m. on Cole Field.

R.P.I. is a new addition to this year's schedule as are Clark University and Siena.

Coussoule - Dewey split leaves store without key cog

Last summer's settlement of the Renzi-Dewey textbook feud received a blow with the recent departure of George Coussoule from Joseph Dewey's Williams Bookstore. A personal dispute between Coussoule and Dewey was cited as the reason.

Coussoule, who formerly handled all textbook orders for Renzi's Bookstore, was to have been a partner in Dewey's store, with Dewey and Coussoule compensating Renzi for his textbook rights. "I have no comment on advice from my lawyer," said Coussoule of his departure. Dewey had no comment either.

The Administration emphasized that Coussoule's departure would not adversely affect the settlement. "The partnership dissolved before it got off the ground," said College Treasurer William Reed. "I don't see it as a problem . . . Joe Dewey operated half the textbook business himself before—now he'll just have to hire some more help." Reed added that the financial arrangements will not change.

New committee!

Some faculty, however, expressed concern based on Coussoule's reputed expertise in the textbook business.

"I was sick and tired of being drawn into this controversy against my will," said Chairman of the Political Science Department Kurt Tauber. "I was doubly exhilarated by the settlement and the news that George would join Joe Dewey . . . but now I don't know."

"I'm simply anxious that we provide the best service at the best price," said history professor Charles Dew. "I've always dealt with George, and I wonder how things will go without him."

Dew has been asked by Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor to be a member of an ad-hoc faculty-student committee being formed to monitor the bookstore situation.

Monopoly abuse?

"This (committee) is something we've done before," said O'Connor. "It lapsed last year, and we're getting it going again now." The committee's purpose is to monitor the situation through monthly meetings and provide suggestions for improved service, according to O'Connor. He mentioned pre-registration as one area of concern to him. Students taking pre-registration seriously would do more good than any other measure," he said, noting that fluctuations in class size at short notice often lead to book problems. "The price of freedom is some chaos in book orders," said O'Connor.

College Council Vice-President Jay Ward '84 said that the Council will solicit student applications for the committee shortly. "There is a potential for abuse in this monopoly situation," said Ward. "It's the job of the College Council to oversee it."

Both administration and faculty generally felt that the book-buying rush went smoothly this semester. "I haven't heard of any problems from students," said Tauber. Reed agreed. "I think it went pretty well this year," he said.

Tutors Erin Sahr '84 and Debbie Phipps '83 prepare for yesterday's opening of the Writing Workshop. The Workshop will again offer individual writing instructions to all comers. In addition, the Workshop will offer specialized help in Political Science 101, and English 103 and 357 this semester.

Jack the Ripper revisited in lecture

by David Kleit and Lucy Lytle

The mention of "Jack the Ripper" traditionally brings to mind the image of a man lurking in the shadows with an upheld bloodstained knife. Professor Judith Walkowitz, author of Prostitution and Victorian Society: Women, Class, and the State, asserted in her Thursday night lecture, "Jack the Ripper and the Myth of Male Violence," that the sensationalization of his crimes promoted the male domination of women in 19th century England.

Walkowitz maintained that the most enduring legacy of the Ripper myth is the promotion of "female passivity in the face of male violence." Jack the Ripper, as police dubbed the mysterious murderer, made headlines in 1887 for the brutal slayings and dismemberments of five prostitutes in the White-chapel area of London's notorious East End. Walkowitz noted that newspaper articles about the subject were "sensationalist and melodramatic, with a titillating sex script." He soon became a media hero, and the grisly details of the case attracted widespread attention.

Male Violence

"There were five prevalent theories as to the identity of Jack. He was either a mad doctor, a religious fanatic, an erotic scientific sociologist, an upper class pervert, or a woman," said Walkowitz.

During the time of the slayings women were restricted to their homes and church. The murders quickly became "a focus for social anxieties and fantasies" as the popular press intensified women's terror by featuring a sketch of "a woman frightened to death by a Jack the Ripper impersonator" on the cover of the Police Illustrated News.

In general, women offered little collective resistance to male intimidation, even when private reenactments of the Ripper case were played out in their own homes. Walkowitz described incidents in which disgruntled husbands threatened their wives, saying "I'll White-

Tougher Standards

Phi Beta Kappa votes to halve membership

by Jim Peak

Following action by last year's Williams Phi Beta Kappa members, the College's chapter of the honor society tightened its membership requirements beginning with the Class of 1984.

Last May the College's chapter voted to stiffen the eligibility requirement for juniors from the top ten percent of the class to the top five percent, as measured by cumulative class rank. The election at the end of the senior year will be limited to the top 12.5 percent of the class, cut back from the 25 percent elected in previous years.

Changes a "local initiative"

Chapter president and philosophy professor Charles Karellis emphasized that the action was a "local initiative" on the part of last year's members.

"The members wanted to bring criteria for election at Williams more nearly in line with criteria at comparable schools," Karellis said. Last year's chapter officers researched the percentage of students admitted at Amherst, Wesleyan, Harvard, Yale, and similar colleges and universities. Although the percentage of students eligible differed from school to school, the percentages cluster around Williams' new standards.

Karellis explained that members of the College chapter were "concerned lest this honor be misinterpreted by people who did not know the difference between the standards of Williams and those of other schools." Most of last year's members supported the changes.

Reaction among the junior class was not so positive. "I think that half is too drastic a cut," protested Mark Belemjian. "Taking the top 25 percent takes away some of the honor, but I don't think it's fair to come in with certain expectations and have them cut away from under you." Belemjian said he would have preferred something more gradual.

Karin Miller said she "would be against it if it made competition for grades worse."

Grade consciousness

Karellis doubts that the new standards will have any noticeable effect on students' grade consciousness.

"If we had lowered the guidelines for entering Phi Beta Kappa, I do not think it would have made grade consciousness less of a problem," he said. "Conversely our raising of the standards probably will not have much effect in the other direction."

The Williams Record

Good neighbor policy

Last week's annual Black and White party at Dodd House was closed early because of a complaint from a town resident. The problem of student noise in an otherwise peaceful town is a recurring issue. Some possible solutions:

- Construct a large isolation dome over Dodd and its surrounding houses
- Outfit each partygoer with individual Walkman headphones
- Hold parties only at central locations like the library or the chapel
- Understand each other's needs

The last suggestion is the only reasonable solution. The Black and White was not an unusually loud party. Students understand that they are part of the larger community and that most of the area's residents neither keep student hours nor follow student lifestyles. We must all try to remain considerate of our neighbors.

At the same time, the local community must understand that students need the release provided by dance parties. Parties on the scale of the Black and White occur infrequently (all too infrequently). Partygoers usually obey the rules of neighborly goodwill. So please, neighbors, bear with us. Allow students a few hours per month of entertainment.

Restoring the honor

Williams is a distinguished school, but until recently the guidelines for our Phi Beta Kappa chapter have undermined the chapter's prestige. One fourth of the graduating class gained the honor, more than twice the percentage of similar schools. Now these standards are suitably more rigorous.

A Phi Beta Kappa key at most schools is an indication that a student has done exceedingly well—usually that he or she has finished in the top ten percent of the class. With new membership guidelines for the College's chapter, a Williams key will merit the respect that the honor garners at other colleges.

As with any narrowing of academic honor requirements, there are some students who feel cheated because their class was the first "victim" of the new guidelines. Students who fall just short of Phi Beta Kappa membership, though, can still achieve academic distinction by graduating cum laude, pursuing honors projects, or competing for the many academic prizes that the College offers.

Those who are elected to Phi Beta Kappa can take pride in knowing that they are elected under guidelines that are as rigorous as any comparable college.

English lessons fight despair in Cambodian refugee camp

by Melanie Thompson

Every morning at 5:30 the Thai army begins its day with loud cadences—marching songs and the national anthem. The international volunteers start their day with a cold shower and a ride in a Red Cross van 20 miles up a road paralleling the Cambodian border.

This past summer I was one of the 70 Americans hired by the International Rescue Committee to work in Khao I Dang Holding Center in Thailand. This refugee camp houses about 40,000 anti-communist, "free Cambodian" refugees. It is situated about five miles from the border, within earshot of periodic conflicts among the Khmer Serl guerrillas, the Vietnamese occupation troops, and forces loyal to the Cambodian communist leader, Pol Pot. Many mornings I imagined I heard thunder, which seemed unusual because the sun was always shining. Then someone explained it was mortar fire and mines exploding.

As the truck enters Khao I Dang, having passed through three military checkpoints, it stops in front of the plain barnlike bamboo hospital compound and is surrounded by a multitude of Khmer children trying to earn a small change by selling local handicrafts.

Rampant disease

Although months of international food and medical assistance have worked miracles, volunteers are still confronted by a heart-breaking regiment of maladies seldom seen in the United States. Malaria, cholera, dehydration, malnutrition, tuberculosis, leprosy, worms and gangrene infections are common. Other non-medical difficulties are omnipresent: staff limitations, communications barriers between refugees and staff members.

My job was to teach medical English to those Khmer helpers who acted as nurses' aides, pharmacists and orderlies. The refugees had to learn to take blood pressure, give injections, aid in operations and diagnose a variety of diseases. I also taught them how to treat diseases, either with the limited supply of medicine available in camp or with plants found in the forests of Southeast Asia.

Saving lives

One of my students writes to me, "I like very much to learn Medical course because I think it will have a good knowledge in the future to save several people who have serious infection like pregnancy, delivery, stomach ache, etc. . . . Mrs. Yeum Vanna, 30 years old, had eight in her family but is now a widow and lives alone. She works in the obstetrics ward helping the busy midwives.

Certain sights remained with me. A woman in her early twenties lies on one of the beds—a thin straw mat spread across a plywood board suspended on a rusty frame. Her face is pale; she is suffering from a combination of Beri-Beri (serious vitamin B deficiency), internal bacterial infection and high fever.

Hidden land mine

On another cot a young man bears pain with typical Cambodian stoicism. He has walked on a hidden land mine while trying to cross the Thai border in search of food, he tells an interpreter, and he worries about his family who are still in Cambodia, waiting for him.

My students have shared with me their hopes, fears, past experiences and their present lives. Mr. Tang Khl works in the rehabilitation ward, is about 21 and was in my interpreter's class. He expresses himself simply and honestly: "When I meet the patient I remind my family was lost by war fire. Before I live here, I suffer a lot of difficulty in my life. Why, because in that time my country make me homeless. Live in the wild jungle—when people have diseases, always die, no medicine. Had more hard work to do every day . . . no freedom. In last I escaped from Cambodia and reached Thailand to find freedom and humanism. I wish I can live in peace country in future time. I don't like to meet the war once; it is very terrible."

"I imagined I heard thunder . . . someone explained it was mortar fire and mines exploding."

These imprisoned yet kind, respectful, hopeful refugees are very grateful for every bit of help we give them and for whatever assistance we bestow on them. When someone asks me if it was worth the effort, and whether the Khmer refugees deserve our attention and support, I simply show them a letter: "Very happy when I first saw farang (foreigners, usually Americans) . . . but before I finish I wish the god help the farang, all the farang who have helped the Khmer refugees become fine all the time."

Eat Your Toyota

by Peter Frost

As our annual trade deficit with Japan rises from $16 billion dollars a year to a projected $25 billion, calls for a protectionist trade policy can be expected to increase. Labor Day speakers in our own beloved Pittsfield this fall have already argued that "It's about time the government of this country started taking care of its own citizens first. I'm tired of hearing how proficient the Japanese worker is . . . Sometimes I wonder who won the Second World War." Meanwhile newspapers have splashed across the country photographs of an angry unemployed auto-worker holding aloft a placard which says simply, "Eat Your Toyota."

Contrary to belief . . .

Like most simple solutions, this gut level call for protectionism is based on a good deal of factual misinformation. For example:

(1) Japanese wages are not low. Certainly there are a large number of exploited workers, particularly women who are expected to work for only a few years at low rates before marrying and becoming mothers. Yet a recent article in one of Japan's top magazines has claimed that in real, after tax, take-home pay, Japanese blue collar workers get one-and-a-half to two times US wages. I wouldn't go that far, but neither would I look to cheap wages as the source of our trade deficits with Japan.

(2) Japanese don't dump exports. While the 55-fold increase in the Japanese economy since the 1950's has obviously greatly expanded the volume of Japanese exports sold in this country, trade now represents a lower percentage of GNP than it did before the war. The cheap and efficient shipping. Her population is seventh biggest in the world—highly intelligent and disciplined, and still heavily concentrated in the so-called productive (15-55 year old) age group. For obvious reasons, then, Japan has simply caught up to the West in ways that several other Asian countries seem to do.

Cost of success

Part of the growth, on the other hand, has come at enormous social cost. Pollution controls are now among the tightest in the world, yet there are still places in crowded Japan that are not pleasant in which to live. Old folks, about to rise from an abnormally low 8 percent of the population to Western 15 percent plus levels, will need greatly expanded services. Space problems make housing very tight; national budget deficits are relatively greater than our own. Above all, Japanese are acutely aware that they are disliked throughout the world. They believe that they face a series of domestic and international crises, and hence they are reluctant to stop pushing simply because we Americans feel the pain.

Spend for friends

So what should we do? As former Ambassador Ingersoll stated at Convocation, restricting Japanese imports is hardly the answer. Japan's trade surplus with us, he noted, is no greater than our own surplus with Europe. Any retaliatory legislation we pass against Japan—even the so-called "voluntary" restrictions we seem fond of negotiating—can easily be turned back against us by the Europeans. It is also true, Ambassador Ingersoll pointed out, that Japan's overall trade balance (i.e. not just its American account) has not percentage is perhaps twice ours (10 percent vs. 5 percent), but lower than that of many European countries. As Boston Consul-General Iguchi Takeo pointed out in my class, moreover, formal complaints of price fixing and the like have rarely resulted in convictions. Last summer's allegations of industrial spying suggest that there are some rotten apples in the Japanese export basket, but this explanation by itself won't do.

"Expel the barbarian"

(3) Imports are also not unfairly restricted. Until very recently, Japan did indeed have a host of laws making imports difficult. The famous Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI) also explicitly followed a jo-i ("expel the barbarian") strategy. Most of these restrictions, on the other hand, have now been eliminated as a result of Japan's membership in the OECD trading community. The talk of "invisible barriers," I maintain, has more to do with the low quality and poor marketing efforts of many American manufacturers than with any conscious conspiracy.

(4) Finally, Japanese are hardly grim workaholics. Admittedly Japanese work so hard that we Americans often wonder if they are "creative." Yet it is also true that businesses annually spend over thirteen billion dollars on entertainment. Every American who goes to Japan and learns a little Japanese winds up having a great deal of fun.

A Miracle with costs

If these half-true oversimplifications don't help explain Japan's "economic miracle," what does? A partial answer, I tried to suggest at Convocation, is simply that Japan is now reaching her long delayed potential. Ideally located in that temperature zone in which are found today's (if not tomorrow's) major industrial areas, Japan can easily move raw materials and finished goods by always been healthy. We have to pay a little bit, he stated, if we want to have friends in the world.

Fewer far salaries

That hardly means sitting on our hands. Every single Convocation panelist thought that we Americans could work harder. More Williams students could go into manufacturing careers rather than aiming for "megabucks" as lawyers or bankers. Top management could deal themselves fewer far salaries (Mr. Morita of Sony is quite acid on this point). American workers could strike less—provided their real needs were met. American businesses could be required to use their Reagan tax breaks for recapitalization, rather than diverting them (as Convocation Speaker Ingersoll pointed out) into other, more profitable investments. We need to plan, to save and to produce.

Interest rates, again

More specifically, we need to reduce our budget deficits. In an interesting article in last summer's Foreign Affairs, trade specialist C. Fred Bergsten points out that our Japanese trade problem lies rooted in an unfavorable exchange rate with Japan. Unlike the Japanese, Bergsten says, we Americans try to solve our huge national budget deficits both by borrowing on domestic money markets and by holding interest rates even higher than this pressure might make them so as to guard against inflation.

As a result, Bergsten argues, the dollar has become a valuable currency to invest in. This drives its value up to a 250 yen per dollar exchange rate rather than a 180 yen per dollar rate more truly competitive for trade. To put this another way, our dollar buys so many yen today that Japanese imports are cheap, while American exports to Japan are costly. Bergsten suggests a number of admininistrative measures that the Japanese and American governments might take to change this rate. After all, he points out, the Japanese themselves have equally horrendous deficits, yet interest rates stay low. He argues that both governments can restrict capital flows between our countries without either damaging the basic principle of low tariffs, or engaging in the kinds of public pressure for restrictions that have made Americans so unpopular in Japan.

Renouncing war

Reading his article, on the other hand, got me thinking about a more basic cause of the American budget deficit. Early in 1946, General Douglas MacArthur, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers in Japan, ordered an appalled Japanese government to accept a largely American written draft of a new Japanese constitution. Article 9 of this 1947 document claimed that the "Japanese people forever renounce war as an instrument of national policy . . . land, sea and air forces, as well as other war potential, shall never be maintained." Apparently MacArthur wrote this article to keep the present Japanese Emperor from being deposed and tried as a war criminal by the angry Allied Powers.

Cold War heats up

As the Cold War heated up, both Americans and Japanese began to wonder if disarmament was a good idea. Since then, there has been a hot debate on the question of whether or not Japan has an inherent right to a "Self-Defense Force." Presently a compromise has been reached whereby military forces will be maintained, but the military budget will not exceed one percent of the total GNP.

As Ambassador Okawara pointed out at Convocation, even the informal one percent ceiling allows Japan to have the eighth largest military budget in the world. Similarly, an expanding economy, he boasted, permits annual military increases larger than those for most NATO countries. For our purposes, however, the key point is that Japan's expenditures for military affairs are kept below one percent of the total Gross National Product. In percentage terms, the U.S. figures are five to six times as great.

Exactly what effect this different level of military expenditure has on our two economies is unclear. In his new book crediting Japan's growth on MITI's effective policies, for example, Chalmers Johnson argues that countries such as South Korea that spend a high percentage of the GNP on military affairs do well economically, while countries with lower military budgets often do not. In Asia's New Giant, on the other hand, Editors Ohkawa and Rosovsky assert that low defense spending adds two percent per year to Japan's growth rate. In their view, military spending is wasteful.

Lowered tax burdens

Personally, I'm of the Ohkawa-Rosovsky persuasion. To me, Japan's low defense budget helps keep government expenditures a relatively small part of the GNP—some say 26 percent vs. the US 36 percent and Great Britain's 46 percent. This tends to put more money into the capitalization of those industries competing for export markets. It lowers the tax burden so that Japanese workers' take-home pay can in fact buy as much or more than American workers'. Labor power is used more productively, research and development concentrates on the civilian sector, and fewer gallons of imported fuel are consumed on military maneuvers.

If I were running the country, in other words, I'd look to budget cuts rather than protectionist tariffs to solve our current deficit with Japan. To protect our security, I'd try to lower the deficit, hoping to reduce interest rates, to drop the value of the dollar, and hence to help our export industries to grow. To put this another way, I wouldn't rearm for security reasons if it stopped equally vital industrial retooling. Nor would I add billions to our defense budget if this simply added billions to our Japanese trade deficit. Eat your Toyota? I'd rather eat a tank . . .

Registrar channels course changes

by Derede Arthur

Tuesday, Sept. 14, 3:50 PM—Dozens of card-clutching students filled the Registrar's Office in Hopkins Hall, elbowing their way toward the main counter where a beleaguered staff member checked for faculty signatures. Behind her, boxes filled with previously received drop-add cards covered several office desks, testifying that the five-member registration staff will be busy for weeks to come.

George Howard, Registrar of Williams for the past fifteen years, later estimated that two out of three students made some sort of schedule alteration. Many of these, he noted, changed three or more of their courses, labs, or conferences, leaving the registration staff with several thousand drop-add cards to sort out and process through the computer.

Most hectic weeks

Margaret Garrison, a five-year veteran of the Registrar's Office, observed that the weeks of course changes and schedule sorting are the "most hectic" of the semester for the staff. Registrar Howard agreed, "You have to be an optimist, because you always have to hope that next time it'll be a little better than last time."

Despite the weeks of frantic activity, Howard feels that the Williams system of scheduling functions well, providing the most efficient means of insuring that the faculty quickly knows precisely which students are in their classes. Wesleyan and certain other colleges, Howard noted, do not schedule their students at all, thus leaving professors with sometimes unwieldy class sizes and only a hazy notion of which students are really taking their courses.

Faculty tardiness

The weeks immediately following final exams are also busy and difficult ones for Howard and his staff. Faculty members do not always turn in their grades within the requisite four days following the end of exams, and the Registrar's Office must wait until all grades are in before they can begin computer processing. Howard asserts that his highest priority is to get grades to the students as soon as possible.

One of the greatest problems at the end of the semester, Howard noted, is the delay caused by professors' granting extensions to students without approval by one of the deans. The confusion and delays created by this situation, Howard said, could be avoided if professors accepted only the deans' extensions. The Dean's Office informs the Registrar which students' work will be completed late, and with this knowledge, Howard and his staff can begin the computer processing which would otherwise be delayed.

Continual checking

In addition to these beginning- and end-of-the-year responsibilities, the Registrar's Office continually checks records to see that students are meeting the necessary requirements for graduation. Howard characterizes the responsibilities of his office as "a job where in effect you're reporting to 2200 people—students and faculty."

Elvis Costello:
'A more mature and vulnerable artist'

by Cheri Goulet

Elvis Costello's new album, Imperial Bedroom, is a definite must for any discriminating music collector. If you're already an Elvis fan, this should be the top priority on the list of albums to purchase. If you're not, this one may change your mind.

Costello's critical insights on society are still as perceptive as ever. Now, however, they're tempered with an ironic acceptance of his own human foibles. The picture presented is one of a more mature and vulnerable artist.

Costello realizes the necessity of a return to emotionalism and recognition of the need for sympathetic relationships. Two of his songs are followed by the tag "PS... I love you" and the "Human Hands" cut is a blatant declaration of devotion ("When I put my foot in my mouth

/and you begin to doubt that it's you I'm dreaming about/Do I have to draw you a diagram/All I ever want is to fall into your human hands.")

Yet this hasn't totally blunted his critical observations on humanity. "Man Out of Time" openly attacks the hypocrisy of the upper class and its desire for power at the cost of human feeling, and "You Little Fool" seriously undermines the romantic notion of puppy love.

The presence of the lyrics on the inner sleeve is a great help in really recognizing the full range of Costello's wit.

Musically, the album is incredibly cohesive. While there are no "rockers" along the lines of "Pump It Up" or "Red Shoes," the majority of the songs are upbeat. The score of "The Long Honeymoon," with its accordions reminiscent of Paris and love, provides the perfect diametric backdrop for lyrics dealing with marital infidelity.

Costello has also broadened his instrumentals by adding orchestral arrangements in various spots. Perhaps the best juxtaposition occurs in "Man Out of Time," opening and ending with blaring guitar riffs and the sound of someone screaming, echoing the frustration of the writer with society and mimicking the differences between interior feelings and exterior facades.

The result is a more personal glimpse of Elvis Costello. All in all, Imperial Bedroom ranks as one of the best albums of the season.

$24,000 disparity

College Council caught short handed

by Laura Seligsohn

Student groups may have to tighten their financial belts this year, as College Council Treasurer John Small '83 announced at last week's Council meeting that funding requests will outweigh grants by a whopping $24,000, approximately one-fifth of the Council's total outlay.

Small blamed the gap on a rise in student publications, a 26 percent jump in requests, and a $66 Student Activities Tax which Small considers too low.

Picking up from last year, the Council also considered the recommendations of the Elections Committee for the Winter Study and Athletic committees.

Slate rejected

Concerned with the lack of evidence that the Elections Committee had applied "a consistent criterion for selection," as President Stuart "Smokey" Robinson '83 described it, the Council opposed the Elections Committee recommendations for the Athletics Committee, nine votes to seven, with three abstentions.

The rejection of the recommendation means that the Elections Committee must review all of the Athletics Committee candidates. The Elections Committee must submit new, or better justified, recommendations to the entire Council this week.

In other business, the Council briefly considered and approved Student Handbook revisions proposed in the Colby Committee report, "Recommendations from the Student Discipline Procedures Review Committee." After discussion of the Council's role in the new Housing Committee, a subcommittee of the CUL, Robinson closed the meeting with a plea for better attendance at CC meetings.

Council's hands tied

"It is important that members attend and report back to their constituents. Without a quorum (17 members), our hands are tied behind our backs." On a more positive note, Robinson offered his ideas for some "new direction" in the C.C. He urged that Council members take "a more active approach in the student body." Noting that "ignorance often gets us into trouble," Robinson stressed the importance of the C.C.'s educational role, suggesting more town meetings and "a half-hour radio show dealing with issues on and off campus that concern students."

Faculty gets "rich uncle"

by Brett McDonnell and Brett Green

Many people dream of having a rich relative leave them a large inheritance in his will. For the Williams faculty that dream is coming true, and that rich relative is the Class of '58.

The faculty learned Wednesday at its first Meeting that the Class of '58 is planning to donate $1,250,000 for "faculty enhancement" as its twenty-fifth reunion gift. The faculty was asked to come up with some ideas about what to do with the money.

One immediate suggestion was to use the money to pay possible back taxes. One way the College compensates some faculty members is by providing low-cost housing. The IRS is now considering charging back taxes on the money saved by those faculty members.

The IRS has not decided yet whether to try to collect those taxes. Commented Williams President John W. Chandler: "We are worried, but we haven't taken any pre-emptive strike."

chapel you." The murders thereby produced a "common vocabulary of male violence towards women."

The fear of male violence symbolized by these murders "has contributed to modern women's sense of vulnerability" and "constantly intrudes in urban woman's consciousness," according to Walkowitz. This fear is exploited in order to "promote female passivity" and to invest male domination with a powerful mystique.

Fear and loathing

In addition, the incident highlighted the sordid conditions of the lower class East End and soon grew to symbolize social unrest. Although the lower class expressed some sympathy for the victims, there was "fear and loathing of the victims" by members of the middle class. Soon the East End had become a "sideshow for the West End" as police and amateur detectives prowled the streets and vigilante patrols sprang up.

Walkowitz concluded that the Ripper case exploded into a "morality tale of stark proportions" in which disobedient women found that "the wages of sin were death."

Harriers take two

Ephs 'outkick' Panthers

by Mark Averitt

Junior John Nelson was outkicked by Middlebury's Tom Van der Water for second place at the finish of Saturday's home-opening meet of the Williams men's cross country season, but Middlebury's one-two finish was offset by Williams' depth as the Ephmen won 28-29 Saturday.

Junior Brian Angle held off a Panther challenger and then passed another in the last 200 yards of the 4.77 mile race. Although he was sixth for Williams and ninth overall, his dramatic move provided the victory margin.

Dan Riley '83 took fourth, Bennett Yort '84 was sixth, freshman Ian Brzezinski was seventh and senior Lyman Casey finished eighth.

Surprising finish

The race was closer than Williams expected. The surprise was attributed to a very hard week of training which tired the Ephmen. The team ran eleven miles Friday before the race.

"The practice killed us today, but will help us in the long run," commented Steve Cagulet '83.

Co-captain Bo Parker '84, sidelined for the meet due to an arch injury, may have best summed up Saturday's race: "They were just better than we expected."

First victory

Earlier in the week, Williams opened its season with an easy 18-44 win over North Adams State on the Mohawks' 5.2 mile course. Riley finished first for Williams, followed by Nelson and Angle. Yort and Brzezinski also scored for Williams.

The squad's record is now 2-0. Head Coach Peter Farwell expects the squad, which finished 1981 with a 9-5 record, to be one of the best Div. III teams in the region. Last year's top five returned and, with the addition of 1980's top runner, Bo Parker, the team is seeking a big season.

Bennett Yort '84 finished sixth in Saturday's win over Middlebury.

Volleyball wears down Marist

by Sarah Griffiths

In the opening game of the season, the women's volleyball team defeated both Marist College and Vassar College at Vassar Sunday afternoon.

The first game in the match against Marist was a 15-8 loss for the Ephwomen. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin felt that the loss was due to her players being nervous and unsettled.

Williams regained control in the second game and won 15-7. The deciding game of the match was a blowout with the Ephs winning 15-0.

Against Vassar, Williams kept up their strong level of play and defeated them two games straight, 15-8, 15-5. Helping the team to victory was the serving power of starting freshman Maria Villano and the smooth hitting of seniors Kathleen Gilmore and Lisa Pepe. Mary Hickcox '86 helped carry out setting responsibilities and keep the team together. Junior Carol Dorfman contributed with both her setting and hitting.

The team's next game will be against the University of Connecticut and Smith College at U.Conn. tonight.

Battleground at Middlebury

Football offensive promises action

by Robert Tercek

Football fans can look forward to a tough game this weekend as the Williams gridders face traditional rival Middlebury in their season opener. The Ephmen's 27-7 spotter victory last season tarnished an otherwise perfect record for the Panthers, and Williams should expect a team hungry for revenge at Middlebury.

The contest is particularly interesting because of the similarities in football programs; Head Coach Bob Odell calls it a "mirror image game. We have adopted the Wing T formation entirely now, and that's also Middlebury's formation." With both offenses running identical backfield formations, success in the contest depends more on quality execution than strategy. And as Odell points out, execution in early games is always complicated by mistakes, penalties and fumbles at inopportune moments.

Both teams must contend with a lack of depth as well. Like Williams, Middlebury saw a number of starters graduate, and will call on younger, less experienced players to man key posts, especially on offensive and defensive lines.

Football fans can expect plenty of action in these areas:

Passing Game

As both teams vie for control of the air, the passing attack will become a critical factor. Williams' quarterback Scott Garabedian '83 will look for split ends Marc Hummon '84 and Paul Meeks '85 as well as tight ends John McCarthy '84 and Paul Coleman '85 to receive.

An injury to B. J. Connolly '84 solved Odell's quarterback dilemma. Connolly was hurt in an intra-squad scrimmage on Thursday and is questionable for Saturday.

Middlebury boasts strength in its defensive secondary with three of four starters returning, and their traditionally tight pass coverage will pose a major obstacle for the Ephmen. However, the Panthers are missing linebacker Bill Genovese, who was named defensive player of the year in New England last season.

Offensive Backfield

Both teams will look to proven top performers to lead their offensive attack. Middlebury has lost quarterback Jim Loveys and split end Beau Coash, but their leading rusher, co-captain Mark Conroy, returns to his halfback post, as does fullback John Weeks. The other halfback slot will be filled by one of three experienced backs. Williams plans to match them with a triple threat of its own. Juniors Jeff Congden and Sean Crotty return to the backfield with speed and size. Sophomore halfback Ted Thomas, a bright performer last season, adds his ball-carrying ability to the offensive effort.

field hockey:

Constant attack and good passing led to a 4-0 victory over Vassar for the field hockey team in their first game on Thursday.

Co-captain Bea Fuller '83 scored twice and Mary Pyncheon '83 and Sue Harrington '84 added single tallies for the Ephwomen.

"We were constantly on the attack so we didn't have to play much defense," said Coach Chris Larson Mason, "but when we had to, we played well on defense, too."

"We still have a lot to work on," said Mason, "but I'm optimistic about this season." Williams plays Skidmore tomorrow.

Worldwide competition

Meanwhile, Coach Mason and alumna Leslie Milne have been chosen for the U.S. team in the American Cup international field hockey competition.

women's cross country:

The Women's Cross Country team finished third in their first meet of the season Saturday at Middlebury. The day's victor was the host team, scoring 43 points, followed by Bates with 50 points. Williams finished the 2.8 mile course with 57 points and Albany State placed fourth with 70 points.

Co-Captain Susan Bragdon '83 was the top Williams finisher, placing sixth with a time of 18:43. Freshman Mary Keller was one second behind her in seventh place. Lynn Vendinello '84 finished thirteenth—her time was 18:57. Susan Flynn '85 and Liz Moore '85 completed the course with times of 19:11 and 19:24, respectively, putting them in the Williams 'top five' with 15th and 16th places at the Middlebury meet.

Soccer:

Men shut out opponents

by David Woodworth

Doug McKenney '85 scored two goals and five other players chipped in with one each as the varsity soccer squad crushed their alumni counterparts on Saturday by an 8-0 score. Seniors Mark Koenig, Jeff Sutton, Austin Lehr, Aytac Apaydin and Junior Eric Stein all got into the scoring column, while goalkeeper Kenny Rhodes '85 and Ted Murphy '85 combined on the shutout.

The match was no contest from the outset, as Koenig, Sutton, and Lehr all tallied before the half, with another goal coming off the foot of an alumni fullback to make it 4-0 at the intermission. With the outcome no longer in doubt, the remainder of the game was devoted to showing off in front of the women's squad.

In a more serious scrimmage last Monday, Williams defeated London A.F.A. by a count of 3-0. McKenney again had two goals and Lehr had the other, while Rhodes and Murphy again blanked their opponents.

Of his team's impressive performances in the preseason, Russo commented, "I'm a bit skeptical of the lopsided results, because we may have caught our opponents on off-peak performances. I'm obviously quite pleased with our efforts so far, but

Ephwomen grab control

by Ted Johann

The women's soccer team traveled to Skidmore today, hoping to equal their impressive performance in a 2-1 win against Vassar on Sunday.

The first few minutes of Sunday's game moved slowly, as each team tentatively checked out the other. But ten minutes into the period, the Williams squad firmly grabbed control; and thoroughly outplayed the visiting team for the remainder of the half.

Co-captain Becky Baugh '83 broke the scoring ice 15 minutes into the game, taking a fine cross pass from Carrie Bradley '84 and pushing it by the Vassar goalie into the left side of the net. That goal was followed three minutes later by a powerful shot from Andrea Raphael '86, and the Ephwomen seemed ready to blow the game open.

The Ephwomen missed some good scoring opportunities in the game. Baugh said that this will not be the case in the future, as "it was only the team's second time playing together, and all we need is a little more practice."

In the judgment of both players and coaches, Williams let up some in the second half, and the result was that the women from Vassar gained some control. But the defense, especially sweeper Karen Montzka '85, continued to play steadily. Thus, Vassar was not able to score until five minutes were left in the game.

Deans restrict all-College parties

All-college parties will be restricted to the Greylock and Mission Park dining areas, according to a letter to house presidents issued last week by Dean of Freshmen Chris Roosenraad. The letter, which cited noise levels, fire hazards, and damage to the physical plant as problems with other locations, followed the early closing of the Dodd Black and White Party last Saturday.

Many house presidents were taken aback by the letter, which they received on Wednesday, since they had had dinner with Deans O'Connor and Kenyatta the previous evening and the subject of all-college parties was never raised.

Spencer-Brooks president Gemma Fontanella commented: "The main problem I see is the way they handled it. I think it would have been better if they'd mentioned it at the meeting so we could have given our reaction."

A-Gar-Wood president Richard Cardinale's reaction was even stronger. "My initial reaction, and it's stayed with me, is one of contempt. We met with the Deans on Tuesday and no one said a thing. I don't like the deceptiveness."

Social life reduced

Many presidents predicted that this announcement will mean a less active all-campus social life, because, as Fitch-Currier president Christine Young put it, "limiting it to Mission Park and Greylock limits the kinds of parties you can have... Attendance will drop, because people will get sick of going to the same two places." Fontanella guessed that the school would see "more small parties, which in a way might be better."

Most expressed agreement with the reasons for the letter, especially the need to obey fire regulations which limit the number of people allowed in one room. But some had doubts about the ways in which those rules would be enforced. "Fire regulations, fine," said Fontanella. "But some parties start out small, and then grow, so Security shuts them down."

Roosenraad disagrees

Roosenraad feels that much of the alarm is unwarranted. He describes the failure of the Deans to inform house presidents of the Deans' intent on Tuesday as "a foul-up in communications." As for the letter, he said, "We didn't see it as much of a change." He defined all-campus parties as those for which there is "no qualification other than 'you are a Williams student.' Essentially, in those cases, the number of potential partygoers equals the student body."

Roosenraad emphasized that the letter is not meant to discourage informal gatherings. "We understand completely that there are going to be spontaneous events. We are not cracking down on spontaneity."

What concern the Deans are the fire and noise problems exemplified by last week's Dodd party. Complaints about noise were not limited to that party; Roosenraad described noise from Dodd as "an ongoing problem." He wrote his letter partially in response to that problem.

Excitable boy Warren Zevon excited a sell-out crowd in Chapin Hall last Thursday. See review, page 11. (Farley)

Faculty gets cool million

by Jack Mayher

The Class of 1958 plans to donate over one million dollars to the College for faculty development. The $1.25 million gift, entitled "The Class of 1958 President's Fund for Faculty Enhancement," is the largest 25th reunion gift in the history of the College.

Although the entire amount has not been raised, the administration is confident that the goal will easily be reached. The Class of '58 is the "best organized class" that Associate Director of Development Russ Carpenter has worked with.

The fund will be set up as an endowment, so that it will benefit the College indefinitely. The income will be at the President's disposal "to promote the professional growth and personal well-being of the members of the faculty," according to a statement issued by President John Chandier.

The President can use the fund to support the faculty's "professional development and their work as teachers and scholars," including "the purchase of scientific equipment essential to a faculty member's research... travel related to the development of new courses or the enrichment of established courses... for paid leaves and assistance with publication of books and articles," according to Chandier.

The fund may also attend to the personal needs of the faculty, such as cases of catas-

King's smashed, Log tightened

by Philip Busch

A Williams freshman has been charged with several offenses, and the Log closed indefinitely to students under 20 in the wake of a break-in late Tuesday night at King's Liquor Store on Spring Street.

At 12:20 a.m. on Wednesday morning, a Spring Street resident notified Williamstown Police of an apparent break-in at King's. Two officers responded and arrested the student outside Lasell Gymnasium.

"Really weird"

"Apparently someone kicked the window in to procure some beverages," said King's owner Jerry Smith. "Some display material was also taken."

Smith estimated the damage to his window at $1,000, and said that insurance would cover the loss.

"It was really weird," said eyewitness Phil Walsh '85. "I was outside Colonial (Pizza) and I saw this kid walking slowly up Spring Street with one of those big three-foot plastic Heineken cans under his coat. Then a Williamstown police car pulled up and slammed on its brakes right in front of Lasell. These two cops jumped out and sort of tackled him. He was lying on his stomach and they were straddling him and handcuffing him. It looked like he had some liquor too."

The arrested student was arraigned Wednesday morning in North Adams District Court and released on $250 cash bail, according to police.

"I feel badly"

The student pleaded not guilty to three offenses: breaking and entering in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony, larceny from a building, and willful damage to real property. The accused student had no comment about the incident. The student will be tried tomorrow in North Adams.

"I feel badly about this," commented Smith. "I hate to see someone get in trouble for this foolish thing." Since felonies are not civil matters, charges were automatically filed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Smith thus has no say on whether or not to press charges.

Log crackdown

Dean Cris Roosenraad had no comment on any possible College disciplinary proceedings against the student. He emphasized that students are fully liable for any violations of Massachusetts law.

"We do all that is necessary and appropriate to warn people to pay attention to their behavior on Spring Street," he said. Roosenraad noted that arrest of a student is very rare.

As a result of the King's break-in, explained Log manager Richard Olsen '82, no students under 20 years of age are being admitted to the Log. The new policy comes from the Dean's Office, according to Dean Roosenraad. The College hopes that by next week it can return to the policy of allowing minors into the Log but not allowing them to purchase alcohol.

This smashed window at King's Liquors led to criminal charges and a crackdown at the Log. (Farley)

The Williams Record

Initiative

Two new student publications will shortly make their debut on the Williams campus. The Record welcomes their appearance.

Given the enormous effort necessary to start a publication, the dedication of students who founded these projects is to be applauded.

Since the Record confines itself to campus issues, students can look forward to new journals covering events that reach beyond the College.

Germinal and the Republican, representing opposite political leanings, will provide an exciting interchange of ideas. An increase of political awareness and activity will be a boon to the College community.

Most importantly, the competition will raise the standards of all campus publications, which can only be beneficial for the papers and their readers.

Now, after the massacres of Sabra and Shatila, it is my belief that the slain will be recognized as the first citizens of a Palestinian state by those Israelis who in such great numbers have dared to speak the dreadful truth to their government: the army of Israel let the killers in. These Israelis will act to guarantee that such recognized as such by the growing number of shocked and shamed representatives of the world Jewish community. Rabbi Arnold Jacob Wolf of KAM—Isaiah synagogue in Chicago, speaking out of the profoundly humane traditions of Judaism, has already expressed the anguish and the hope of these Jews: "I believe with perfect faith that the bitter invasion of Lebanon has created the Palestinian state. I believe that the world will not permit another wandering people to be driven forth . . . with no place to go except home."

Now, after the massacres of Sabra and Shatila, it is my belief that the slain will be recognized as the first citizens of a Palestinian state by Americans who witnessed in terrible sadness the slaughter of people whom the US government was solemnly pledged to "safeguard." In the written agreement to evacuate the PLO from West Beirut the United States guaranteed the safety of noncombatants left behind "on the basis of assurances received from the government of Israel . . ."

The revulsion in America at the killings is heightened by this special responsibility. Why was more not done when Israel violated the Habib accord and occupied West Beirut? Could the US government do no more than just whine that it had been "misled" by Israel when the innocents were made vulnerable. Only by a very large act can we redeem our honor; the American people must work now to safeguard the Palestinian people in a Palestinian state.

Give us two good legs to stand on

by Dan Keating

There she is: the perfect Rhodes Scholar candidate. She's a brilliant student, a top-notch athlete, and a classy person. The shame is that she's not at Williams. When she took her tour here, she loved the Bronfman Science Center, adored the Sawyer Library, but got claustrophobia in Lasell Gymnasium and fled. Oh, well, another good student athlete lost.

Not all of these student athletes are lost. Tricia Hellman, who graduated last Spring, was a member of the U.S. Olympic Ski team, an award-winning psychology researcher, a cross country runner who qualified and ran in the Division III Nationals, a Sigma Phi member and a magna cum laude graduate with honors. She was the kind of student athlete whose contributions make Williams a place of excellence.

But how many applicants with her qualifications want to come to Williams? When a serious athlete sees our varsity basketball court, he shudders. Weightlifting is crucial now to compete in high-level athletics, yet our weight room is on the fifth floor of the squash building and inadequately stocked. If the women's of our champion-calibre student athletes here. But Williams must battle for these student athletes with Trinity, Wesleyan, Amherst, Tufts and many others who offer fine educations and competitive sports. How well equipped is Williams to attract these applicants away from our small college neighbors?

For years everyone at Williams has known that our athletic facilities need serious updating. But the excuse was that the money had always been prioritized towards immediate educational use.

The athletic programs at Williams are not based on near-professional athletes whose interests detract from the school's educational functional. The athletes here are student-athletes at the highest level as both students and athletes. There is no question that there is a suitable pool of student-athletes out there capable of filling our rosters and the dean's list.

This is not a plea for Williams to commit itself to bringing more athletes into the school. Williams' sports teams are doing well and will continue to do so. This plea is to make ourselves attractive to and men's crew happen to be lifting at the same time, there aren't enough bars to go around. Our Cole Field House has eight showers for the varsity and JV football teams, as well as the men's soccer program. The list goes on, and is not as important as the lack of commitment on the part of the school to change it.

" . . . there is a suitable pool of student athletes out there capable of filling our rosters and the Dean's List."

Only 50 percent of the students accepted to Williams come here. The students we lose are at the Ivy schools and other small colleges offering programs very similar to ours.

Much of the small college appeal is the opportunity to participate in school activities while maintaining a constructive academic atmosphere. It is that chance to compete without having to give up everything else that brings many the athletes who will most help us off the athletic field.

Those top-grade student-athletes are among the cream of the college applicant crop, and are wanted everywhere. Williams, with its sub-par facilities, loses too many of these top candidates.

By upgrading our athletic facilities, we can win back some of the best student-athletes. And in doing so, we will be getting excellent scholars as well. By neglecting a vital element of what makes small colleges appealing—the opportunity to compete in serious athletics while getting a great education—Williams has built an enormous head on top of legs that were last exercised sometime around 1872. It's about time we gave Williams a good pair of legs to stand on.

Econ center assists pioneering women

by Alleen Lachs and Elena Bertozzi

When Maria Lourdes Roberto entered the 6th grade in Manila, the Philippines, she had already made up her mind to learn economics. That was in 1965, seven years before President Ferdinand E. Marcos declared martial law over a country threatening revolution. This event heightened Maria's political awareness as it coincided with her active pursuit of study in the field of political economics; a career which led, four years later, to a career in the Ministry of Finance of the Philippine government.

The years preceding the action taken by her government in 1972 Maria describes as difficult—high inflation, high cost of living, and a distribution of wealth dividing the population into three categories: poor (60 percent), middle class (30 percent), and wealthy (10 percent). In her country, she explains, US influence was very strong: "We had become so westernized that everyone wanted to from Sri Lanka, Harvinder Kaur from Malaysia and Gayathri Ramachandran from India.

According to both Maria and Chandra the academic program at the center stresses analysis and applied economics, emphasizing the formation of policy for developing economies. In both Manila and Colombo, Sri Lanka, emphasis was placed on theory. For Maria, this is an important distinction because, as she explains, the Ministry of Finance of the Philippines expects to shift its emphasis to handle a greater number of policy decisions for financing government development projects. As the Assistant Planning Officer of the Ministry's Division of Foreign and Domestic Loans, Maria should be able to utilize the Center's training.

"We had become so westernized that everyone wanted to be American."

When asked, "Is it exceptional for a woman to hold a position of responsibility in the Philippines?" Maria cited only one other woman in another division of the government whose position was higher than her own. But she refers to herself as the product of a particular generation where the trend is for women to find jobs in the public sector. Maria understands this trend to be a response both to an increased cost of living and rapid development in her country. This demands that jobs of increasing skill be filled by whomever is qualified. For women who are less well educated (usually from for equal work. In fact, in the Research Department of the Central Bank where Chandra Perera is employed, six of the fourteen employees are women. Women and men are educated for free in the country's public schools.

All three women interviewed claim that job opportunities in the private sector for women in positions of responsibility are slim and salaries low. The higher paid private sector economic circle of Malaysia remains male dominated, says Harvinder Kaur. Harvinder states that women in her field are given equal opportunities for employment only in the public sector. Harvinder has worked for six and a half years in the Economic Planning Unit, a government agency which oversees and allocates funds for development projects and construction of low cost housing throughout Malaysia.

The Malaysian government is regulating the process of development very carefully, according to Harvinder. They are attempting to ensure that development takes place in a way which maintains Malaysian traditions and that their country is not overwhelmed by westernization. Malaysia maintains very strict trade restrictions, thereby ensuring that the American influence on their country is not too great.

The process of development in Malaysia must also take into account the heterogeneity of the population. There are many distinct cultural groups: Malays, Chinese, Indians and others. One of Harvinder's agency's tasks is to guarantee that "All the races must be looked after. We must develop all races equally."

Thousands of miles from home, all three women spoke of their countries with pride; they are anxious to return to utilize what they have learned in the U.S. Chandra was obliged to leave her home in Panadura (a rural town approximately the size of Williamstown 75 miles outside of Colombo) in order to complete an undergraduate degree in Public Finance and Taxation. This meant leaving the house she shares with her two brothers and their wives, her sister, and her sister's husband. Even this was a break from tradition—and to go to America

Guests when the bomb falls

by Greg Smith

With classwork and tests on your mind, you are probably not likely to worry too much about nuclear holocausts. Fortunately, someone has done the homework for you—the people at the Williamstown Nuclear Freeze Office. Freeze Office staffers have drawn up the following scenario of Williamstown in a nuclear attack evacuation.

Williamstown is considered a "safe" area in the Civil Defense's master plan to move bodies around. In the event of a nuclear crisis, 85,000 to 90,000 evacuees, mainly from Greenwich and New London, Conn., from Dalton and Pittsfield, Mass., and possibly from Troy, N.Y., will come to Williamstown. (Troy, Pittsfield and Greenwich, in particular, would be prime targets, because of G.E. plants located there.) The evacuees would come on Route 7 from southern Massachusetts and Connecticut, Routes 2 and 43 from New York, and Route 2 from central Massachusetts. If tever food, clothing, blankets, and other necessities he could. Local residents would supply the rest.

How long the evacuees would stay, whether local supermarkets, medical facilities, and police departments could handle the influx, and what the psychological toll would be on both the evacuees and the townsfolk remain unsolved.

Freeze Office

This is the picture drawn by the Williamstown Nuclear Freeze Office, a local group concerned with the effects of nuclear war.

The genesis of the Nuclear Freeze Office came with the Groundswell movement in January 1981, a time of awakening for Freeze advocates and environmentalists alike.

In the spring of this year, Judy Fitzgerald, a nurse now working for the Freeze movement, taught a course which she described as a workshop to train people to become activists, counter the anti-freeze forces' arguments, and learn about the Soviet Union were suddenly to launch a preemptive strike, the evacuees would have at most thirty minutes warning—insufficient time to evacuate. The plan would only work in an escalating crisis.

Life in the chapel

On arriving, the evacuees would stay in local homes, hospitals, schools, and other shelters. At Williams, they would be lodged in the field house, the chapel, classrooms, and other places. Each home would house ten evacuees for each person then living there. Each evacuee would be expected to bring what various aspects of the arms race. A cross section of society, from executives, to ministers, to housewives, took the course. From Groundswell and from that course came the core of people that opened the Williamstown Nuclear Freeze Office in May 1982.

The primary purpose of the Freeze Office is education—education about the arms race and the consequences of nuclear war.

Toward this end, the Nuclear Freeze Office will sponsor a series of events intended to educate

Winter Study down on the farm, third world style

by Kenneth Cooper

Many students use Winter Study for something more "down to earth" than the usual academic grind, but this year they can take the phrase more literally than usual—by spending a month farming on a jungle-covered Third World island.

The Environmental Studies Department will offer a trip to the South Asian country of Sri Lanka this January to study organic farming on the village level.

The trip will be led by Sam and Elizabeth Smith, who run the Caretaker Farm on Hancock Road in Williamstown. On September 19, the Smiths hosted an information program about the Sri Lanka trip at Caretaker Farm. Among those present were four visitors from Sri Lanka. At the opening of the gram Sam Smith stated that the trip offers students "the opportunity to see agriculture not from the window of a bus, but from the end of a hoe."

Mats and mosquitos

The emphasis of the trip will be on studying organic, or labor-intensive farming in Sri Lanka. However, this should not discourage students with little interest in agriculture. As Sam Smith put it, experiencing farming will "open up another perspective" for people interested in learning about a foreign culture. Smith also stated that "the best way to see the political and spiritual values of a nation is in the way people tend to their land."

Students who choose to go on the Sri Lanka trip will leave together, accompanied by the Smiths, at the beginning of Winter Study. The group will spend the first two days together at a central headquarters. On the third day they will spread out among 24 Sri Lankan districts and try to work with village farmers. Each student will work solely in the village that he chooses. The students will regroup at the end of January to discuss what they have learned and to return to the United States.

Those on the trip will experience all aspects of Sri Lankan life. This includes sleeping on mats nailed to the ground with mosquitos flying overhead. "There will be no danger to health," says professor of chemistry Bill Moomaw, "but it will be far from the comforts of Williams housing."

Spiritual agriculture

The trip will enable students to experience, first hand, a movement in Sri Lanka known as Sarvodaya. The Sarvodaya movement was a focal point of the program at Caretaker Farm. One of the Sri Lankan visitors, the Sarvodaya movement's Director of Development Education Harsha Navaratne, characterized Sarvodaya as an "agricultural movement that tries to look at the development of land through spiritual and cultural terms."

Navaratne added that the movement, which began following Sri Lanka's independence from Great Britain, "has built up harmony between people and has understood not to use things such as language or religion as barriers." The movement tries to achieve its aims by emphasizing sharing and a sense of community in the Sri Lankan farming villages.

Foundation fights defoliation

Getting to the root of the problem

by Brooke Hand

With the slash of an orange x, hundreds of elm trees with the insidious DED (Dutch Elm Disease) have been uprooted in numerous Eastern towns, and Williamstown is no exception. Bark beetles (disease transmitters) beware: as of January 1982, the newly formed Elm Tree Foundation has joined the town in launching a large scale attack on the disease in an attempt to revive the distinguished elm population which once lined the main streets.

Over the summer, Town Forester, Arborist and Superintendent of Insect Pest Control Robert McCarthy worked in conjunction with the trustees of the Foundation to remove about 60 dying trees and inject 80 others.

The three year save-the-elms plan was developed three years ago by Dr. Gerald Lanier, Professor of Forest Entomology at the State University of College of Environmental Science and Forestry in Syracuse, N.Y. The $88,000 needed to pay for Dr. Lanier's consultation fees, as well as materials, is being provided by the Foundation above and beyond the yearly-town budgeting for control of the disease.

The first step in the three part program consists of removing dead trees. Next, hopelessly diseased trees are injected with cacodylic acid, which acts as a trap for the native and European elm bark beetles living inside the trees. According to Mr. McCarthy, as many as ten million beetles within a large elm could be killed by the bark drying process. Multiply that estimate by 100 and one can get an idea of the destructive magnitude of the beetle population. Such a treatment prevents the beetles from multiplying at an alarming rate two to three years after the death of a diseased tree, which has contributed to the spread of the disease in the past.

Sticky traps also kill the beetles, luring the beetles away from the elms with their own aggregation pheromone. Bark beetles (disease transmitters) beware: as of January 1982, the newly formed Elm Tree Foundation has joined the town in launching a large scale attack on the disease in an attempt to revive the distinguished elm population which once lined the main streets.

The College has generously offered over three hundred trees from Hopkins Forest to replace dead ones. Forty new trees of ten different varieties, including sycamores, ashes, sugar maples, as well as new elms, have been planted in the core area of the town (the campus) since last spring. One of the oldest trees on campus, a 150 year old elm, was removed from the southeast corner of West College two weeks ago.

Elms have been known to survive for over 200 years, although the average life span of a completely healthy tree is 140-160 years. A hybrid ash will be planted in place of the 100ft. tall elm in front of the President's house and is expected to grow to a maximum of 80 ft. Other replacements for elms include two Bulmans which have been planted near Laseil Gym, two sugar maples in front of Hopkins Hall, a row of sycamores which will line the row houses, and several trees to be planted by the College on Latham and Meacham Streets.

McCarthy recalls the changes the dying of the elms has brought to Williamstown over the last generation. In the early forties 10,000 elms graced the streets of the town, with five rows along Main Street. The elms were a dominant feature of the landscape in the early 1900's before a storm around 1913, which brought many of them down.

"The town of Williamstown has reverted back to what it was when they started to plant trees (after the storm); we are starting once again to revitalize the vegetation after seventy years," commented Mr. McCarthy on the cyclic nature of the elm population.

Williamstown's battle against DED is viewed as a likely success but is not without complications, according to Winthrop Wassenar, a trustee of the foundation and Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds for the College. Owners of elms on private property have been negligent concerning state laws on removing dead trees, thus contributing to the spread of the beetle population. Surrounding towns have done little in the way of implementing similar programs, making permanent elimination of the disease over a widespread area difficult.

But, as Wassenar remarked, "Practically everyone in town has lost a favorite tree somewhere along the way," and the foundation's efforts to awaken the community's knowledge and concern about a long standing problem have succeeded in raising the needed money in six months. And disease or no disease, nature sees to it that all great trees must eventually come to an end.

As Dr. MacKenzie of the tree lab at the University of Massachusetts so succinctly summed it up (quoted by Mr. McCarthy): "The first one-hundred years they grow vigorously, the next one-hundred they just sit around, and the last three hundred years they fall apart."

Faculty face added tax

by E. A. Stanton

Colleges like Williams with substantial faculty housing programs could be forced to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in retroactive withholding taxes if the Internal Revenue Service wins a lawsuit filed against Amherst, Smith, Wellesley and Wesleyan.

The IRS contends that college housing rents there are below "fair market value," meaning that employees pay less rent than a non-college family would be willing to pay for the same living unit. According to this view, employees have been illegally receiving the difference as tax-free income in the form of subsidized housing. They must therefore pay the back taxes which should have been withheld from their paychecks.

"The colleges are protesting that the IRS is charging big city rents for suburban and rural areas," said William S. Reed, Vice President for Administration and Treasurer, "In evaluating the fair market value, they are using what the unit would go for in Boston as their yardstick."

"It is virtually impossible to determine the fair market value when a college is so dominant in a town that it sets the rents," Reed added. "We are hopeful that it won't be an issue at Williams. Our policy is to charge rents that are breakeven, so we don't subsidize them. I think our records are in good shape." The college has, however, been withholding additional money from paychecks for the past couple of years as a precaution.

No decision has yet been reached as to whether the College, or the individual faculty members, would be liable for payment of any back taxes in the case of a decision against Williams, according to Reed.

The IRS suit threatens colleges with strained finances and curtailed faculty housing. None of them wants to see faculty forced to move far off campus. The defendants are currently relying upon two proposals pending in Congress which would counteract the IRS plan.

The first bill states that for years preceding 1982, the difference between rent paid by an employee of an educational institution and the fair market value would not be subject to withholding if the college had a "reasonable basis" for not treating it as income for faculty members. As of December 31, 1981, the rent difference would not be considered income if the housing is on or near campus, the college charges rent which at least covers operating costs, and non-renting employees do not receive a living expense allowance in lieu of lodging.

The second bill proposes that a 1978 moratorium barring the IRS from additional taxing of employees' fringe benefits would specifically include the faculty housing differential. The moratorium expires December 31, 1983.

people about the consequences of nuclear war on Saturday, October 2. These events will include an informational fair and a potluck supper.

Evacuees arrive

To share in the festivities and dramatize the Federal Government's crisis relocation plans, thirty "evacuees" will arrive from Connecticut on Saturday morning. Their first engagement after arriving will be a meeting with North Adams mayor, Richard C. Lamb, at 1:00. At 3:00, the group will be in Williamstown for welcoming speeches at Town Hall by Selectwoman Anita Barker and by sundry candidates for public office.

Meanwhile, the Freeze Office will sponsor on Baxter lawn a fair of informational exhibits. The exhibits will include a demonstration of the effects of the 85,000 person influx that would seek refuge in Williamstown in the event of a nuclear war, a Jobs for Peace display, and a model cruise missile.

The day's events will end with a supper at the First Congregational Church. Featured guests will be Dr. Allan Krass, the night's main speaker, and filmmaker Robert Leppzer. Dr. Krass is Professor of Physics and Science Policy at Hampshire College in Amherst. An expert on military and commercial aspects of nuclear power and on nuclear weapons strategy, he has studied crisis relacation plans. Mr. Leppzer will show film clips of the June 12th pro-freeze rally in New York City; he plans to use the footage in "Choose Life," a documentary he will make on the Freeze movement.

Sunday's events will include an ecumenical service in Thompson Chapel and the annual Fall Foliage Parade in North Adams. In the parade, the Freeze Office will have a float, a full-size mock-up of a cruise missile mounted on a car.

Wesleyan

A housing crunch plaguing Wesleyan has left 71 students in temporary housing, including living rooms and one room triples. The "cot people," as the Wesleyan Argus dubbed them, are mostly sophomores who were wait-listed last spring. Although the College offered one-room doubles to all wait-listed students over the summer, most "expected something better to turn up" when they arrived on campus. The "cot people" anticipate finding permanent homes eventually, but some worry about academic consequences: "The time I would have used to settle into courses, I'm now going to spend playing moving woman . . . the Administration is playing Russian Roulette with our academic careers," complained Amy White '85. Carl Lindenann '84 was more disturbed—"I'm pissed enough to see a lawyer about it."

Amherst

Amherst's student center is also homeless after its current location was converted into a fine arts center. According to the Student, the Pratt Geology building is a prime candidate for a student center. Amherst president Julian Gibbs admitted Pratt was under consideration but added, "The Geology Department knows . . . that we would not change the use of Pratt without consulting them first." Gibbs explained that any building not plainly suited to its current use is being evaluated for future renovation, but all this is "very preliminary."

Bryn Mawr

"Thousands of dollars worth of chemicals" went down the drain at Bryn Mawr after a cable was accidentally severed by the contractor building a new gym there. Although college officials blamed carelessness on the part of electricians, they admitted that the College-drawn map of the site the workers were using omitted the 4160-volt cable. Biology professor Betty Twarog bemoaned the losses, many of which were "irreplaceable" student research projects. The incident was "very dismaying to morale," she added.

Bonds boost aid funds

by Ned Ladd

The well has not run dry on financial aid, according to Financial Aid Director Phillip Wick. Despite federal cutbacks and recent negative publicity, Williams can offer aid to those who need it. President Chandler noted that "because Williams never became as dependent on federal aid as other institutions, we're in as good a position as we were two years ago to help people."

Williams is largely self-sufficient in terms of Financial Aid Scholarships. Wick estimated that 80 percent of the $2.85 million in grant money awarded this year will come from within the College. The remaining 20 percent will be absorbed by state and federal programs which, although cut back, are still functioning.

However, under the present Administration in Washington, these programs are hardly safe. In reaction to more threatened cuts, President Chandler, as President of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities of Massachusetts, proposed that the state float tax-free bonds to replace lost federal aid. His proposal was met with approval and introduced as a bill into the Massachusetts legislature under Senator D'Amico, Chairman of the Senate Education Committee.

Many legislators initially opposed this bill because they felt it would be costly to the taxpayers. Chandler, through his lobbying efforts, explained that the Loan Authority would be wholly self-sufficient, and, as a result, cost the taxpayers nothing.

With the bill's eventual passage, the Massachusetts Student Loan Authority was born. Its primary purpose is to float state tax-free bonds and use the capital for loans to college students. This money would be available to qualified students at about 11% interest and on conditions that could provide for a long-term payback, according to Treasurer William Reed.

Bonds due for January

The first sale of bonds will take place in October. Williams is holding off until the second round sometime in January, because as Chandler put it, "We decided to wait and see how it goes." This means that the money will not be available until possibly second semester, but more likely not until next fall.

This money coupled with existing funds will put Williams in an excellent position to offer aid in the future, according to the Administration. For this reason, Director of Admissions Phillip Smith believes that Williams can maintain its commitment to an "aid-blind" admissions policy, although he admitted there have been demographic shifts in the composition of entering classes in recent years.

Negative publicity cited

However, he cited negative publicity rather than lack of funds as the chief cause of these shifts. Students from families with incomes less than $10,000 have almost totally disappeared from the admissions pool, according to Smith. He called this unfortunate because, "We could offer full aid to them if they applied."

Women's Center to open Friday

by E. A. Stanton

The first women's center for the Williams community will open with a reception Friday, in its newly refurbished permanent residence, Hardy House at 23 Bank St. The spacious three-story building will also serve as headquarters for the Feminist Alliance, Gay People's Union, Peer Health Counseling, and the Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

The center, initiated by the Feminist Alliance, was designed to foster community-oriented groups which would discuss or be sensitive to women's issues. "We really wanted to find an accessible space that would be open to all women," said Dean Mary

Kenyatta, "I think it has a lot of potential."

The renovation of Hardy House has solved space problems for the Feminist Alliance and other groups, but it has also extended the forum for women's issues to include all interested persons, according to Alliance Members. Ideally, the center will provide resources and support for women regardless of their political tendency or the degree of their commitment to political activity.

The house living room will be open to any student organizations who sign up in advance, and upper floor office space may be shared among groups who are understanding and supportive of the women's center. "I hope women and men will use this for many purposes and that it will be an open territory, not a privilege for one specific organization," said Dean Nancy McIntyre.

The Feminist Alliance has looked forward to the center's opening since last fall. A second-story room in Mears House has served as the Alliance's resource center for the past three years, but there was not enough room for its whole collection. Much material remained dispersed among several buildings. The expanded library will provide resources for Women's Studies research and for anyone with an interest in women's issues.

Because the small Mears room could not hold all active members at once, the Alliance had to reserve different meeting places each week. Now the group has its first adequate permanent headquarters.

Building for the arts

Williams will soon be more artsy than ever. Two of the three additions being constructed now—the Lawrence Hall and Adams Memorial Theatre additions—will greatly expand the offerings of the art and theatre departments. But more importantly, the expansion of the Williams College Museum of Art will allow world-class exhibitions to be shown here, which, together with the Clark Art Institute, will make Williams' reputation as a center for the arts much stronger.

"A lot of new space for the arts has been created in the last ten years," said College President John Chandler. "The construction of the Bernhard Music Center and the rehabilitation of Chapin Hall proved that Williams takes music seriously. And the Lawrence and AMT additions are part of a plan to give better facilities for art and theatre as well."

Williams' increased attention to the arts has attracted more attention and talented students, Chandler observed.

The Lawrence addition will cost $4.5 million and should be completed by this January. The exterior is virtually finished, Chandler said, but the art department will not be moving in until next summer. "That way it will be a leisurely process," he noted.

The Lawrence addition is a complex design, including galleries, classrooms and offices. But many of the original features designed by Charles Moore, the building's world-famous architect, were cut due to budgetary constraints. Moore also had an ambitious plan to combine a new gym with the Lawrence addition in an interrelated complex sprawling down Spring Street, but it was abandoned during the early planning stages because funding looked scarce. But a gym addition may soon be built after all.

The AMT addition, which cost $993,000, should be finished by next summer, but may be completed by June because the contractor is ahead of schedule. The addition will provide students with a permanent theatre for experimental productions for the first time.

An addition to the Faculty House is the third project currently underway on campus. The addition will expand the use of the Faculty House into an alumni center, a role the Log had not satisfactorily fulfilled. The addition is being

Bright future painted for Museum

by Michael Govan

With the completion of the new addition to Lawrence Hall and refurbishing of the existing building, Williamstown will become one of the most important centers for art history scholarship and exposure to fine arts in the nation.

the College Museum along with Chapin Library is part of a much broader resource center. The world-famous Clark museum, a stone's throw from the Williams campus, houses an outstanding permanent collection featuring one of the finest collections of 19th century French painting in the country. The Clark library is one of the ten best art libraries in North America. Next door to the Clark is the Regional Conservation Lab, doing restoration on art work for museums around the country. Both the Clark and College museums make extensive use of the lab.

... the most exciting space in Williamstown.

"The aggregation of these resources," said Director of the College museum Tom Krens, "can't be matched by very many places in this country: only Harvard, Yale and Princeton." Ironically, the existence of all these exceptional facilities in the same place is due almost entirely to chance. Robert Sterling Clark decided to put his museum in this sleepy New England village, not to complement Williams College so much as to protect his collection from nuclear fallout. The Conservation lab is independent of both the Clark and College Museums.

Most of these facilities are not new, and the Lawrence Hall addition itself is only a small part of this network, but, according to Krens, the addition "will act as a catalyst" to make efficient and widespread use of the resources. Further plans include creating a computerized directory or "database" of art objects and materials in the area. This would provide resources easily accessed not only from within the community but by other colleges and museums around the nation and the world.

Most importantly, the addition to the museum will provide a great amount of exhibition space, a total of thirteen galleries. Several will be used for student exhibitions; one will be designated entirely for student work. Regular faculty exhibitions will allow students to see faculty work. Other in-house shows will be related to specific art courses.

Dickensian spaces

One of the most interesting uses of the space will be for short-term shows relating to courses outside the art department. Several smaller galleries will be identified for this purpose. "The museum will act as a response mechanism to the curriculum," said Krens.

Krens envisions, for example, a course in the 19th century Dickens novel wanting an exhibition of English landscapes between 1850 and 1965. Pieces could be collected from the permanent collection, the Clark collection, or even outside sources. Krens said that classes could even be held in the gallery. Krens noted that "astonishing resources here in Williamstown" are not used by the community and College.

The new galleries will allow space for the creation of larger shows by students and faculty which would start at Williams and then travel to other museums. Some would be as great in scope as the recent Robert Morris exhibit, which began at the Clark and is now travelling.

Some shows would be rented from other galleries and shown at the college. Because of insufficient climate control and security, the College museum has never before been able to borrow from other collections.

Library Prisoners

Lawrence Hall is acknowledged to be the finest example of 19th century architecture at Williams. Built in 1846, it was used as the College library. The original design was apparently based on a novel French design for prisons: a "panopticon." The design facilitates efficient observation of prisoners from a viewing post in the center; the prison cells radiate outward. This was considered a huge psychological deterrent against misbehavior.

In Lawrence Hall, the head librarian's desk was placed in the center. Columns blocked the librarian's view of the stacks, but from his desk he could easily spot any student removing a book. (Similar renovations are now being considered for Sawyer Library.)

The wings were added to the building in 1899. The building was converted into a museum when another addition was added in 1926 (Stetson became the College library). The building underwent further renovations in 1928 and 1938.

Athletes and art

In the '70s the need for both an addition to the museum and improved athletic facilities became apparent. Architect Charles Moore was chosen to design the buildings. Moore's original design was a very innovative and ambitious plan to revitalize the entire area between Spring Street, the Berkshire Quad, and the Lansing Chapman rink.

"The early designs," said art professor E. J. Johnson, "were really quite marvellous." Since then the building has had a "muddled history."

Unfortunately, the bid for the project came in at $6 million, well over the combined art/athletic budget. The College decided that only the Lawrence addition would be built immediately since the funds for that project were more readily available.

Moore, one of the nation's more well-known architects, also designed the Dartmouth College museum. His designs for the Dartmouth museum were exhibited in a recent show of museum architecture at the Whitney Museum in New York.

Lost golf ball

The Lawrence Hall addition will probably never achieve that fame. The bid on Moore's original plans for the addition came in 75 percent over budget. The neo-classical design of the addition originally included such features as large screen walls, one incorporating the design of a renaissance sance Palladian window; an outdoor sculpture in the form of a giant golf ball; and an elaborate roof system with many skylights. But none of these features will exist in the completed building.

Square footage took precedence over architectural detail. Art department chairman Milo Beach explained that "looks, not function, were trimmed." Besides the galleries and general renovations to the existing structure, the addition will provide the art department with three more classrooms, a new lecture hall, a large slide room, and all-new offices.

The fun is gone

According to Johnson, the building may be one about which the architect Moore has "equivocal feelings." Much of Moore's architecture is based on an element of "fun."

"The fun is gone," said Johnson, noting especially the "light-heartedness" of the detail of the Palladian window screen which was cut out of the plan. Johnson expressed hope that some of these details, both functional and aesthetic, might be added at a later date.

One major architectural aspect of the building which was untouched by cuts is the spectacular atrium, which will form the entrance and staircase between the addition and the original structure. Professor Beach described it as a "magnetic space." Johnson called it "the most exciting space in Williamstown."

Alumni gifts power building drive

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

Al of the building going on around campus this year is impressive, but someone has to pay for it. Fortunately, the College's outstanding success with fund-raising, particularly among alumni, and its efficient planning have consistently allowed the College to raise most or all of the costs before construction even begins.

During the '81-'82 school year, Williams had the most successful fund-raising campaign of any comparable college in the nation, according to a study by an independent research group.

However, much of the money for the current projects—the additions to Lawrence Hall, the Faculty House and Adams Memorial Theatre—was raised during the Capital Campaign for the Seventies, a special fund-raising drive run by the Development Office from 1974 to 1980.

Director of Development John Pritchard estimated that alumni contributed 70 percent of the $51.1 million raised during the drive; the other 30 percent came from foundations and corporations. One-third of the money raised in the campaign has been devoted to current construction costs; the rest has been put into endowment, scholarships and professorships, Chandler said.

The price tag for the additions will be $4.5 million for Lawrence, $1.6 million for the Faculty House, and $993,000 for the AMT, according to Chandler.

Space or features

The original cost estimate for construction of the Lawrence project was $2.5 million, Chandler said. It went up to $2.7 million when the contractors realized how complex the design was, according to Treasurer William Reed. Thus the original design was cut to make the building affordable.

"It came down to a question of cutting square footage or cutting square footage or cutting some of the original architectural features," Chandler explained, "so the art department opted for the space."

Alumni covered most of Lawrence's cost overruns. One of the features which was scheduled to be cut was a roof skylight intended to permit natural lighting in a gallery; several alumni thought the skylight valuable enough to supply the $75,000 needed for its addition to the building, Chandler said.

The College faces no overrun costs for the AMT and Faculty House additions, Reed said, because the builder, who is building both, is under contract to bring them in for a set cost. Since both additions are fairly straight-forward designs with overruns unlikely, Reed explained, the contract is not unusual.

The College decided to allow the builder, Joseph Francese Co. of Pittsfield, to build the two additions at the same time because it was cheaper, Chandler said.

Earmarked gifts

A portion of the cost of each building will be put into an endowment to provide funds for their continued maintenance. The maintenance endowment cost was $1.3 million for Lawrence, $175,000 for the AMT, and $360,000 for the Faculty House.

"We require an endowment for the upkeep of all our buildings," said Chandler. "We're one of the few colleges that does. Most others build new buildings and then hope and pray they can afford it."

Funds given by donors can be earmarked for specific uses, like the Lawrence skylight, but are often given with no strings attached.

Theatre addition allows experiments

The theatre being built next to Adams Memorial Theatre will allow a greater variety and quality of experimental and student-directed productions than ever before, according to Theatre Department Chairman Jean-Bernard Bucky.

"We needed space for smaller-scale productions that would give students the opportunity to concentrate on doing a lot of shows with good facilities and ease of physical production," he said.

The addition is scheduled to be completed next summer and dedicated next fall, Bucky said. It will have one floor, containing the theatre itself, dressing rooms, restrooms, a lobby, a ticket booth and an entrance separate from the main AMT entrance.

The theatre will seat about 100 persons. The stage is a three-quarter shape which will extend out into the audience. The theatre also features a "substantial lighting system," Bucky said, and a relatively high roof. The acoustics are expected to be good, he added.

Carved out

The addition will be functionally and acoustically separate from the AMT, Bucky stressed, so that rehearsals and performances can go on simultaneously in both facilities. Previously, the theatre department used a downstairs room of the AMT for experimental productions, an arrangement

Big black box

The addition, which cost $818,000 for construction and $175,000 for its maintenance endowment, was funded chiefly by a gift from Sanford McCormick, father of Carolyn McCormick, a 1981 Williams graduate and theatre major.

But McCormick's original grant would have only funded "a big black box," Bucky noted, "which would not have solved the original problems." The College thus decided the additional features should be added.

"Nothing in the building is extravagant or simply decor," he claimed. "It will be relatively austere... but the final design is splendid. I'm satisfied."

BMC spurs music interest

More music majors, talent

by Katya Hokanson

Extra-curricular music interest has soared since the Bernhard Music Center, which houses the music department, was completed in 1979, according to Douglas Moore, professor of music.

More musicians have been attracted to Williams since the completion of Bernhard, says Moore, noting that there are eight music majors in the class of 1984, which was the first class to be able to use Bernhard's

Currier basement

Until Bernhard was built, the music department was housed mainly in the basement of Currier Hall, he said, with the Currier Ballroom serving as the Music 101 room. The seminar room was in the Chapel basement in what is now known as the Kuskin Room, and professors and students had to "load all our books and records onto shopping carts and go across Route 2" to get to the seminar room, Moore said.

The basement of Chapin housed one office and two to five practice rooms before the advent of Bernhard, and practice rooms also had to be used for music listening rooms. Bernhard now contains 25 practice rooms, as well as Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, a choral rehearsal hall, and an instrumental rehearsal hall.

Concerts now performed in Brooks-Rogers used to be performed in the Chapel, said Moore, and the paucity of recital halls in the past meant that a performance often prevented another group from rehearsing.

One of the workers was asked what he thought of Williams students. "I think they're nice, polite," he said, and then motioned towards another worker. "This guy can't keep his eyes off the girls."

Alumni gifts

"The College likes it when the gift is unrestricted," admitted Pritchard. "That way it can apply the gift as it sees fit. Often an individual is not concerned with the gift's use. That's an ideal situation, and it happens."

"But if a class or individual can specify that the gift will be used for, say a classroom that will immortalize their name," he continued, "that gives them an incentive to give the gift and for others in the class to help. There's a lot of appeal, it's a rallying point, when you can home in and be specific."

Chandler noted that the College advises potential donors as to what Williams' chief needs are.

Foundations and corporations also contribute towards the College's building and operating costs. The Kresge Foundation in Detroit, which helped fund the Lawrence addition, is dedicated solely to funding the construction of buildings, including colleges and hospitals. Other foundations exist which promote sciences and the arts. But the Kresge money didn't come as a flat-out grant.

Over the top

"They help with the final phase of fund-raising at the end of a campaign," Reed explained. "They say, 'if you've raised X amount, we'll take you over the top.'"

The Development Office writes grant proposals to foundations based on its extensive library, which lists various kinds of special-interest foundations, Pritchard said. Chandler explained that which foundation the College approaches for money "depends a lot on who (in the College) knows whom in what organization... It's a complex process."

Corporations contributed to the building fund as well. Pritchard said one of their motives is to develop ties to potential employees. Some corporations have a special interest in science buildings, Reed noted.

Financial planning begins when construction plans are first being made, usually three to four years before the building is completed, according to Reed. The College Provost, J. Hodge Markgraf, is a key figure in making projections on costs and endowment and gift income, Chandler said.

The Trustee Budget Committee has final say over the project's financing and the Trustee Buildings and Grounds Committee approves the project's practicality and its setting on campus. An officer in the Development Office is then appointed to oversee the fund-raising campaign.

Old boy network

The Development Office's effort is aided by a group of alumni called the Development Council, headed by Thom Pendleton '31. Reed described its members as informal advisers on the College's business, fund-raising and public relations affairs. They aid in fund-raising by arranging meetings for Chandler and other college officials with potential donors, Reed said.

Alumni get off Log, find faculty home

The $1.6 million addition to the Faculty House will provide alumni with the permanent meeting place they've never really had.

The addition includes a dining room with a capacity of 200, a large kitchen, and a lounge and bar on the lower level.

The Log on Spring Street is officially the alumni center, but the College decided long ago that it was neither large enough nor fully suited to serve alumni full-time, according to College President John Chandler.

The class of 1930 donated part of its 50th reunion fund drive to construct the addition to the Faculty House. Director of Development John Pritchard stressed that the addition will maintain and strengthen alumni interest in Williams, but built by the same contractor as the AMT addition, so it should also be ready by next summer.

Building for the arts

Williams alumni have been the backbone of the construction fund-raising effort. About two-thirds of the cost of the three additions was provided by alumni gifts; another third came from foundations and corporations.

Chandler was largely responsible for getting the new building projects rolling. After being advised on the most pressing educational needs by the departments and by the Committee on Priorities and Resources, a joint faculty-student committee, he makes a recommendation to the Trustees, who hold the final say.

The Trustee Buildings and Grounds Committee reviews the project's practicality and campus setting and the Trustee Budget Committee approves the project's financing.

The Trustees appoint a building committee to work on the plans with the architect. Lawrence's building committee consisted of art professors Whitney Stoddard, E.J. Johnson, Ed Epping, and Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art. A member of the Development Office is appointed to oversee the project's fund-raising campaign.

Future construction plans are still being discussed. High on the priority list is a new gym facility and more space for computers. Bronfman Science Center is already bursting at the seams, Chandler noted, but with the completion of the AMT addition, the Jesup Hall auditorium, already underused, may fall into complete disuse. It may be used to house more computers, but such plans are very indefinite right now, Chandler said.

A $40,000 design study is underway to draft a plan for a new gym, which probably will contain a basketball court with large seating capacity and an Olympic-sized pool. But planning for the project's financing depends on a definite plan being offered to the Trustees.

Overall, Williams' physical plant is very roomy. There are currently 850 square feet per student, according to Assistant Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar; he estimates the national average is 375 square feet per student. The figure at Williams was 1,008 before co-education increased the size of the student body.

Chandler sees the additions as virtually completing the College's physical plant.

"The new additions are necessary but I'll be relieved when the building need is met so that the money can be more directed to people—faculty salaries and scholarships," he said. "There are always those who question new building," he concluded.

"But I'm proud that the College can respond to these needs at a time when most colleges cannot afford to build."

It is intended to benefit faculty as well.

"The alumni are here on campus in largest numbers during the summer when there isn't heavy use of the Faculty Club by the faculty," Chandler explained. The faculty generally said they were not opposed to the addition.

"There was a little apprehension at first," Chandler said, "but they've come to see that most of the time the addition will be used for them. Most of them are delighted."

Warren charges Chapin crowd

by Ted Benson

Well, it finally happened. Williams College got a first-rate rock act, as Warren Zevon gave a performance that was without equal in recent memory last Thursday.

The Concert Commission, and especially Hernando Garzon '84, is to be congratulated for bringing us such a versatile, vibrant artist.

From the opening chords of "Johnny Strikes up the Band" to the second encore "I'll Sleep When I'm Dead," Zevon held the sell-out crowd in sway. Both old and new tunes, hard rock or laid-back ballad, were well-received.

Superior support

Zevon's back-up group was exceptional as well, even without Waddy Wachtel, Zevon's usual lead guitarist. Known as one of the best musicians on the West Coast, Wachtel is currently working in L.A. and decided not to tour.

The tour began in New Jersey last Sunday and ends October 10 in Philadelphia. Afterwards, Zevon plans to go to Montana to work with Tom McGuane on another album to follow his latest, "The Envoy."

Zevon started as a classical musician, and at age 14 he met Igor Stravinsky. Zevon continues to write classical, and recently finished a few chamber pieces.

Structural damage

In Chapin, though, Zevon wasn't playing chamber music, and with speakers putting out 150 decibels plus at 50 feet, one spectator remarked that if the volume was any higher, it would have caused structural damage.

At 24, Zevon worked in Spain for a time, and then went to Africa, where, as he told Jim Corsiglia '83 of WCFM, he had several "interesting adventures" from which "Roland the Headless Thompson Gunner" emerged.

Backed by Springsteen

After returning to L.A., he wrote for the Everly Brothers and commercials. With help from Bruce Springsteen and others, his career began to take off. In fact, the one Springsteen song that Zevon performed, "Cadillac Ranch," brought the audience alive, as did one Zevon co-wrote with Springsteen, the always popular "Jeannie Needs a Shooter."

However, as Zevon became more successful, he began to drink. Soon he was known on the West Coast as a talented, dangerous alcoholic. He was calm only when he was drinking, and sober, he had no control over himself.

As a result, his personal life

Hill coaxes keys

by Ted Benson

Last Sunday night, Victor Hill returned once more to Thompson Memorial Chapel for another Griffin Hall concert.

The concert of organ music consisted of works by William Mathias, Cesar Franck, Mendelssohn, Vaughan Williams and that old standby, J.S. Bach.

As expected, our multi-talented math professor Mr. Hill delighted the aural senses with his controlled but expressive interpretations. Never one to merely play a piece, Hill showed his ability to thoroughly involve an audience in the smooth, powerful tones of Mendelssohn or the crisp, refreshing chorale-preludes of Bach.

This is the 15th year that Hill has performed in the Griffin Hall series, and he has performed elsewhere as well, including concert tours through Europe and North America. The next Griffin Hall concert is scheduled for Friday, October 22, and features three Bach violin and harpsichord concertos.

New Who flops 'hard'

by Brett Green

It's Hard may be guitarist-songwriter Pete Townshend's commentary on how one consistently comes up with good songs. And good songs certainly seem to be a problem for Townshend lately. He has followed up a fair solo album with a poor Who album.

The album doesn't even sound like the Who. It sounds more like a lousy Pete Townshend solo album. The only song on the album that is even reminiscent of the Who's past glory is "Athena," a good, but not great, rocker. And although "I've Known No War" displays some fine synthesizer work, the rest of the album is of no merit whatsoever.

There are several reasons for the album being such a disappointment. First of all, John Bundrick, the keyboardist used by the Who for almost a decade, has been replaced by the far less talented Tim Gorman.

The group itself is not in prime form. John Entwistle, one of rock's premiere bassists, is no longer playing his amazing bass lines. Instead, he has taken a back seat, restricting himself to simple rhythm parts. Townshend's guitar work is nothing to boast of, either.

However, Roger Daltrey shines, still one of the greatest vocalists ever. And there's some bad news for those Kenney Jones critics; his drumming is the best instrument work on the album.

If, as Daltrey recently remarked, the end of the Who is near, it's too bad they had to leave on such a sour note.

Springsteen strums bleak 'Nebraska'

by Brett McDonnell

Nebraska. A strange title for an album by the man who is New Jersey's only reason for existence. Still, these states do have something in common—bleakness.

The title is not the only odd thing about Bruce Springsteen's new album. It is completely acoustic. Folk and country music strongly influence the sound. This is a dramatic break from the dominant sound of Nebraska's three predecessors—the powerful rock and roll of Born to Run, Darkness on the Edge of Town, and The River.

The sparseness of the music throws the words into higher relief than ever. They stand up under the attention. This album has it all: love, death, hard times, fathers and sons, the struggle against authority, and the search for a "reason to believe."

Springsteen has always identified with the working class and the have-nots, and songs like "Mansion on the Hill" and "Used Cars" on this album continue that pattern, but the era of Reaganomics has made the atmosphere of hardship more harsh and immediate than ever.

Killing spree

Pent-up rage and frustration permeate the album. In Nebraska, the narrator and his girlfriend go on a killing spree and murder ten innocent people. In "Johnny 99" it says "Johnny's wavin' his gun around and threatenin' to blow his top."

Marginal characters

Nebraska is a much more deeply political album than anything by such political activists as Jackson Browne or Crosby,

A growing concern of Springsteen's has been the "void that stares back." In two songs Springsteen sings "Deliver me from nowhere" (remember "I don't want to fade away"?). Death and the void creep into many of the songs. Still, as always Springsteen resolutely believes in the possibility of hope, happiness and love: "At the end of every hard-earned day people find some reason to believe."

Springsteen irrelevant
Springsteen has never been an innovator, and he is irrelevant to the most exciting movements in rock and roll today. Still, we are lucky to have a performer who can be so popular and still write music as intelligent, searching and hard-hitting as this. I miss the E Street Band and look forward to their return on the next Springsteen album (supposedly due out soon), but in the meantime Nebraska is more than adequate. Anyone who thinks rock and roll is, or should be, more than loud party music should listen to this album.

Trio crafts classical pleasures

by Mark Averitt

Classical music is not exactly the talk of the campus, and you don't hear it blaring out of dorm windows throughout the day. But if you seek it out and let it entertain you, as a movie or novel would, you are in for an emotionally moving and sensually pleasing experience. The more you hear it, the more appreciation for it you will develop. And maybe you'll skip the next Warren Zevon concert in order to hear masters like Julius Hegyi, Douglas Moore and Paula Ennis-Dwyer perform their inspiring craft.

This fine circle of musicians delighted a Brooks-Rogers crowd of about 100 with compositions by Arthur Foote, Franz Joseph Haydn, and Anton Arensky in last Friday's Williams Trio Recital.

Hegyi cut a striking figure in his grey suit, his white hair bouncing as he elicited high vibrato notes one moment and plucked his violin with gusto the next. His instrument seemed particularly lively and dominant during the Haydn piece.

Moore, the chairman of the music department here, filled the hall with low, powerful cello sounds which lent an element of pathos to Foote's Opus #5. Moore wrote his thesis at Indiana University on Foote and has since unearthed and performed several previously undiscovered Foote compositions.

Like Moore, Ennis-Dwyer is a graduate of Indiana University, although she has been at Williams for only three years to the cellist's twelve. Her falsetto piano solos, in which she alternated two notes for several beats, were a memorable aspect of the Arensky piece and bordered on the comical. Ennis-Dwyer, unlike Moore and Hegyi, is a visibly impassioned performer whose face and fingers reflect the mood of her music.

Julius Hegyi, Paula Ennis-Dwyer and Douglas Moore, better known as the Williams Trio, combined classical and modern compositions in Friday's recital. (Lane) clated on another level and that there's someone who is intellectually stimulated by the few intelligent facets of my work... But I encourage leaping around; I leap around when I do it."

And that dynamism is what wild Warren is all about. His powerful, emotion-charged brand of rock, though clearly influenced by others, is in a class by itself.

From the blistering lyrics of "Play It All Night Long" to the tender, painful "Carmelita," Zevon has blazed a truly new trail in popular music.

Just ask anyone who saw the concert. They know the energy of Warren Zevon, and when Warren strikes up the band, they know to listen.

From three presidents to another...

After a series of meetings which began last June, the presidents of the Little Three colleges sent a letter to President Reagan at the end of August, expressing their concern over the threat of nuclear war. The letter is a statement on behalf of the presidents themselves, and is not meant to reflect the views of their particular institutions. Following is the text of the letter:

August 27, 1982
President Ronald Reagan
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20550

Dear Mr. President:

We write to express our concern over the threat of nuclear war. As educators with professional responsibilities for three of the nation's colleges, we see how anxiety stemming from this danger threatens to erode the idealism and energy of this generation of college students. From what we observe, the young people of America are eager to contribute to the regeneration of American pride and self-confidence and to the revitalization of the nation's economy—imperative national goals that you have expressed so forcefully. It saddens and alarms us to conclude that this eagerness to help build a strong and just society is in grave danger of giving way to cynicism and alienation in the face of a perception of increasing danger of nuclear conflict and a judgment that the American government is not responding to this danger with policies and plans that are likely to be effective.

We are encouraged by your proposal to reduce nuclear armaments. We write now to urge you to build on this first step by developing and announcing a comprehensive plan for negotiating a verifiable reduction of the nuclear arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union. The effort to reduce the threat of nuclear war through diplomacy and negotiations must be attended by at least as much conviction and energy as is demonstrated in the effort to rebuild the nation's military capability.

We have no illusions about the threat to world stability and peace posed by the Soviet Union nor about the difficulty of insuring compliance with treaty agreements on the part of an adversary whose capacity for deception is well known. Nevertheless, we are confident that this nation possesses the intellectual and technological resources and the moral vision and fortitude to arrest the present dangerous drift towards nuclear conflict and to lead the world down new paths of negotiated solutions to conflict and tensions. We believe that a clear and forceful commitment to the goal discussed here would enable the United States to achieve stronger unity, new purposefulness and enhanced international stature. We feel confident in affirming that those who live and work on America's three thousand college and university campuses would respond with great conviction to your leadership in undertaking diplomatic initiatives that promise to reduce and eventually eliminate the arsenal of nuclear weapons.

With best wishes,
Sincerely yours,

College Council

The College Council took care of housekeeping details at its meeting Tuesday night.

Finishing the last of business left over from last year, the Council approved the Elections Committee recommendations for Athletic Committee. Dorothy Briggs '84, Tracy Burrows '84, Dave Krupski '84, and Steve O'Day '83 will sit on the committee this year.

The Council held two internal elections. The Council elected representative Jonathan Light '83 as its delegate to the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL). As Fitch-Currier President last year, Light considered the transfer policy "too loose." The Council chose Bill Sawyers

'84 as its envoy to the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP). As a transfer from the University of Utah, Sawyers may broaden the perspective of the committee.

Council Vice-President and WCFM Personnel Director Jay Ward '84 announced the College Council Radio Show's 5:00-5:30 Sunday evening time slot. He spoke briefly about the radio show as an effective medium "for CC representatives to bring issues to students."

Finally, President Stuart Robinson '83 announced an introductory meeting of the Block W Club. The Club welcomes all interested students to join what Robinson described as "a network that supports athletic programs at Williams College."

West Germany

West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt saw the end of his government coming and "provoked a political suicide to keep his party together." Such were the words of Immo von Kessel, West German Deputy Consul General, as he held an open discussion in the Dodd House living room last Wednesday. "Schmidt knew that the end of the thread was slipping out of his hand and he attempted to save his party."

According to von Kessel, the government had been on shaky ground since May. The final blow came when the four liberal ministers in the cabinet resigned after a budget debate. Von Kessel went on to predict that Dr. Kohl, the leader of the C.D.U. (Christian Democratic Union) would probably be the next chancellor of Germany. He added that Germany "does not want a coalition government." Von Kessel feels that no matter who wins the elections in October, there will not be much difference in West Germany's foreign policy. That policy includes the building of the Soviet gas pipeline. Von Kessel was vehement in his defense of the pipeline. "We can no longer depend on oil from the Gulf States... Our trade with the West, and the pipeline will not change that. Germany will have no economic dependence on Russia."

Von Kessel believes that U.S. relations with Germany will remain stable, as will the new West German government.

trophic illness. While most of the money will probably go to individual faculty members, it also may be used for such things as seminars or retreats to benefit the faculty both personally and professionally.

Chandler stressed that one of the strengths of the fund is that he is not restricted by any guidelines or suggestions. He, and future Presidents of the College, will be free to use the fund in any way that they feel will benefit both the faculty and the College.

Chandler, probably in consultation with the Dean of the Faculty and the Provost, will report annually to the class of '88 on uses of their donation.

Bonds boost aid

Wick noted that fewer students from non-college families (families in which neither parent attended college) are applying for financial aid. He fears that negative publicity about both the cost of a Williams education and the scarcity of financial aid have scared many high quality students away from Williams. Smith echoed this remark, stating that many students are now attending state universities because of cost considerations.

Both fear that departure from "aid-blind" admissions may lower the quality of the Williams community by constricting the potential admissions pool. Wick stated confidently, "Will-ams is in a good position to maintain its commitment to aid-blind admissions. If we equivocate, we have a lot to lose."

We've got the dough
Fear that negative publicity has discouraged potential Ephs led Smith to prepare a pamphlet entitled "Planning for Expenses, 1982-1983" which he distributes to all prospective students. Inside this pamphlet he attempts to explain the college's financial aid policies by stating in bold letters, "Williams College is firmly committed to educating deserving students regardless of their family's financial capabilities. The cost of a Williams education should not discourage any qualified student from applying." The pamphlet goes on to state that, "Williams is one of only a handful of colleges in the country with the resources and commitment to meet the demonstrated financial need of all admitted students."

Last spring, according to Smith, the college administration renewed its commitment to aid-blind admissions. Wick feels that financially Williams can support this commitment. In recent years, 100% of Williams students with demonstrated need were offered financial assistance, and the administration feels that these policies will continue.

A representative of the Fuqua School of Business of Duke University will be on campus Thursday, October 7, to discuss the MBA Program.

by Chris Howlett

More than 50 people gathered last Monday evening in the Currier Ballroom to organize a new liberal campus newspaper, Germinal, scheduled to appear the second week of October.

Junior Joel Hellman, describing himself as a member of the "loose editorial board," explained that the paper's name was chosen for its various meanings. In English it pertains to germination; in French it is the title of a classic 19th century novel by Emile Zola dealing with the plight of French workers; "plus it has a cute nickname," Hellman added, "The Germ."

The paper will be structured like a news magazine with articles, features, editorials and columns. Departments will cover campus and local news as well as national and international news and the arts.

Alumni funding

"We want to take issues that we think are important that have not been dealt with anywhere else," Hellman said. He stressed that Germinal is not looking to compete with existing papers, but to supplement them, although the paper will have a definite "progressive leaning."

It was also announced at Monday's meeting that Germi- nal has organized an alumni advisory board to provide financial and editorial support and possibly contribute articles. The board includes Williams political science professor James MacGregor Burns '39; John W. Anderson '50, editorial writer for The Washington Post; Muhammad Kenyatta '81, a student at Harvard Law School; and Lester C. Thurow '60, professor of economics and management at MIT.

Frantic effort

Germinal is the outgrowth of plans for three separate papers and combines concepts from all of them. Hellman had been hoping to see another campus newspaper while Herve Jean-Baptiste had been planning a paper oriented toward the Third World. Several other students had been working on a more radical, Marxist-oriented publication to counter conservative campus papers.

At the beginning of this year, however, all three ideas merged in a frantic effort involving almost-daily meetings. As a result, Germinal will have a wide range of coverage. "The paper has a lot of flexibility," one editor said, "We're just going to sit around and rap about what's going to be in the paper."

The Republican

by Brett McDonnell

Despite the controversy over its initial issue last spring, The Williams Republican will begin its first full year of publishing this fall. The debut issue should hit the campus on October 4.

"We are trying to provide a balance on campus from a political viewpoint," says new editor Steve Nielsen '85. "We want to preserve both tradition and humor on the campus scene."

Enraged students

The Republican has broken formal ties with the Republican Club, now called the Garfield Republican Club, though some people may be involved in both organizations.

Last year's first and only issue, released at the end of the school year, focused on the issue of feminism and enraged many students and faculty members, including some conservatives. Nielsen feels people overreacted.

"I thought the reaction generally was almost a reflex action to some of the things that they read," commented Nielsen, who was layout editor for that issue. He says people made "blanket statements" about the whole paper based on certain articles that appeared in it.

Pipeline focus

Nielsen sees "marginal changes" from that first issue resulting from the fact that he is now editor. "The way I put together the paper obviously is going to differ from the way the previous editors did it," explained Nielsen.

"We are not going to harp on women's and feminist issues at all, but neither are we going to stay away from them," stated Nielsen. The first issue will focus on the European pipeline controversy.

Joining Nielsen on the editorial staff is Dick Wilde '85, campus issues editor, and Will Gillespie '85, who will handle national and international issues. At an organizational meeting for persons interested in working on the Republican, twenty-five people showed up.

In commenting on the split from the Republican Club, Nielsen said, "We thought it'd be a good idea to have the paper and the club as separate func-

Golf squad hosting NE championships

by Ward Katsanis

This afternoon, the golf team is competing in the second and final day of the New England Intercollegiate Golf Association Championship in Pittsfield, Mass.

In a match last Friday at Middlebury, the Williams squad shot very well, resulting in a fine 382-403 stroke victory. Low man for the day was Mike Hennigan '85 who shot a two over par 73. Seniors Bruce Goff and Charlie Thompson also had strong performances with rounds of 75 and 77, respectively. Coach Rudy Goff commented that everyone hit the ball well and that "it should get us ready for the New England."

Hole-in-one

One unexpected thing did occur, however, as John Hennigan '84 had a hole-in-one on the par three 145-yard 14th hole. Using a seven iron, he acquired his first ace ever. John's score for the day was 78.

The previous weekend, the team competed in the Yale Invitational along with 31 other schools. Williams placed twelfth, which was "the best we have done in a major tourney," said Coach Goff.

The team was especially pleased considering the number of larger Division I schools that were involved. Individually, Mike Hennigan was ninth overall out of a total of 160 competitors.

Williams expected about 45 colleges from all over New England at this week's tournament. The defending champion from last spring is Central Connecticut State.

Young tennis squad takes two straight

by Adam Juviler

The women's tennis team evened its record at 2-2 last week by winning its last two games. The most recent victory was a nine matches to none shellacking of Wesleyan on Saturday.

Williams, which has never lost to its Little Three rival, lost only three sets on its way to the shutout.

The team registered its first win on Wednesday as they edged Skidmore five to four in what Coach Curt Tong termed "a tough match."

On Sunday, September 19th, the women lost to Tufts six and one-half to two and one-half. Although the loss was the squad's second in as many matches, an optimistic Coach Tong said, "We did better against them (Tufts) than we ever have." Tufts, along with Dartmouth and Trinity, are the most difficult teams on the women's schedule.

Controversial loss

The team lost its opener five to four to Vassar on Friday, September 17th in rather controversial fashion. Because of the Jewish holiday, Vassar was able to field a team of only eight, whereas the rules call for a twelve player team, six singles and three doubles.

As a result of the missing players, four of the Vassar singles competitors who had already played matches illegally paired up to play the remaining two doubles matches. If these two matches had been forfeited, Williams would have won five to four and now have a 3-1 record. "We got ripped off," said Betsy Shulman '86.

Impressive record

The even record of the women's squad is actually very impressive in light of the fact that the team has relatively little varsity experience and four freshmen. Two of these freshmen, Liz Peay and Shulman, play second and third singles respectively and have a combined record of six and two. Other freshmen include Sue Brown (first doubles) and Gerry Hugo (third doubles).

Freshman Rumi Kurosaki winds up for spike in Ephwomens' Sunday victories. (Plonsker)

Hard hitting V-ball wins two

by Denise Ross

The women's volleyball team beat both UMass-Boston and North Adams State on Sunday. The wins were a comeback for Williams, as they had lost to UConn and Smith on Tuesday.

Williams won the first game in Sunday's match against UMass 15-13. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin attributed the win to the strong service of Kathleen Gilmore '83 and the outstanding attack of Lisa Pepe '83.

Williams lost the next game to an excited UMass team 15-12. However, the Ephwomens came back in the deciding game of the match to destroy UMass with a 15-4 victory.

Comeback over North Adams
In the first game against North Adams, Williams appeared tired and, according to Hudson-Hamblin, they played poorly. As a result, the Ephs lost this game to a slightly more energetic team by the score of 15-13.

The Ephwomens dominated the second game as they jumped to an early 6-0 lead, and went on to win 15-7.

The lead in the deciding game of the match bounced back and forth, but Williams stayed strong to win 16-14.

Women win in team style

by Liz Streitz

A strong team performance was the key to the Women's Cross Country team's success in the annual Williams Invitational Meet held this past weekend. Williams had seven of its runners place in the top 38.

Williams placed third out of eleven teams in the overall standings, edging out a tough Middlebury team which had defeated the Williams girls in last weekend's meet at Middlebury. Coach Bud Fisher said the girls had felt tired during the Middlebury race but they were rested and felt much stronger this week.

Dartmouth's Chris Simmons won the race, finishing in 19:40. With four of its runners placing in the top six, Dartmouth finished well ahead of second place University of Vermont.

Williams had strong individual performances by captain Susan Bragdon '83 who finished eleventh with a time of 20:25. Margaret Lynch '84 and Sue Flynn '85 also finished strong.

At this weekend's Amherst Invitational the team is planning on again using the "team running" strategy, as opposed to one superstar, that proved its effectiveness this weekend.

Soccer wins off frosh foot

by Dave Woodworth

In his first game at Williams, Jeff McEvoy '86 scored the lone goal of the match with less than four minutes to play to give the men's varsity soccer team a 1-0 win at Middlebury on Saturday. McEvoy took a ball from Jeff Sutton '83, moved to his left, and, closely marked by two defenders, rifled a shot past Panther goalkeeper Bart Lombardi and into the upper corner of the net.

The Ephs played a disciplined defensive game in an attempt to slow down the fast-paced Panther attack. With no score at the half, it was apparent that the Williams side had succeeded in imposing its game plan upon its opponents.

Panther thrown out

Midway through the second half, the Ephs got a big break when Middlebury striker Pip Caroti received his second yellow card of the match and was ejected from the game. Although this inspired the Panthers and gave them the momentum for a few minutes, the Ephs, with a one man advantage, gradually reasserted control and finally got the game off McEvoy's foot.

Middlebury outshot Williams by a 17-10 margin, but keeper Ted Murphy '85 saved 11 of them in preserving the shutout. Lombardi made 8 saves for the Panthers.

Loss to R.P.I.

The victory evened the booters' record at 1-1, as they had lost their season opener to RPI last Tuesday by a 1-0 count.

Of his team's win, Coach Mike Russo said, "We're all very, very pleased. We worked hard in the preseason, and were extremely disappointed by the loss to RPI. This victory is exhilarating."

The squad's next match is at home tomorrow against a bitter rival, North Adams State College. The game will be played at 4:00 on Cole Field.

The eternal question lingers on: when will Williams build a gym?

by John Clayton

Our gym was built before basketball was invented. As any tour guide worth his weight in put-downs of Amherst will tell you, that gives our basketball team a great home-court advantage.

How could we replace a building so steeped in tradition?

But replacing is just what it needs, and what it will eventually get, according to Athletic Director Bob Peck. "We're in a very positive phase of plans for a new facility," Peck said. "The Athletic Department is ready to respond to any go-ahead signals we get."

Trustee approval

"We're proceeding with an investigation of a site for the new facility, including a gym, pool, and ancillary facilities."

Ancillary facilities include a weight room, dance studio, health care facility, crew tank, ski room and equipment room.

"Trustee approval is needed first, and then the fund-raising, and then we can start building the new gym," Peck continued. "I'd hesitate to give any definite time-span, although I will say that after we get the money, the actual building should take about two years."

Dance in passageways

The new facility is certainly needed. The current facility aggravates everyone—swimmers are forced to hold special meets, basketball players have come from high schools with bigger gyms, weightlifters can't get time on the weights, dancers are stuck in rooms designed and used for basket-

Injured harriers dealt double blow

by Lyman Casey

Lack of early season speed-work, a string of injuries to key runners, and talented University of Vermont and Albany State squads combined to hand the Eph harriers a pair of losses Saturday in Burlington, Vermont.

The Ephmen, missing star juniors Bennett Yort and Bo Parker due to foot injuries, were clearly outmanned against powerful Vermont, but ran a close race against Albany State.

The Vermont course was flat and fast much of the way, but the Ephmen seemed unable to relax at the beginning, and Vermont soon took command.

Eph finishers

First man in for the Ephmen was John Nelson '84 in fourth place. Following closely was Dan Riley '83 in sixth place. Rounding out the top seven were Brian Angle '84 in eleventh, Ian Brzezinski '86 in twelfth, Lyman

Ted Thomas '85 is surrounded by the Panther defense which keyed on him in Williams' opening 24-23 loss. (Farley)

Mistakes cost Ephmen opener, Panthers come back for 24-23 win

by Rob Tercek & Dan Finneran

Penalties and turnovers helped Middlebury College upset the Ephmen's nine-point lead and come back to deal a heartbreaking 24-23 defeat to the visiting Williams gridders. Williams fans saw several fine individual performances in the hard-fought contest, but, as head coach Bob Odell noted, "The mistakes cost us an awful lot."

Certainly the highlight of the game was an outstanding rushing attack led by halfback Sean Crotty '84. He rushed for 120 yards on 20 carries, spurring the offense on to a total gain of 382 yards, with 275 yards on the ground and 107 in the air.

Crotty's ballcarrying ability allowed the Ephmen to relieve the heavy pressure on fullback Ted Thomas, who was held to 78 yards on 20 carries by a Panther defense keying on him.

Middlebury scored first on a 14-yard halfback option pass from Mark Conroy to Kelvin Chase and the extra-point kick by junior Bob Crews. Crotty then led the Ephmen on a 70 yard scoring drive of their own pounding out yard after yard. With 3:09 on the clock, Crotty blasted eight yards into the end zone. Freshman Dave O'Keefe's kick added the extra point to match first quarter scores.

Ephmen take the lead

O'Keefe put a 31-yard field goal through the uprights to give Williams a 10-7 second quarter lead. A Panther fumble on the kickoff set up the second purple-and-gold scoring drive, with Crotty carrying the ball 4 yards for his second touchdown. A failed kick left the Ephs with a 16-7 lead.

A pass interference call and a 37-yard touchdown toss thrown by Panther quarterback Kevin Harley to Martin Beatty gave Middlebury their second score. A successful kick by Crews closed the first half scoring at 16-14.

Crotty garnered his third score of the day on a two yard dive play in the third quarter. O'Keefe's kick put Williams well ahead, 23-14.

Turnovers costly

The fourth quarter brought the downfall of the Eph lead. Middlebury shut down the Williams offense and capitalized on its errors. Williams' third fumble set up Middlebury's 26-yard scoring pass from Harlen to Chase in a fourth and 20 situation and Crews' successful PAT kick.

Then another Williams fumble, on the kick off return, sparked the Panther momentum for another drive. A defensive rally by the Ephmen held the Panthers for four downs near the goal line, but Crews' 18-yard field goal gave Middlebury a one-point lead with 4:45 left.

A quick passing attack, led by quarterback Scott Garabedian '83 (14 for 23 for 107 yards) and split end Mark Hummon, brought the Ephmen from their 20 yard line to the Panther 25, but an interception by Middlebury's Bruce Gervetz halted the drive with eleven seconds left in the final period.

Raquetmen third in Great Dane Classic

by Gordon Celender

The men's tennis team placed third in Albany State's annual "Great Dane Classic" this weekend with a total of 15 points.

New Coach Steve Heath was extremely pleased with the finish, the best by a Williams team in recent history.

The tournament featured some excellent performances by each of the seven Williams players involved. Seniors Mark Sopher and Gordon Celender teamed up to win the "C" doubles division over tournament winner East Stroudsburg State to give Williams the one point needed to overtake Concordia (14½).

Sophomores Tim Rives and Craig Hammond registered three victories in the "A" doubles division. Tom Paper '84 collected two points for the Ephmen at number six singles.

In other competition this fall, Williams placed third in the R.P.I. Invitational.

The team plays their only dual match of the fall against Dartmouth at home on Friday.

Roosenraad clarifies party line

Locations restriction lifted

Responding to what he called "a misidentification," Dean Cris Roosenraad has clarified an earlier memo which placed restrictions on all-college parties. According to a new memo issued last week, "the statement of [the] earlier memo regarding the use of Mission Park and Greylock Dining Halls is not in effect. Houses may continue to plan parties of a variety of kinds to occur in the residence buildings themselves."

Roosenraad issued the second memo after meeting with the Housing Committee, on which all house presidents serve. House officers expressed a great deal of concern over the first memo. Roosenraad felt that "initial reactions were grossly overblown because there was no common understanding about the meaning of the words 'all-college party.'"

Hot parties

Restrictions remain firm, however, on two issues, said Roosenraad: "fire safety, on which there is no compromise, and noise, about which we all have to be sensitive." Roosenraad reiterated in his second memo that Security will continue to close parties when neighbors complain about noise.

House presidents agreed at the meeting to try to control noise, and to cooperate with security officers when they must shut a party down. Roosenraad said he understands that sometimes parties become loud in spite of efforts to contain the volume. "You can't blame the students for those situations. Parties get hot, and when they get hot, people open windows."

Roosenraad's only complaint about the current flexible policy is that he thinks "it puts my Security officers in a bad situation because they get a lot of flak from students when they close them down."

Current policy will be reviewed again at a later date, said Roosenraad.

Profs argue Middle East politics

by Lucy Lytle

The fireworks were almost as explosive in Chapin Hall Wednesday night as in the streets of Beirut as four Williams professors engaged in fierce debate on the crisis in Lebanon.

The discussion attracted such a large crowd that it had to be moved from Brooks-Rogers to Chapin, filling the latter almost to capacity.

Raymond Baker, an associate professor of political science, listed seven "essential preconditions for peace" in the Middle East. They include Israeli withdrawal from territory gained in 1967, Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza, and "a secure Israel within secure boundaries."

Baker also called for self-determination for the Palestinian inhabitants of the territories, a negotiated special arrangement for Arab East Jerusalem, a territorial compromise on the Golan Heights, and, most importantly, mutual Palestinian-Israeli recognition and a peace guaranteed by the "great powers" and the United Nations. He also stressed the "very important and very crucial role that moderate Arab regimes will play if a peace progress is to go forward."

Baker examined the effects of Camp David peace negotiations on Egypt. He asserted that this peace "opened Egypt to the charge of complicity with the Israeli policy aimed at destroying Palestinian nationalism . . . The Begin government was willing to throw the entire Middle East into turmoil and . . . use its awesome military power to change the very political geography of the Middle East in order to annex that territory."

Unspeakable Carnage

Baker argued that "no compromise could alter that Israeli determination to settle, to colonize, what they now call Judea and Samaria."

He went on to discuss the threat to Egypt posed by the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. "[Egyptian President] Mubarak has scrupulously honored the peace with Israel," Baker said, "but the invasion of Lebanon and the unspeakable carnage it entailed is a direct assault on his position. To speak plainly, neither Mubarak or the treaty can last for much longer in association with the Israel of Begin and Sharon. The peace initiative of President Regan is nothing less than a lifeline to the Mubarak regime. Sharon and Begin tried to cut it in Lebanon."

Baker concluded, "I would urge Mubarak to go, as Sadat did, directly to the American people and the American Congress and to explain that no Egyptian will be able to keep the peace with an Israel waging war against the Palestinian people."

Gary Jacobsohn, an associate professor of political science, objected to this assertion. "If you just discovered Yasir Arafat this summer," he

Matron service ceases

by Carol Davenport

If you are waiting for a matron to come tidy up your messy room, you are waiting in vain. These part-time custodians, who used to do light cleaning such as dusting and vacuuming, are no longer around.

In the academic year 1979-80, the Committee on the 80's published a report which encouraged, among other things, that the College spend less on the amenities of life. In response to this suggestion, Buildings and Grounds proposed that room-cleaning services be discontinued. Further justification for this action was the fact that Williams was "the last bastion of student room-cleaning," according to Wendy Hopkins, Director of Student Housing.

Rather than fire the matrons, the College decided to phase them out of the staff. When each part-time custodian left her job, the position would not be refilled. The custodian, in turn, would be offered the choice of taking a full-time custodial job, taking another campus job for which she was qualified or leaving College employment altogether. The College projected that this attrition of matrons would take place over a seven-year period.

Dodd not exempt

In the past, the custodians cleaned each student's room once a week. However, as the number of matrons declined, the remaining ones formed "room-cleaning teams" that went from dorm to dorm, reaching each room at a period of every eleven days or two weeks. However, this year, only three of the original nineteen custodians are left and, as a result, room-cleaning services are fully discontinued.

A common fallacy held by many students is that Dodd residents still receive this service. This misunderstanding derives from the fact that Dodd has many individual bathrooms which full-time custodians clean regularly. Thus, although Dodd residents see custodians in their rooms frequently, they nevertheless receive the same services as all other students.

Student reactions to the attrition of room-cleaning custodians vary. Some students see room-cleaning as an unnecessary luxury. Jeff Mook '83 said: "Not having them saves money and it is just as easy to clean your room yourself if there is an accessible vacuum cleaner. Besides, they used to come at inopportune times."

Other students felt differently. Allison Ashley '85 says: "I hate it! It made the school unique. Not many people here have the time to clean their rooms. It made me feel good to walk into my room after a hard day of classes and lab and find it tidy." However, the administration has not been overwhelmed with complaints. Hopkins says: "Student reactions were stronger last year when their rooms weren't cleaned on the eleventh day than they are now when their rooms aren't cleaned at all."

The era of the dirty room, however, does not necessarily have to follow the discontinuance of room-cleaning. Vacuum cleaners and other cleaning materials are available in each house for those who need them. Hopkins also encourages any student suggestions: "We're here to help. Although we no longer have the bodies to do the cleaning, we will do everything we can."

CC debates transfer policy

The Committee on Undergraduate Life's report of last May on house transfers was the major topic of a spirited College Council meeting last Tuesday night. President Stuart Robinson presided over a sometimes chaotic meeting which discussed courses of action in response to the CUL report.

Among its suggestions, the CUL report recommends that housing matters fall under the jurisdiction of a new Housing Subcommittee of the CUL. This move would weaken or destroy Council's own Housing Committee.

Council representative Jan van Eck said many representatives were "unhappily surprised" by the report. The consensus of the Council was that the report, specifically sections dealing with house transfers, was unacceptable, but members could not agree on a response. At one point, debate became so heated that a number of members were ready to walk out.

Highly visible protest

Row House representative Dave Altshuler advocated unification of the student body in highly visible protest of the transfer policy. Robinson, however, believed that a less activist role would be more effective in the long run. Council Vice-President Jay Ward suggested later that "part of Council's energies should be devoted to the implementation of this mandate in the event we can't get it overturned."

Many members agreed that the new policy toward transfers was too stringent. In addition, they objected to the fact that the Dean alone can grant transfers. There was talk during the meeting of establishing a committee to deal with transfers.

After much heated debate, the issue was tabled until representatives could speak with their constituents.

Also discussed during the meeting were two letters from Robinson to College President Chandler. The letters spoke of the need for new indoor athletic facilities and changes in policy regarding post-season athletic competition. These letters were approved unanimously and sent to Chandler.

Transfers, Round II

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) is proceeding with a project to limit interhouse transfers, a move that students have overwhelmingly condemned.

Last semester the Housing Committee tackled the house transfer issue, often locking horns with the College Council. Members of the Housing Committee pushed to limit opportunities for transfer, while the Council quickly voted to leave the transfer policy unchanged. The Housing Committee subsequently sent its recommendations to the CUL, completely bypassing the Council.

If the Council had looked at its own constitution, and applied its provisions, it could have forced the Housing Committee into an anti-limitation stance. The Housing Committee was a standing committee of the College Council, not the CUL. The College Council was to appoint the committee's chairmen. Five of the ten voting members of the committee were College Council members.

All of these powers are explicitly written in the Council constitution. Had the Council asserted its authority last year, members of the Housing Committee might not have so easily ignored the Council, and the CUL's crusade to limit house transfers may have faced opposition instead of support from the Housing Committee. Instead, in typical fashion the Council's members did not even show up for most meetings.

But the question of Council influence over transfer policy is now a moot point following action by the CUL. Last May, immediately before final exams, the CUL set up its own Housing Committee. The CUL version no longer gives the Council the power to appoint chairmen. Where the Council once constituted half of the voting members, the CUL dilutes the Council's five votes with thirty other voting members.

The new housing committee guidelines call for Council input only "where this is appropriate." The new housing committee is charged, however, with implementing all policies mandated by the CUL. The CUL has thus set up its own enforcement arm to replace the potentially less cooperative College Council version.

What is left for students to do? Council members and other concerned students can go to the CUL meeting next Tuesday at 4:15 in Greylock. Student leadership has fumbled once, but time has fortunately not run out. If students are opposed to changing the house transfer policy, as house votes indicate, then there should be no way for the CUL to railroad transfer reform.

Guest Meals

Guest meals. Remember them? They went out the window (along with matrons and dogs) a year ago. The "special dinners" that replaced them are a sorry substitute:

- we can only invite faculty, not other students
- we get only one per semester
- the meals aren't all that special

Food Services told us they would use the $100,000 saved from the elimination of Row House dining to give us better dinners. In fact, they claimed the dining consolidation would make it easier to provide for such special events. Now they say there isn't enough room to sit everyone down for a guest meal. This is a lame excuse; Baxter or Greylock could easily accommodate a 5:30 and 7:00 double shift.

The much-mourned Residential House ethos can only benefit from more social opportunities. Allowing students to invite other students will not relegate student-faculty relations to hurried phone calls hours before papers are due. Most faculty have little time for socializing as it is, but more dinners would encourage students to invite a faculty member to at least one.

Rather than offer us vague promises for "improved special dinners," Food Services and the Committee on Undergraduate Life should bring back the old guest meals.

Real world duties

To the editor:

I was pleased and relieved to read that the members of the College Council regard it as their "job" to "oversee" the potentially nefarious activities at Joe Dewey's book store. Presumably this means that all the CC members will volunteer to work in the store (in a supervisory capacity, of course) during next semester's textbook rush. Gee thanks, guys! It's great to see that you all know where your Econ classes end and Spring Street begins!

Transfer statement

To the editor:

We, as representatives of the student body, take issue with Committee on Undergraduate Life's recent conclusion that the way to improve housing at Williams College is to limit the number of inter-house transfers.

The CUL's conclusion, as outlined in its May 11, 1982 report, is misdirected. Restricting house transfers does not present a viable means to significantly improve diversity, unity, or esprit de corps within our houses.

Simultaneously, we recognize the need for a clear and equitable transfer process. Mechanical refinements of the process, however, in no way bolster the argument for a more severely limited transfer policy.

The new restrictions can only create feelings of intrapment and alienation among dissatisfied students. We conclude by affirming the Gifford Committee's report that Williams College "could and should maintain the present liberal transfer policy and the flexibility of student choice which it allows" (emphasis added).

Latest bad thing

To the editors:

I would like to call for the formation of the W.C.A.L.B.T., the Williams Coalition Against the Latest Bad Thing. I believe such an organization is long called for and would greatly advantage us all. First, it would offer great savings in time. Passe organizations would no longer need to go through the soulsearching and soulwrenching task of disbanding as Interest wanes. Second, upon joining, we would always be assured that we are ready at the barricades. In a word, we would be relevant. Finally, the College Council would be saved the time and expense of creating, combining, assembling and disassembling journals, newspapers, magazines; we would have one always contemporary, always current, always morally indignant voice for the campus. There is, however, as it always seems there must be, one problem (a fly in the ointment, if you will). Since the Latest Bad Thing cannot be predicted, the W.C.A.L.B.T. must be eclectic and tolerant. Now it may seem difficult to combine these qualities and the necessary outrage that such a Coalition demands, but the efficiencies listed above would compel, indeed, command, us to set aside this trifling limitation. As exemplars of the Liberal Arts, we can do no less.

Compliment?

To the editor:

In your last issue you expressed concern about the lack of letters submitted to your publication. I would like to help alleviate your problem by airing some complaints I have been harboring for some time.

You continually slander me in your articles; you invent gross lies about my parents, siblings and (most importantly) my immediate family members. You do not care about virtuous or honest writing—nay, your paper spouts weekly hemorrhages of trivial fluff and sensationalist sensationalism.

On the other hand, yours is a finely crafted publication and I am proud to pick up a copy every Tuesday night. The articles are purely factual and enlightening. May the Williams Record continue to thrive.

From Keynes to Reagan—and back again?

You may have noticed that a certain white-haired lady can frequently be seen reading THE NEW YORK TIMES on the porch of Fernald House. You may not have known that she is Professor Joan Robinson, world-famous economic theorist, recently come over from England to teach economics at Williams first semester.

Robinson, author of numerous books and articles on economics, taught the subject at Cambridge University for 40 years, from 1931 to 1971. Her most recent volume, WHAT ARE THE QUESTIONS, was published in 1980. Educated at Girton College sharply—they're all very polite to each other.

Is it too polite? Are people boring?

Well, that's how they like to play it.

How is it you decided to come here?

Well, I was asked, that was all.

And you thought it would be a nice change?

I thought I'd better see if I could still carry on, because I've been retired for some time. And I knew if I once gave up altogether I should just become an old

What economists do you admire now?

Well, there are a few people still keeping the flag flying. Galbraith is good.

Is he the only one?

Well, I don't know the professional Americans.

In England?

We have a group in Cambridge called the Policy Group, which I think is doing very interesting work.

You do see some hope in this era of Thatcher and Reagan, then?

I think they've done a lot of harm, a lot of irreparable harm. But what's the most important thing is to get mastery over the atomic arms—economics has become a secondary question really. The main question is survival.

What hope do you have that we can stop the arms race?

It doesn't look very good at the moment, does it? But I think there's a big popular outcry in this country against atomic arms. Perhaps the public feeling will

But you still remain as one of the few women in your field.

I always take individuals as individuals. Some are women and some are men.

I think that's the way women think, but I don't know if that's the way men always think.

I think England is better than America from that point of view. You see there have been these two wars in both of which women played quite a big part—America is much more backward on the whole. They're improving, though. I felt that a woman who's working in some intellectual field and also has a family, has children, has one up on everybody.

Were there many other women working in the field at that time?

One or two.

What do you think young people should concern themselves with?

I think this atom bomb question is the most important question.

What about apartheid? Have you studied that much?

I haven't any special study on it. It's a very awkward problem.

Some people argue that divestment of stocks is effective, others say it is ineffective.

I think it's a matter of your own feeling. You don't want to feel involved with it, you want to cut yourself off from it.

Here, we've divested the College of only one stock. Do you think we could put up a very forceful argument that divestment really will hurt the South African economy?

No, I really don't think it makes very much difference. I think it's a matter of personal feeling—you don't want to feel you're gaining from such a horrible thing.

But they argue that if you invest there that conditions will actually be better for people.

Oh, no, that's a contorted argument.

Do you go to Convocation here?

Yes, I did.

Professor Frost mentioned the temperate zone belt around the world, where all the countries are industrialized. Do you think that's one of the reasons for how well Japan is doing? Do you think they're good economists?

They're very extraordinary people, the Japanese.

Do you think it's the character of the people that makes them that way?

Yes, they've had an extraordinary history and they're now on the upswing.

Do you think they can keep it up?

They'll keep it up for some time.

They've been talking a lot recently about depression coming, the worst times since the 1930's. Do you think there will be another depression?

overwhelm the government.

Can much be argued from an economic point of view—how producing war materials—?

I think this atom bomb question is the most important question.

Of course it is harmful economically, very harmful, but that's a secondary matter. The primary matter is the survival of the human race.

What did it feel like to be one of the few women in your field?

I never bothered about the woman question. I have always taken the view that women are human beings like anybody else.

You don't think it made a difference?

I don't think I've suffered personally. Having got in with Keynes I didn't have to combat any prejudice.

them are quite convinced about this fashionable nonsense and don't want to change.

Can you convert them against supply-side economics?

I would like them to explain to me what it means. I don't understand it. Do you understand what it means? It's just words.

Do you think of yourself as a radical economist?

I think of myself as a sensible person.

I've heard you're very interested in China.

Yes, I'm not very happy with the anti-Mao movement in China. They're beginning to relapse into the old system—they're going to lose a great deal of what Mao brought them. Mao wanted to make a more egalitarian system, reduce the difference between the town and the country and this move will go back to something more like the old China—the wealthy class in the cities.

But a great deal of what Mao did for them won't be lost. Their greatest trouble is enormous numbers—they can't raise the standard of living much, they can only just manage to keep it going.

of Cambridge University, Robinson was a friend and contemporary of John Maynard Keynes, who she said had the greatest influence on her life.

In 1931, Robinson, Richard Kahn, Austin Robinson (Robinson's husband), James Meade, and others, along with Keynes, formed what they called a "circus" to discuss Keynes' TREATISE ON MONEY. They continued the circus up to and beyond completion of Keynes' GENERAL THEORY, which completely revolutionized economic thought. Keynes dedicated the work in part to Robinson.

Watching and helping Keynes' ideas unfold was very exciting, Robinson said. She has ever since been at the forefront of economic thought.

Professor Robinson spoke with RECORD reporter David Desmond and with Outlook editor Katya Hokanson.

Record: In Contributions to Modern Economics you say you began to study economics because you were interested in poverty. Do you feel you've made much progress?

Robinson: We were getting it, after the Keynesian Revolution, there was a big increase in insight—there wasn't much political effect but there was great increased insight. But that's all been thrown away now in this reaction—supply-side economics and all that stuff. So I feel very distressed.

Do you think we've gone backwards?

Yes, we've had a terrible reaction.

You talked about mumpsimus, the stubborn persistence in an error after it's been exposed.

That was old-fashioned mumpsimus, which was obstinance in refusing to see the point. But it's worse now, because people who have seen the point have now slipped back and have allowed a new kind of nonsense.

How do you think it happened—was it that they rejected Keynes?

Well, it was a political thing, I think. Kalecki, the Polish economist, was a parallel of Keynes. He had a theory of a political trade cycle—you've got full employment, the position of the workers becomes strong and they get a larger share . . . and then the employers revolt—they'd rather have workers who are under their thumb, depending on them . . . so Kalecki predicted there'd be a political trade cycle—he wrote during the war and he stayed in England during the war because he got caught . . . And so he was at an Institute in Oxford and he wrote this article—he wrote a number of things about the war economy—an article predicting the political trade cycle . . . politicians didn't pay attention to him, but they fulfilled his predictions.

And supply-side economics?

I can't see that it makes any sense at all—it's just botched up, an excuse.

Is there any potential for going back?

It would be a fair chance without Mrs. Thatcher's Government.

How does it strike you being here in Williamstown? Do you like it?

Well, it's very peaceful here. People don't bring out their differences so

Tash's triumph transcends time

by Vernon Squires

The hardwood floor protests with a slight creaking as you first step in. The heavy door, too, seems somewhat tired when it fails to easily shut and stay closed. The iron latches have clearly seen better days. Naked bulbs, some with tiny glass covers, cast a timid light on the interior. The peeling golden letters on the front door read simply "John Tash."

Tash's grocery store on Water Street in Williamstown is a throwback to older times. Except for the likes of Ritz Crackers, M&Ms, instant coffee, and packaged bread, a customer might be in a scene from the 1940s. From the large fan on an oak shelf to the perpetual ticking of an antique clock, the ambience at Tash's is distinctly venerable. Although the original owner, whose name is ethics that their father taught them, allowing the store to cling to an era of simpler life.

On entering the small (by today's standards) market, one is initially struck by the seeming lack of life. Suddenly, from behind the sturdy, glass-cased counters, appear two small faces, filled with a mixture of curiosity and friendliness, expressions bordering on faint surprise. On the lesser side of five feet tall, the sisters seem to be dolls personified, but only in a benevolent sense.

In character with the store, they belong to a previous era, when people had time for small talk and personal attention; their greeting of "hello" lingers in the air for several moments. The elder of the two, Fannie Tash is unquestionably the queen of her castle. She is proud of her store and its heritage. She moves about in a slow and deliberative manner, knowing every inch of the building.

Time-worn treasures

The store itself is mostly wooden. Dreshors Fresh Bread, circa 1940, is advertised on a time-worn poster. A miniature cardboard model of Fort Ticonderoga hawks "America's finest pencils," although the instruments are nowhere to be seen. A red, circular metal Coca-Cola sign suggests "the real thing." Fannie explains that this sign was the very first in the store. The walls are adorned with photos of the Tash's alongside tapestries of philosophic sayings. The two display cases in front are the home of fresh fruit and vegetables, and green plants.

Museum pieces

"What am I most proud of?" reflects Fannie. "I haven't changed the store since its beginning." Except for several electric appliances, which were installed in the World War II era, she speaks the truth. The cash register would be more at home in a museum, although it functions as well as ever. A scale, which currently serves as a

RUSH: Signals

Recent studio album continues their trend

by T. Arthur Perry

With their past work gathered up neatly and put in perspective on a successful live album, Rush now moves ahead with Signals. This latest effort from the Canadian rock trio furthers their accessibility to the listening public, but only at some cost to their artistic integrity.

It does, however, reaffirm their commitment to those of us who like our music without the sex and violence of so-called

"heavy metal", yet avoids the "loving and leaving" motif of today's pop bands.

Through 11 albums, Rush has managed to uphold the standards of Art Rock: emphasis on instrumental talent, musical complexity for its own sake and lyrics dealing with higher ideals.

Neil Peart has emerged as one of the few rock drummers with an identifiable style. Alex Lifeson has successfully shaken the Jimmy Page comparisons and Geddy Lee plays the bass as an instrument in its own right, while progressing on synthesizers and vocals as well.

Peart contributes the band's lyrics, which range from pseudo-intellectual to fantasy to moralistic preaching. Lee and Lifeson write the music. Their albums regularly go platinum. In spite of bizarre time signatures, and an absence of obscenity.

The songs of Signals are shorter, there is less soloing, the vocals are in a more conventional register (i.e. no more screaming), and the beat has been Police-fied, but the skill and imagination are still there. Peart's fascination with technology and the pace of modern life is expressed in the launching of the space shuttle ("Countdown"), the fear inherent in a militarized world ("The Weapon"), the interplay of emotional obligations and political consciousness ("New World Man"), the pressure to conform and meet expectations ("Subdivisions"), and in a tribute to the mystique of life ("Chemistry").

Toronto DPW

In this light, the thanks given for the front cover (to the Toronto DPW), and for the liner and rear cover (to the Montreal Expos), seem an intentional contrast; a warning to avoid taking rock music too seriously. After all, the proper place for Rush's music has always been the concert hall, and how can you take anything seriously in that atmosphere? See you at the Brendan Byrne Arena.

Holy Cross

When Holy Cross administrators shrank the traditional "Senior Week" to "Senior Weekend", Laura Parker '83 decided to throw an off-campus keg party to protest a "ridiculous" ban on campus parties during the week of September 20. "I'm 21 and I don't like being treated like a baby," she asserted. Worcester police agreed when they showed up at the Thursday night party in response to neighbors' complaints. Although no one was arrested, one officer warned, "Anyone still here when the paddy wagon arrives is going."

The administration reported "numerous complaints" from residents about this and other off-campus festivities. These were the first complaints in eight years about Holy Cross students, according to one professor.

Although administrators had little control over off-campus events, they did their best to dampen on-campus parties. In addition to the ban on weeknight partying, the Dean of Students called an entire floor into his office and warned them that they would be held personally responsible for any damage if they proceeded with a planned party. Other students reported that party permits were declined with no explanation.

Despite this, Dean Rev. Raymond Schroth claimed that the administration has not interfered with the students' right to drink when they want to, according to the Holy Cross Crusader. Schroth added that Senior Week had been shortened because "parties... should not be timed or conducted in a way that unreasonably distracts students from studying or lowers the academic tone of Holy Cross."

As a student put it, "some professors complained that in class seniors were 'listless and irritable', not to mention cranky."

Amherst

Despite six years of coeducation, Amherst is becoming less and less attractive to women. The class of '86 is almost 64 percent male, reports the Student, up more than five percent from last year.

Assistant director of admissions Amy Johnson explained, "I'd like to think it's a fluke, and that a lot of the women (accepted by Amherst) matriculated at Harvard, Princeton and Yale." Admissions officers also pointed to "an inaccurate perception of Amherst in some college guidebooks."

Edward Flske, in the New York Times Selective Guide to Colleges, noted, "Women at Amherst are still significantly outnumbered and unhappy about it." He attributed this unhappiness to roadtripping by Amherst men and a "masculine tone" that often pervades academic and extracurricular activities.

bookcase, does not even attempt to belittle its sixty-plus years. Antiquity seems to flow from the walls, which, despite their age, are neat, sturdy, and well-stocked. Computers, calculators, linoleum, and florescents are not to be found in Tash's.

Anna is the quiet sister, almost an alter-ego of Fannie. She tends to the household chores in the sisters' adjacent home. They take great pride in their house, eager to describe the modest luxury of its twelve rooms. Together the two women suggest indomitable spirit and success.

Tash's today, as in its origins, is inextricably linked to Williams. Fanny unabashedly admits her affinity to the school and the students.

"I live from the students and I love the college," she reveals, explaining the historical links between her family and the institution.

"My father delivered to the school, my brother-in-law was a chef, and today the kids are my

Clark celebrates natal days

by Cheri Goulet

In observance of the 250th and 100th anniversaries of the births of Joseph Haydn and Zoltan Kodaly respectively, the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute presented a performance of selected works of these artists Wednesday evening. The featured performers were Julius Berger, a highly accomplished cellist from West Germany, and harpsichordist Lory Wallfisch, professor of music at Smith College.

The concert opened with a rarely heard Haydn concerto (in G) for harpsichord and strings. Wallfisch was accompanied by a very talented quartet from Smith consisting of Helen Gover on first violin; Ann Rubel, second violin; Sara Bloomer, viola; and Malda Goodwin, cello. Wallfisch led the group through the lighthearted piece, constantly flashing a delightful grin and appearing to enjoy herself immensely. She played with brilliance and precision, her fingers often a blur on the keyboard.

Impassioned artist

Julius Berger followed with the stirring Sonata for Unaccompanied Violoncello, op. 8 by Kodaly. The picture of the impassioned artist, Berger made the technically difficult abstract... modern piece a haunting and emotionally... draining experience. The heavier work served as a perfect counterpoint for the Haydn concert. A receptive audience called Berger back on stage three times.

After intermission, the entire ensemble returned to perform another Haydn concerto (in C) featuring Berger as soloist. The spirited piece perfectly rounded out the planned program. A delighted audience, however, convinced Mr. Berger to play an encore, and he selected a short work by Bach.

Local heritage

Her eyes twinkle as she recalls the memories of her family, which included twelve brothers and sisters. With only five still alive, she and Anna strive to keep the Tash name a part of the local heritage. For sixty years they have operated the store for better or worse. Rich in memory and memorabilia, the Tash's and their grocery are an admixture of past and present, a living manifestation of the elusive "American Dream." Tash's has not been forgotten by time, but simply has aged in the ways that Anna and Fannie have let it. The sisters refuse to give up the "human" quality of their store, forsaking conformity in order to preserve what their father left them. And this consistency is what the Tash's are most proud of. Just ask them.

OCC loses productive director

by Jack Mayher

Barbara-Jan Wilson, director of the Office of Career Counseling since 1979, left Williams this week to start a new job as the Director of Career Development at Wesleyan University.

Fatma Kassamali will be acting director until a replacement is found. Kassamali has been at Williams since 1978.

The main reason for Wilson's departure was to join her husband, Tim Napier, formerly assistant director of admissions at Williams, in Connecticut. Napier is now working at the University of Connecticut.

Making the OCC more visible on campus was one of her most important accomplishments as director, Wilson said. Because of programs designed exclusively for a particular class, such as Freshman Snacks, which introduce freshmen entries to the OCC resources, and Senior Starter sessions, which get seniors started on the job-hunting trail, more students know about the OCC than before, she claimed.

One of the best
"Williams' OCC is one of the best in the country," Wilson said, a sentiment echoed by many recruiters who have visited Williams, including Goldman Sachs, an investment banking firm. Goldman Sachs received 2,000 applications, interviewed 500 and gave job offers to 11, two of them Williams students. The firm's recruiters said that of all the undergraduates interviewed, by far the strongest candidates were from Williams.

Wilson pointed out that although the average Williams student has already gone through a very tough selection process and is very well-prepared academically, "having a strong OCC is a definite asset."

Wilson also tried to strengthen the OCC's ties with alumni. She actively recruited alumni to give informational talks on their careers, including unusual ones, as well as to counsel students on possible careers and job openings.

Alumni network

To a lesser extent, alumni have introduced students to their professions through the Extern Shadow Program, helped graduates look for jobs, and have even hired students for summer jobs.

"They make it much easier to show students what it's really like 'out there,'" said Wilson of the alumni network. "I couldn't think of doing my job without them."

Some may feel that the College's strong commitment to the OCC's preprofessional counseling may endanger the purity of its commitment to liberal arts education, Wilson speculated. But she feels quite the opposite.

Mixed emotions

"If the OCC is strong it saves people who are busy studying the need to worry about the future," she explained. "We'd like the office to have a certain 'we're there when you need us' posture."

Wilson has mixed emotions on leaving but she did stress that any Williams student or alumni is welcome to consult her at Wesleyan.

Wilson's replacement is being sought by a student-faculty search committee, which is accepting applications until October 15. Her replacement should start no later than January 1.

Nuclear relocation plans derided

by Jim Peak

Organizers derided the government's civil defense plan to bring 85,000 to 90,000 evacuees to Williamstown as "a pure fantasy which makes no sense whatsoever" at last Saturday's Crisis Relocation Awareness Fair.

Sponsored by the Williams Disarmament Forum and the Williamstown Nuclear Weapons Education Center, the fair was part of a daylong program which included lectures, discussions, and films in an effort to educate the public concerning the civil defense plans for Williamstown.

The fair on Baxter Lawn featured pamphlets, posters, and exhibits, each illustrating a different facet of the civil defense plans, as well as the entire nuclear freeze campaign. The most prominent exhibit was an 18-foot model of an American cruise missile.

Katie Edmonds, who staffed one of the booths, felt that the fair was important "to let people know what is really happening. Just talking about defense spending does not give people an accurate picture of the horrible consequences of nuclear war."

Hospitality

At 3:30 pm fairgoers at the town hall welcomed a contingent of citizens from Greenwich and New London, Connecticut, symbolic of the evacuees the government says will go to Williamstown during a nuclear attack. The government expects each Williamstown home to hold ten evacuees for every current occupant. In addition, Williamstown would somehow have to provide sufficient food, water, and medical supplies to ten times the normal population. According to biology professor Barton Slatko, the North Adams Regional Hospital only expects to be able to "handle several dozen people during an emergency."

According to a survey conducted by the Nuclear Weapons Education Center on Spring Street, only 28 percent of the respondents did not feel they could accommodate a ten-fold increase of occupants in their homes. Finally, 87 percent felt that the crisis relocation plan was unacceptable and inadequate.

No escape

One of the Greenwich representatives, Rhoda Jenkins, explained that the fair was an attempt to "do something visible, photographic. The evacuation idea sounded so completely crazy that we had to do something." Cynthia Rubin, from New London, said that she lives "so close to the submarine base (in Groton) that I can hear taps being played. It is unbelievable to think that I could get out. The traffic, for one thing, would be simply unimaginable."

Later that evening, Allan Krass, Professor of Physics and Science Policy at Hampshire College, spoke on the American civil defense policy as a prime ingredient of President Reagan's defense strategy. He claimed that "nuclear war is being made into just another instrument of foreign policy."

Krass felt that the public's continued interest in nuclear weapons and civil defense as a means of security verged on "social madness." "Nuclear weapons and personal security are simply incompatible terms," he added.

Fire safety limits

The Williamstown Building Inspector, during the course of his inspection of several buildings which house students, took a closer look at the areas classified as "places of assembly." Based on the square footages of each area and the number of approved means of egress he arrived at a maximum capacity. The results are listed below.

said, "your image might be one of babies being kissed and statesmen being hugged. And although the covenant of the PLO to this day still calls for the liquidation of Israel, it has become fashionable to refer to 'the moderation' of Arafat whose goals, it is claimed, extend no further than the realization of Palestinian nationalism on the West Bank."

Jacobsohn then commented on the relationship between Israeli expansionism and the PLO. He said, "If indeed it was the intention of the Israeli government to strike a decisive blow against Palestinian nationalism by destroying the PLO, then its judgment . . . must be seriously questioned. Moreover, an objective political assessment of the situation might suggest that by bringing the PLO to its knees the Prime Minister's government risks the loss of its trump card in pursuing its annexationist ambitions on the West Bank . . . Begin can pursue his settlement policy because the PLO monopoly over Palestinian nationalism allows him correctly to maintain that there are no Palestinians with whom to bargain."

Jacobsohn continued, "No government of Israel could negotiate with the PLO and survive but it is also the case that none could survive the rejection of a sincere offer of accommodation and coexistence."

Profound hypocrisy

Nathan Katz, an assistant professor of religion, was also sympathetic to the Israeli position. He blamed "the profound hypocrisy of the world" and the resulting isolation for backing Israel into a corner "from which it at times unwisely lashes out."

He suggested that "to understand the sometimes aggressive and militant policies of . . . the government of Israel and to assign responsibilities for those policies . . . one direction in which we have to look is that of the world community at large. And my claim is very simple: that the isolation of Israel diplomatically, commercially, spiritually—is one of the direct contributing factors, perhaps the most significant one, to Israel's . . . militaristic policies."

He pointed to the fact that the U.N. has passed a large number of resolutions of censure against member states since the late 1940's, seventy percent of which have been directed against Israel, according to Katz.

Eye for an eye

The moderate viewpoint was represented by Robert Stiglicz, an assistant professor of political science, who spoke about the complexity of the situation in Lebanon and the psychological conditions necessary for a political solution to the conflict.

Opting to take a neutral stand on the issue, Professor Stiglicz argued that "both the Israelis and the Palestinians have been victims of an inability to appreciate the full humanity and human needs of one another. Both together have created a 'zero-sum' psychic and territorial game in which a gain for one is construed as a loss for the other."

He warned against "the pernicious syndrome and rationalization of 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth'" while urging the "recognition of the fact that complexity should not lead to an unwillingness to act."

"In my mind," Stiglicz said, "The sound judgment at this point is to exploit every opportunity to nurture a new psychological environment, which means actively avoiding the old-style political solutions, the old 'zero-sum' thinking, and the old mentality."

Points of agreement

Despite the great variety of opinions expressed, the men agreed on four basic points, according to Professor Baker. These "elements of consensus" were the call for new government in Israel, the agreement that "a wholesale incorporation of the West Bank and Gaza would be disastrous for Israel," recognizing the importance of discussion concerning Palestinian nationalism rights, and the need for at least a partial endorsement of President Reagan's peace initiative.

Soviet views examined

by David Kleit

"The Soviet Union is at a major turning point as important as the period following Stalin's death or the transition from Leninism to Stalinism," said Professor Seweryn Bialer Tuesday night in Brooks-Rogers.

Bialer, an author of several books on the Soviet Union, discussed Soviet-American relations in the context of American policy, Soviet perceptions of that policy, and Soviet internal politics. Bialer is a Professor of Political Science and Director of the Research Institute on International Change at Columbia University.

Aging, ailing Politburo

Bialer noted that the USSR will soon experience major political changes, as Leonid Brezhnev and his aging, ailing Politburo give way to a new generation of leaders by 1990. At present, however, the expected transition is causing postponement of major decisions, he commented, saying "nobody knows who really makes decisions."

Past transition periods in Soviet politics have been times of consolidation of past gains rather than of new foreign adventures, said Bialer. He noted that Soviet economic stagnation will encourage attention to domestic affairs.

In contrast to perceived passive trends in Soviet policy, Bialer said that the political and economic collapse of the USSR is a clear goal of the Reagan Administration. This goal worries the Soviets greatly, said Bialer. Soviet leaders now "see current Reagan policy as creating a major danger for the Soviet Union," he said.

Soviets won't collapse

Bialer called Administration dreams of Soviet political collapse "a (Richard) Pipe's dream," referring to Reagan's chief advisor on Soviet affairs. "The Soviet Union is not Poland," said Bialer.

Bialer saw no prospect of an economic collapse either. He cited a massive shift of economic resources to energy in the 1970's as an example of the regime's economic flexibility. The shift prevented a CIA prediction that the USSR would become a net oil importer by 1985 from coming true, said Bialer.

Reagan's arms policy is a particular source of worry to the Soviets, said Bialer. They see him as "trying to build up military forces before negotiations," he said, in contrast to past American policies of simultaneous rearming and negotiation. Reagan is striving for first strike capability in Soviet eyes, added Bialer.

An attempt to establish nuclear superiority would be futile, said Bialer. "I'm absolutely for the freeze," he said, noting that while no experts seem to agree on how to define nuclear parity, in his view "parity simply means that each side can destroy the other."

"Many involved in arms negotiations are afraid that time is running out," said Bialer.

Volleyball spikes two opponents

by Denise Ross

The volleyball team defeated Russell Sage and Harvard but lost to Albany in a four-way match on Saturday. These wins came despite the loss of starters Carol Dorfman and Lisa Pepe.

Williams lost the first game of the match against Russell Sage 15-10, due to the fact that the team now had four freshmen starters, and this particular unit had not been used to playing together. However, once they pulled themselves together, they came back with two devastating wins in the final two matches, 15-1 and 15-1. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin attributed these wins to the awesome net work of Kathleen Gilmore '83, and the steady service of Lisa Jayne '86 in which she contributed nine straight points.

Victory over Harvard

The confidence of this young Williams team grew even stronger as they went on to beat Harvard 15-8 and 15-8 in the first two games of that match. Once again, Gilmore provided leadership for the team by being the calming voice to keep the freshmen together.

Unfortunately though, the Ephs could not sustain their strength as they were overcome by Albany in the first two games of their match 15-4 and 15-1.

Williams was not as lucky in Thursday's matches against Mt. Holyoke and UConn, as they were quickly defeated by UConn 15-7, 15-13 and by Mt. Holyoke 15-7, 15-7. It was in these two matches that the team was faced with the problem of regrouping as they lost Carol Dorfman '84 and Lisa Pepe '83 to injuries; they now had four freshmen as starters.

Tuesday's match against A.I.C. proved to be Williams' strongest games as they had all their regular starters and usual strength. The Ephs took the first game of the match 15-6 as they worked together as a team both mentally and physically.

A.I.C. lacked all signs of unity, and as a result they lost the next two games to Williams as well 15-6 and 15-12.

Field hockey has "bumpy" day, tie 1-1

by Andrew Garfield

Although they dominated play the whole game, the field hockey team had to settle for a 1-1 tie against Mt. Holyoke on Saturday.

With three-minutes left to play, Mt. Holyoke scored, but seconds later Jackie McEvoy '86 set up Cary Cento '86 with the tying goal. Coach Chris Larson Mason cited "bumpy ground" as an explanation for the lack of offensive punch.

The team lost to Springfield 2-0 on Tuesday and shut out Wesleyan 1-0 on Saturday.

Mason was pleased with the team's performance in the Springfield game despite the loss. "They are a Division I team and we played well on their astroturf field."

Win over Wesleyan

Co-captain Bea Fuller '83 scored the winning goal on a penalty stroke in the decision over Wesleyan.

"We lost half the varsity team to graduation and the junior-year-abroad program", commented Mason. The team returns five out of eleven starters including Sue Harrington '84 and Fuller, who anchor the defense, and co-captain Mary Pynchon '83, who leads the forward line.

The next home game for the Ephwomen is tomorrow at 4:00 against Middlebury. They also play at home on Saturday at 11:00 against Trinity.

'Killer B's' lead rugger drubbing

by Bert Salisbury

The rugby team challenged Albany Law RFC last Saturday on a blustery Cole Field and ended the day with a 15-0 B-side win and a 4-4 A-side tie.

In the first game the "killer B's" used the wind to their advantage and built up a dominating lead that was never challenged. Mark Evans '85 played a great game and gave Williams their first try on a long solo run. Chris Foley '85 also had his turn by adding another four points.

Roger Merriam '86 and his golden foot were able to convert both tries and also a field goal.

The inspiration of Mike Kolster '85 and Steve Phelps '83 led the scrum while the Williams line had a fun day of punching through the helpless Albany defense. The match was satisfying for both the players and the spectators.

While A-side was able to keep Albany Law on the defense through much of the game, the match ended in a 4-4 tie. John Donovan '83 did a great job of hooking the ball for Williams, and Vince Durnan '83 and Bill Donovan '83 showed intense play in the scrum. Collin Moseley '83 and Eric Russell '84 added to the potency of the Williams' kicking game by tracking down many long punts.

This Saturday Williams hosts Rheinbeck RFC at 12:00 on Cole Field.

Bill Best '83 put over the only Williams try while Hugh Hui-zenga '84 had his share of close scores. Larry Hebb '83 did a good job of keeping the back-field secure. Both line and scrum worked well all day but the points were elusive.

Last week at Middlebury, the C-side won 18-7 and the A-side won 14-3, but the B-side lost. In the annual alumni game the week before, the alumni won once again.

Ephs swat yellowjackets in home opener, 17-12

by Robert Tercek

The varsity gridders combined their running and passing attacks to effectively defeat the visiting Rochester Yellowjackets Saturday, 17-12.

Unlike last year's slow-moving contest at Rochester, in which 19 punts were exchanged, Saturday's game featured several sustained offensive drives. However, neither team managed to convert the yardage into points consistently. Williams Head Coach Bob Odell commented, "When you gain a lot of ground and don't get on the board, it's frustrating."

Junior Jeff Congdon opened up the Eph attack with a 40-yard breakaway carry around the right end on the second play of the game. The 5-11, 165 lbs. halfback, who ended the day with 81 yards on eleven attempts took the ball from the Williams 26-yard line to the Rochester 34. A series of six small gains by fullback Ted Thomas '85 and halfback Sean Crotty '84 brought the Ephmen close enough for freshman David O'Keefe to kick a 35-yard field goal with 11:20 left in the first quarter.

Drooping punt

A failed series by the Yellowjackets and a drooping nine-yard punt put the ball back into Williams' hands on the Rochester 36-yard line, where Eph quarterback B.

J. Connolly '84 led a five play push for a touchdown. Sophomore Paul Coleman snared Connolly's 27 yard pass in the endzone. O'Keefe's PAT kick added the point to give Williams a 10-0 lead.

"Our receivers looked pretty good," noted Odell. "Coleman is a damn good utility man to have around." In addition to gaining 54 yards on four receptions in the game, Coleman used his 210 lbs. to block effectively.

Late in the third period, the Williams defense gave up 40 yards on two consecutive pass interference calls, settling up a one-yard scoring rush by Rochester fullback Mike McCabe. McCabe's two-point conversion attempt failed, leaving the score 10-6 at the half.

Rochester opened up the second half with a 64-yard advance to the Williams six-yard line. But Phil Jasonis' 29 yard field goal attempt was wide to the right and the score remained unchanged throughout the quarter.

Big-play offense

After both teams traded punts in the fourth quarter, sophomore Ted Thomas gained 59 yards on a pass from QB Scott Garabedian, who alternated quarters with Connolly. The throw was almost intercepted, but Thomas cut back, grabbed the ball, and dodged two Rochester defenders and a referee. He carried the ball to the Rochester 26 yard line before being tackled.

Despite their excellent field position from Thomas' long gain, the Ephmen failed to reach the endzone. A Rochester fumble, however, on the following series, was recovered by defensive end Gary Pfaff '83 on the Rochester 32-yard line. A five play series led the way to halfback Congdon's 10 yard slant off the right end for a Williams touchdown. O'Keefe added the extra point to post a score of 17-6 with 2:35 on the clock. Rochester bounced back with a 10-play 68-yard drive, gained mostly by the passing duo of QB Jeff Wittig and split end Greg Parinello. Wittig connected on a 12 yard throw to Phil Dettore for Rochester's second touchdown. The two-point conversion pass attempt was incomplete and the final score remained 17-12.

Unfortunately, while the Ephmen gained 337 yards on the day offensively, they gave up 340 on defense. Though the defense did not have a great day, Odell cited linemen Reggie Hollinger '85 and Pfaff for outstanding play.

In a game that Williams should have dominated easily with their strong start, costly turnovers, penalties and pass coverage errors relinquished precious yardage to fuel the Rochester attack.

Soccer kicks booty

by Dave Woodworth

Jeff Sutton '83 scored at 29:25 of the first half and the defense made the goal stand as the men's soccer team pulled out a 1-0 win over Dartmouth at Hanover on Saturday.

Sutton's goal, his first of the season, came off an assist by Jeff McEvoy '86 and was the culmination of a very well-played half. In the second period, the Williams offense became a bit complacent and a charged-up Green side took control of the game. The Eph defense, however, led by goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85, prevented Dartmouth from getting the equalizer. Dartmouth outshot Williams by a 2-to-1 margin, getting 26 chances to only 13 for the Ephs. Murphy made 10 saves in preserving the shutout.

Coach Mike Russo was delighted with the victory, saying, "Anytime you beat Dartmouth (a Division I school) in anything you have to be pleased, and to shut them out at home is really something. They're a very good team, despite their 0-3 record, and their frustration showed in the second half. I was a bit worried about our lack of offense, but our defense was superb."

Beat North Adams

The win over the Big Green was the second of the week for the Ephs, who had previously defeated North Adams State, 2-1, in an overtime thriller on Wednesday. The match was a very physical one, and featured many missed scoring opportunities by both sides.

Overtime goal

The Mohawks capitalized first, as Ray Remillard booted a throw-in past a diving Murphy with 18:22 left in the match. Williams, however, scored with 7:23 left to even the count at 1-1. Marty White '83 was given credit for the goal, although it was actually punched in accidentally by N.A. goalie Jim Hachey.

Jeff McEvoy got the tlebreaker with 30 seconds left in the first overtime to give the Ephmen their victory. Again, Williams was outshot, 25-22, but Murphy made 18 saves to get the win.

The two victories ran Williams' record to 3-1, with their next match at home on Saturday against Trinity.

Championship week

Golfers ace tourney

by Ward Katsanis

The co-captains came alive to lead the Williams golf team to victory over opponents Colgate, UMass., North Adams, and R.P.I. last Thursday at Taconic Golf Club, according to head coach Rudy Goff.

The Williams squad finished the day with a combined total of 388, 24 strokes better than their nearest competitors, Colgate. Senior captains Bruce Goff and Phil Seefried both checked in with scores of 73, despite a shaky finish by Goff (three bogies in the last three holes) and a slow start by Seefried (four over first two holes). When asked about Thursday's performance, Goff '83 could only say, "the captains are back!"

Hosted Championship

Last Monday and Tuesday, the team hosted the New England Championships at the Pittsfield Country Club and at Cranwell in Lenox. UConn took first place with a two day total of 601 while Williams had 631 to finish eighth out of 44 schools. Charlie Thompson '83, who has played well all season long, had a 154 (80-74) and Mike Hennigan '85 holed out with a 157 (79-78).

Tomorrow, the team will be playing its last match of the fall at home against Springfield and Babson.

Kickers split week

by Ted Johann

The women's soccer team split their two games in a tough week of competition, moving their record to 2-2-1.

On Saturday, the Ephwomen traveled to Mount Holyoke, and lost a close 2-1 contest. The team hustled and had a few fine moments, but, as Coach Ed Grees said, "We were simply outplayed."

Mount Holyoke went ahead ten minutes into the game, but co-captain Becky Baugh '83 evened the game in the same half as she deftly placed a penalty kick in the lower left corner of the net.

As the second half opened, Mount Holyoke again gained control with their fine playmaking, and scored early. The rest of the game consisted of some good play and near misses by both teams, but the contest clearly belonged to the home Mount Holyoke team.

Win over Middlebury

Earlier in the week, the Ephwomen hosted Middlebury, and came away with an impressive 2-0 victory. Williams thoroughly dominated the first half with a crisp, sharp short passing game, which was unaffected by the strong wind on Cole Field.

The game started with a bang as two minutes into the opening period freshman standout Andrea Raphael dribbled by two visiting defenders and gave Williams a 1-0 lead.

Halfway through the second half Williams extended its lead.

Baugh made a beautiful cross from her right wing position which the Middlebury goalkeeper came out and deflected. Beth Ebel '86 alertly put the free ball into the open net and iced the game for the Ephwomen.

Goalie Laura Napolitano '85 recorded her first shutout of the season.

Ephwomen place at Amherst Invitational

by Liz Streitz

The women's cross-country team placed second in the Amherst Invitational Saturday, finishing behind Holy Cross but beating Amherst and Wesleyan.

Once again, team effort was the key to their success. The team employed the "pack strategy" which had proven its effectiveness in last weekend's Williams Invitational meet. The strategy involves taking the first mile out strong and relatively fast while staying together in a group, maintaining a consistent strong pace during the second mile and using all your remaining energy and effort for the last mile.

Overtake Wesleyan

At the mile and a half mark, Wesleyan's top four runners were ahead of Williams' top six. But all six Williams runners pulled ahead of three of the top four Wesleyan runners, leading Williams to the strong second place finish.

In addition to Amherst and Wesleyan, the Ephwomen beat Fitchburg, Trinity, Westfield and Eastern Connecticut in the 95-runner meet.

Individual finishers

Williams had seven of its runners place in the top 24. Margaret Lynch '84 was the first Williams woman to cross the finish line. With a time of 18:34, Lynch finished in eleventh place. Sue Flynn '85 took 13th place with a time of 18:47.

Close behind were Liz Moore '85, 15th with a time of 18:53, and Chinyere Uwah '85 placing 16th with a time of 18:53. Kerry Malone '84 and Lynn Vendinello '84 finished in 18th and 19th places respectively.

Council for open houses

by Laura Seligsohn

The College Council firmly moved to regain control of the housing process at last week's meeting. The meeting began as representatives shared feedback from their house-mates regarding the future of the housing transfer policy. Their reports revealed that though there were a few dissenters in each house, majorities in every house that considered the issue resoundingly favored the maintenance of the current transfer policy. Besides the reports of houses "overwhelmingly in favor of a liberal transfer policy" were fears that "a frat mentality," as Bill Foraker '85 put it, might result from a tightened transfer policy.

Convinced that campus consensus lay in favor of a loose transfer policy, the Council proceeded to pass, in a rare roll-call vote, Resolution R-1 (see box). The resolution was sponsored by representatives Bill Sawyers

'85, David Atshuier '84, Jan van Eck '85, Steve Johansen '84, and Greg Holm '83.

The resolution consists of a three-part recommendation to the Committee on Undergraduate Life. It calls for return of the Subcommittee on Student Housing to the exclusive authority of the College Council, retention of the current house transfer policy, and reconsideration by the CUL of its May 11 report in which the current transfer policy was rejected.

Mamlet dissents

The only vote registered in opposition to the resolution came from representative Geoff Mamlet '83. After the meeting, Mamlet explained that the amendment recommending return of the subcommittee on student housing to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Council was misguided, since the Council's Constitution

Students opt for transfers

A Record poll shows that students favor an open upperclass house transfer policy.

The poll, a random survey of 132 students from all classes and housing units, found that 42% of students want the current system to remain. Of the 30% who feel it should change, 74% want an even freer system, with only ten students desiring a more restrictive policy.

The poll also showed that 55% of students do not consider themselves well-informed about the transfer issue.

Specific gripe

The transfer issue is currently being considered by the Housing Committee and the College Council in the wake of last year's report of the Committee on Undergraduate Life recommending a change in the transfer process to preserve house unity.

Some students commented on the issue. "I think that if we narrow the house transfer system we'll have a group of houses filled with people who hate being there," said Don Freeman '84. "If we open it up, then people will be able to gather with people they enjoy."

Reckless drinking on the rise

by E.A. Stanton & Jack Mayher

The claim that there is a "drinking problem" at Williams generates a great deal of skepticism among students. Many protest that it is not fair to generalize about a few isolated incidents of alcohol-related damage or personal injury. However, administrators and medical staff at the Infirmary are concerned about what they term a change in student drinking patterns.

"It's a new ballgame," said Dean O'Connor. Although he realizes that students have always gotten drunk, O'Connor sees a growing trend that he finds troubling. He, Infirmary staff and at least one house president interviewed are concerned that students go to parties with the specific intent of getting as drunk as they can as fast as they can.

"The problems we've seen have been occurring as early as 9 or 10 p.m.," noted Director of Health Doctor James D. Corkins. In the past year, nurses and doctors have treated serious alcohol-related cases and have received an unusually high number of inquiries about how to deal with alcohol-related situations.

Lethal alcohol levels

Students have reported that peers use alcohol or marijuana before classes to relax. Some experience black-outs after drinking. Pregnant women have blamed their own alcohol use as the indirect cause of their unwanted pregnancies. The Infirmary staff is aware of automobile accidents involving Williams students and alcohol (at least one this year and several last year). In the past six months, two students were hospitalized in intensive care for alcohol intoxication. One had lethal levels of alcohol in this blood, and the other was very close to having lethal levels.

These observations and incidents have led O'Connor to worry that perhaps people are drinking for different reasons now—"not just to have fun but to blot out reality."

One house president disagreed. "I don't think there's a drinking problem here. There's more drinking at other schools, and there's a different mentality there." Added another president, "I'm not saying it doesn't exist; I just haven't been exposed to it."

O'Connor suggested that the only way to deal with the problem is at the peer level. His goal is to "set up conditions so students can help each other."

Hesitant friends

"I think the students perceive problems," said Corkins. Students who suspect that a friend may have drunk too much or has a drinking problem are often, though not always, hesitant to bring it to his or her attention. "How do you know when your roommate is just drunk and will be okay in the morning and when you should bring him or her to the infirmary?" asked Nurse Gangemi.

. . . But the drinking problem may be getting worse, say doctors.

Bombing death avenged

by Lucy Lytle

On the morning of September 21, 1976, a bomb exploded in the car of Orlando Letelier, the former Foreign Minister of the Allende government of Chile and Chile's Ambassador to the United States, killing him and his research assistant, Ronnie Moffitt. The process of avenging their murders was the subject of Wednesday afternoon's lecture by Michael Tigar, author of Law and the Rise of Capitalism, in Driscoll Lounge.

"Ever since the overthrow of the Allende government in a CIA-sponsored coup in 1973," began Tigar, "Orlando and others had been the leaders of a Chilean government in exile. He was, perhaps, the most effective of the Chilean politicians in exile . . . (because) he was able to bridge the gap between . . . the (leftist) broad-based coalition in support of Salvador Allende's presidency, and an even broader-based coalition in favor of the return of democratic government to Chile in the wake of the coup."

Tigar first became involved in the Letelier case when Letelier's widow, Isabelle, and Moffitt's widower, Michael, approached him to see what could be done to avenge their murders.

Murder for hire

"The first thing we had to do was to make sure that the hunt for the killers of Orlando didn't turn into a witch hunt of Chilean leftists in exile in the United States," explained Tigar. "We also wanted to insure that the case was vigorously pursued by the Department of Justice in an attempt to bring criminal prosecutions against those who

Teeth for the Council

College Council members resoundingly passed a resolution last week dealing with student housing. The resolution called in part for the return of the Student Housing Committee from the Committee on Undergraduate Life to the Council's jurisdiction. While increased student control in questions of student housing is an admirable goal, one must consider the effect of moving the Housing Committee back to the Council.

As an advisory committee to the Council, the Housing Committee had virtually no impact on the people who make housing decisions. By the time the Housing Committee opinions were wrestled over in committee, filtered through the Council, and added to other recommendations handed to the CUL, the Housing Committee's impact was severely diluted. The new Student Housing Subcommittee of the CUL may lack Council control, but it does have a direct channel to an influential decision-making body—the CUL.

The Administration rationale for placing the Housing Committee under the CUL's wing is that, under Council jurisdiction, the Housing Committee had no power. This assumption is probably correct, but rather than abandon faith in the Council, the Administration should have made an effort to give the Council the opportunity to take an active role.

One way to give the Council some teeth would be to merge the guidelines for the old and the new housing committees. The Committee could return to the ten voting members rule outlined in the Council constitution. Such a move would help restore order to the committee, which seemed to dissolve in chaos in last year's discussions.

Five of the ten voting members of the Housing Committee could be selected by the Council, elected from the Council's own ranks. Previously these five were Council housing category reps—students who have traditionally maintained a poor attendance record at Council and Housing Committee meetings. The Council should choose its members who are most interested in housing issues, ensuring an effective voice in decisions.

Finally, the task of appointing the Housing Committee's non-voting co-chairmen could be divided, the Council and the CUL each appointing one chairman.

The College Council has not lived up to its potential in the past, but this is no excuse for robbing the Council of an opportunity to make a meaningful contribution to student life. Restoring Council influence to the CUL Housing subcommittee would give the Council a chance to disprove charges that it is ineffective. Restoring Council influence would also give the Administration an opportunity to disprove charges that it is unresponsive to students. Everyone wins.

Ad flunks out

The campus community's reaction to the term-paper advertisement in last week's Record reveals much about the strength of Williams' Honor Code. While the ad did unfortunately give students a new opportunity to cheat, it also gave us an opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to the Code.

Student response was encouraging: universal rejection and condemnation. A term paper service is so unethical and ridiculous that it cannot be taken seriously, only laughed at. The Record Advertising Manager had enough faith in the Honor Code and students' self-reliance to assume no undergraduate would actually use the service. Happily, he seems correct; most students laughed and commented that no service could get an "A" out of a Williams professor.

The faculty were more upset, perhaps because they have less faith in the Honor Code. They should give students more credit. We know we can write a better paper than some guys in Toronto. And we have a lot of moral sense, as well as common sense.

Besides, we hear you professors can spot one of these things in three minutes . . .

Record stoops

To the editor:

I was outraged by the term paper service advertisement in the Record. In printing this ad, the Record gave tacit approval to plagiarism, fraud, and academic dishonesty. The ad was an assault on our Honor Code and a violation of the principles upon which the College operates.

Why has the Record stooped so low that it will profit from those who promote deceit?

John Butter '85

Eds. Note. The Record does not necessarily endorse or approve of products that are advertised on our pages.

Truly appalled

Dear Editor:

I know it's a little hard to take criticism from me for lack of judgment, considering some of the things I've written and said on this campus in the past, but I'm afraid I cannot keep silent. I was truly appalled by your decision last week to print an advertisement for a company which produces fraudulent term papers.

Surely no one on this campus needs a lecture on the Honor Code. We all know it's there, and for the most part we keep it fairly well. But when the Honor Code is broken, or there is even a threat of such a violation, this campus can be thrown into turmoil. As a former member of your staff who has been involved in investigations of two alleged cheating incidents in the past two years, I have seen this turmoil.

I sat, as a reporter, in Political Science chairman Kurt Tauber's office two springs ago, as he conferred with students and Deans, frantically trying to get the facts about an alleged stolen test. I saw the hysteria on the faces of two students who had taken a self-scheduled exam, which they might have had to take again if the facts of the case had indicated widespread cheating. Cheating is not funny. It's more than an inconvenience. It hurts us all. An ad which encourages cheating by proving a vehicle for it only adds fuel to potentially volatile fire.

We as students need to produce term papers our professors will have faith in. We have few enough opportunities to show them the knowledge we have gained from their classes. Most courses have only one hour exam, one paper, and one final exam. If we lose the ability to prove our knowledge through term papers, the entire emphasis of a course might be placed on one final exam. Is this what we want? Term papers have always been an excellent way for students to learn on their own while proving a mastery of the subject matter being discussed. It will only take one purchased paper to throw all of our work into question. Let's not pervert the system.

I'm the first guy to make a joke. But the ad for the fake term papers just wasn't funny.

Steve Epstein '83

Cheaters

To the editors:

I recognize that by accepting an advertisement a newspaper neither implicitly nor explicitly endorses its content. But still I wish to urge that the Record reconsider its willingness to carry the kind of ad that appeared on page 8 of the October 5th issue. The Trident Marketing Term Paper Service there solicits the patronage of students, and with an apt sense of its own intellectually pornographic purposes, it promises to ship "the definitive

The least beautiful people: us

by Greg Clapp

The instant life, the snapshot, the beautiful moment. There they are, two beautiful people cruising along the California coast in a Mercedes 450, hair blowing in the breeze, all smiles of beautiful teeth. Pictured right in front of the bottle of cognac.

Page after page, minute after minute we are confronted by those beautiful visions. Perfume here, jeans there. No one is terribly unfamiliar with advertising. An educated Williams person can critically examine the Freudian message. We can read the subliminal message which the captured instant "means." But it means more at Williams—much, much more.

People at Williams try to lead the instant life. Watch them in public, particularly at parties where they are aware of being watched. Every moment they are striving to meet the instant requirement—the smile or the calculatedly cool look, beautiful, self-assured, and non-committal, never to be caught being less. Every moment they want to be able to be caught by the photographer, or the mere onlooker, in the beautiful instant.

The instant life is a sad joke. The drive from San Luis Obispo to San Francisco takes about six hours, even in a 450 with a Blaupunkt tape deck, long enough for even the most beautiful of people to become bored. The wind blowing your hair gives you a headache. Smiling all the time would be a strain. The Observer magazine, a London Sunday magazine, had on their cover a model—beautiful, thin, with the popular natural look hair. The back cover showed the poor girl from behind—cardboard pieces and tape holding her hair "in place," string holding together the expensive blouse credited in fine print to a chic store.

. . . cruising along the California coast in a Mercedes 450, hair blowing in the breeze . . .

The futility, the absurdity of it all is readily apparent to the average Eph. Yet we have the audacity to identify and criticize "beautiful people" when far and away most of us are seeking exactly this status.

This is not an argument for greasy hair, dirty clothing and sullen looks—merely another fashion of sorts, acceptable as a fashion but nothing to pour your soul out over. Rather, I would like—vain hope that it is—to see just a little less posing. Face it, if we aren't accepted for what we can be, at our best or at our worst, we will never be able to maintain the facade. We know this, but continue trying. Irrational? Of course, this is the standard for behavior (see: alligator shirts, course choices).

Nonetheless, with the recognition of such behavior should come a degree of respect for our neighbors. People are, in many ways, just like us—they are surprisingly undemanding of others. It is we ourselves who require the facade for identity, hoping to be the perfect person in one way or another. Lives are more than a mere accumulation of posed instances.

Blinded accusation

by Kim Bruce MATH DEPARTMENT

During the late 1960's and early 1970's I found myself (and thousands of others) being attacked as unpatriotic for protesting the U.S. role in South Vietnam. I was told that crimes equivalent to or worse than those committed by the U.S. and South Vietnamese governments were being committed by other governments in other parts of the world. I was asked why I wasn't protesting Russian or other violations instead.

Wednesday night at a forum on the Middle East I heard the same type of argument voiced by Professor Katz: the reason there was so much protest over Israel's actions was because of anti-semitism. Why was there no equivalent outcry over genocide in Khmer's Iran, the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, the racial policies of South Africa, and the slaughter of Syrians within Syria?

The answers to these accusations today are very similar to the answers given ten or fifteen years ago to similar charges. One obvious reason is that people in the U.S. (and at least the western world) are near-unanimous in their condemnations of the behavior of the governments of Iran, Russia, South Africa, and Syria in the instances cited. There simply is no argument to be found and thus little need for a debate.

But I believe the main reason that South Vietnam was chosen years ago and Israel (as well as El Salvador) chosen today is because of the U.S. involvement. When the U.S. is involved it is possible to pressure the U.S. government to take steps either to exert its influence or to withdraw its support from the offending parties.

In Israel the U.S. government is very deeply involved. One-fourth of all U.S. foreign aid flows to Israel, $2.4 billion this year and $2.7 billion next year (and this ignores the tremendous amounts given by private citizens and Jewish organizations in the U.S.). American-made cluster bombs (used by Israel in spite of written agreements to the contrary) killed and maimed civilians; U.S.-made jets helped destroy Beirut.

There is no question in my mind that without those billions in U.S. aid, Israel would have been unable to mount and sustain the invasion of Lebanon. Israel would be unable to sustain its occupation of Lebanon and the West Bank without plunging into national bankruptcy. Thus the blood shed by Israel and the Christian militias which they have armed and supported is blood on our hands as well.

If the U.S. were supporting Iran, Russia, South Africa, or Syria in anywhere near the massive way we are supporting Israel, I would protest that as well. (We should note here that such protests against South Africa regularly occur here, these protests being aimed directly at U.S. government and corporate involvement in South Africa.)

Perhaps it should also be pointed out that the U.S. government's reactions to the events in Iran and the Russian invasion of Afghanistan were much more significant than the ineffectual hand-wringing response of the U.S. government to the massacre of civilians, repeated violations of U.S. law, and the continual violations of cease-fires and other agreements by Israel.

So Mr. Katz, don't imply that we are guilty of anti-semitism for feeling sympathy with the basic human rights of the Palestinians. We all know that anti-semitism, like racism, is alive and well in the world today. Yet remember that the

Anti-semitism unveiled

by Nathan Katz RELIGION DEPARTMENT

By its excessive oversimplification, Mr. Bruce's letter perverts the points I had made regarding the conflation of criticisms of Israel with antisemitism.

I did not say that criticisms of the government of Israel were necessarily antisemitic. Far from it: I believe my own comments calling for the fall of the Likud government, assessing Israel's responsibility for the massacres of Palestinians by Christian Phalangists, and calling for Palestinian self-determination and statehood, were not antisemitic, so Mr. Bruce's point is ill-founded.

What I was indicating is that the conflation of similar criticisms with antisemitic rhetorical devices is deeply disturbing to me.

If one hasn't studied antisemitism, one is unlikely to recognize it, except in its most overt and fanatical manifestations. Mr. Bruce's professions of innocence, made so matter-of-factly, remind me of the man who, upon first hearing about sexism fifteen years ago, simply concluded that since he didn't actively oppress women, he must be innocent of participation in the sexist structuring of our society. Such a facile denial is indeed telling.

Like racist and sexist discourses, antisemitic rhetoric is often a subtle matter. For example, the continual identification of Jews with Biblical images is a common tactic of the antisemite, resembling the "pedestal effect" trivialization of women, or of depicting blacks as happy-go-lucky, carefree children.

The attribution of so-called "Jewish" physical characteristics—the hooked nose, the beady eyes, the avuncular grin, etc.—to Mr. Begin in many contemporary editorial cartoons recalls classical Nazi devices. (See Mosse's Towards the Final Solution: A History of European Racism for an extended analysis of the origins and nature of this discourse.) To anyone sensitive to the history and persistence of antisemitism, these elements are evident today.

The problem is that most of us have never bothered to undertake such a study, even though antisemitic incidents have increased by over three hundred percent in the country since the election of Ronald Reagan. Yes, even here in the Berkshires, too.

I also argued that the degree of response, especially when coupled with these rhetorical devices, leads me to suspect the motives, conscious or otherwise, of many of those most critical of Israel. When I hear talk about any 'spirit' or 'nature' of Israel, the essentialism which underlies all forms of racism becomes clear.

Such rationalistic explanations as Mr. Bruce's—that we should be so harshly critical of Israel because of American involvements there—do not stand up to intellectual scrutiny. I should say this is precisely a rationalization in the classical sense of a defense mechanism against confronting the theologically irrational fact of antisemitism.

The theatrical and overly-emotional nature of much of last week's panel was indeed disturbing, but this should indicate that much more is going on than a purely rational discussion. And that is what's most deeply troubling to anyone sensitive to the pervasive, irrational forces at play within our community.

Coming to blows: even at Williams

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

If there's one thing that pisses me off, it's watching someone trying to pick a fight or intimidate someone. One wouldn't think Williams students could have bully or wolf-pack mentalities, but to my utter amazement, I witnessed just such bizarre behavior at a party the other night in Sage Hall.

A fantastic circus side-show unfolded before my eyes as three Williams guys burst into a party, griping that someone had thrown beer on them from an upstairs window while they were walking outside. So they demanded an apology from the two guys they held responsible.

As someone who has participated in beer fights and even poured entire glasses of beer over my head in the heat of the moment, I don't regard it as a particularly horrible experience. But I can see how someone, especially a total stranger minding his own business, might object to the stickiness and odor (especially PBR—yech!). These fellows didn't look too wet, but they still wanted the apology. But first there was some clarifying debate.

The lead-up to a fight is unbelievable because of the obvious dichotomy between the veiled threats and the supposed meaning of the actual, "reasonable" conversation. The participants discussed such arcane theories as the extent to which beer droplets are deleterious, the public (and thus sanctified) status of side-walks, and the moral freedom possessed within an entry.

But what the plaintiffs were actually doing was probing for fear, trying to exploit their three-to-two advantage, and pushing to see if the other side would back down.

Whether an apology ever came out, I honestly don't remember. But the plaintiffs wanted a kneeling, begging apology. It wasn't coming, and they knew it. So they continued to press for one, in order to start a fight.

The defendants told the plaintiffs to leave. "You're too cocky" and "Don't make me mad" were the enlightening and scintillating responses. Pushing and shoving ensued; one of the defendants was rammed into a door frame and "poked," such a gentlemanly substitute for a good solid punch, I've always thought. Somehow, the plaintiffs left, muttering, without real punches having been thrown.

This narrative is intended to provoke thought, not moralize. There are those here at Williams who view brute force and physical intimidation as legitimate behavior.

The desire to pound on person or property is counterproductive. We're here to learn to be reasonable, to see other points of view, to master our own potential. A hot temper destroys any personal growth obtained from academic work.

There are outlets in which these passions can be sublimated—I'm sure the football and rugby teams can always use more bloodthirsty gladiators.

But the best balm for conflict is to have a sense of humor. One of the defendants tried to introduce some levity into the situation, but machismo was to prevail. A sense of proportion could help such people laugh rather than get tough.

The faux pas of freshman life

by Jenny Bicks

You can tell them a mile away, the Froshburgers. They're the ones wearing the Williams sweatshirts and shiny shoes. They are the ones that actually read next week's menu with anticipation. They are the ones that arrive at class ten minutes early, bring five pens, two pencils, Kleenex, and a pencil sharpener. They are the ones eating tofu. I know them well.

In fact, a long, long time ago I too was a freshman. Yes, unbelievable but true, I too once thought that "Eph" was pronounced "Er" and tried to find the Wreck Room in the bowels of the gym. I too shook hands with President Chandler and Phil Smith. Phil Smith asked the girl ahead of me about her apple farm's crops; he inquired about the litter of show dogs being raised by the guy behind me. Phil Smith did not remember me. From that moment on I knew it would be an uphill climb. And now, being liberal and naturally generous I have decided to unlock the secrets to attempting Freshman Life and surviving.

Common conversation

As a freshman even the simplest tasks become vexing. Take, for instance, the Common Conversation. This is usually instigated in any of the following ways: 1) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark, what entry are you in?" 2) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark, what courses are you taking?" 3) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark. Oh! You live in New York City? Do you know a guy named John with brown hair?" Now, these are all well and good if you are passing in the Quad, but it will never work for In Depth Conversation. By the way, never pull these lines on an Upperclassman. He will not appreciate it.

New innovative techniques? Try these, they're sure to get a few bites: 1) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark and I'm sexually frustrated." This one could be quite useful if screamed from the dance floor of an all-college party. 2) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark and I absolutely hate it here." This will be sure to attract the many Williams fanatics roaming campus (they are the ones wearing Williams sweatshirts who aren't freshmen, as well as any alumni or tourguides within earshot. 3) "Hi, I'm Jane from Newark. My daddy owns a billion dollar corporation and takes me in his Lear Jet wherever I want to go." You'll be amazed at the number of close friends you can get in minutes.

Subtle suggestions

The key to being a hit freshman year is to be as cool as possible. This means always being as subtle as possible. When it snows for the first time, be nonchalant. Do not run outside in your pajamas and sing, "Jingle Bells" at the top of your lungs. Never ask why the North side of Baxter is cooler than the South side. It just is. When we lose a football game, don't cry. You'll soon see that no one who was at the game watched the game, and even if they did they won't remember the score in half an hour anyway.

One of the best tasks for trying out your new subtle tactics is the Williams Institution of Checking The Mailbox. Never check your box more than three times a day. This makes you look Desperate. Avoid walking into the mallroom with another person—it will only lead to comparison of yield.

Empty boxes

Whatever you do, never look as though you didn't get any mail at all. If you have to, carry an old letter in your back pocket just in case. Or try one of these other suggestions: 1) Make a deal with your roommate for a small fee to send you letters everyday. Every month or so have her put a big foreign stamp on it. 2) Order every free catalogue you possibly can. 3) Start a chain letter. 4) Write to the Government and tell them that, although you're only 17, you'd like to register for the draft.

As you can see, with a little intuition Freshman Life need not be the hazardedly uncool time it has become for many. I can't guarantee it, but if you keep in mind my subtle hints you may even find yourself having fun. Who knows? Maybe someday you'll even get some Real Mail.

Reverend redefines role

by David Desmond

"Ministers can be perceived as inquisitors or oppressors or merely stupid," asserted Carol Pepper about her position as acting chaplain.

She is enthusiastically trying to break the traditional stereotype of a chaplain by bringing her own approach to the office.

"In terms of my role, there is confusion about what a chaplain is. Some people associate religious belief with primitivity, intellectual emptiness, or rigid assumptions about morality.

"I'd like to be able to serve in whatever capacity I can and to do whatever I can. The goal of the chaplain's office is to be completely open to whatever need presents itself. The goal is vague; people make it specific."

Pepper jokes about what her office actually involves: "I am like the lilies of the field. I neither toil nor spin."

She is not smug or dictatorial about her faith. Raised a Catholic, she turned protestant because she wanted to serve

Carol Pepper

God as a minister.

"What faith I have is riddled with lots of unanswered questions. How can one explain suffering in the world? For example, violent death or hunger . . . How can the oppressed reconcile the bad things in the world with the notion that God exists or cares about them?"

Pepper is no wide-eyed Pollyanna, however. "I see myself as a person of faith, but there is so much suffering in the world. Faith must lead me to be responsive to that or it has no value. The religious questions I ask require me to articulate a relationship with God that is made concrete in the service of others.

"My faith is informed by a bias that I can't seem to escape. The bias is that I believe that God exists and that God is good (whatever that might mean); and I believe that life is good, and I hope that death may be good as well."

Pepper wants to interact with people from different religious backgrounds or none at all. She will teach a Winter Study course on personal religious revelations. Her office hours are on Mondays and Wednesdays.

Russian-in-the-Round

While Hollywood was churning out weepy epics on the sufferings of Romantic Era composers, the real trials of artistic freedom were beginning in the Soviet Union.

In the thick of it was Dimitry Shostakovich. In both 1936 and 1948 he was earmarked by the authorities as someone who had better clean up his act—that is, write prettier tunes—or get an extended tour of the unspoiled Siberian wilderness.

Present-day musicologists disagree as to whether Shostakovich came out of it all a broken artist. Some, like Harold Schonberg, insist that creative integrity went down the drain, and that we're left with a watered-down legacy. Others, turned out to be responsible."

After consulting with Attorney General Levy and then with Attorney General Bell, Tigar was convinced that little would be accomplished through these channels. His impression was strengthened when Bell responded to Isabelle Letelier's plea that something be done to avenge her husband's murder with the remark, "Well, little lady, people get killed every day and I can't be more concerned about one than another."

After the trial, it was revealed that the assassins were "members of Cuban exile groups who had been organized and financed and armed by the CIA during a period when the United States was actively attempting to overthrow Fidel Castro. When deprived of their federal funding, they went into 'murder-for-hire' business."

Michael Vernon Townley, the son of an American businessman in Chile and an agent of the Chilean secret police, recruited members of the Cuban nationalist movement and paid them for the murder of Letelier; Ronnie Moffitt was an "accidental victim," according to Tigar.

Plastic explosives

Townley demonstrated "how to make sophisticated bomb detonation devices that they (the Cuban nationalists) could use for terrorist activities in the United States and elsewhere," charged Tigar. Furthermore, "the facilities of Lan Chile, the official airline of Chile, were used to transport plastic explosives into the U.S. for the purpose of furnishing them to Cuban nationalist organizations."

Tigar was determined to "fasten legal responsibility not just on the Cubans who could be caught, but upon Manuel Contreras (head of the Chilean secret police), Pinochet, and the Republic of Chile itself."

Tigar drafted complaints against the Cuban nationalists, Michael Townley, Manuel Contreras, and the Republic of Chile.

Although the Chilean government fired off two diplomatic notes to the United States District Court in Washington, D.C., protesting that it was not subject to suit in the U.S. and denying Chilean involvement in the killings, presiding Judge Joyce Green maintained that she held jurisdiction.

The Republic of Chile was not represented in the trial in which, explained Tigar, "we proved to the court's satisfaction that the junta (with General Pinochet's approval) murdered Orlando Letelier and Ronnie Moffitt."

Three million dollars

Although three million dollars in compensatory damages were levied against the Republic of Chile and the individual defendants, and two million dollars of punitive damages were levied against the individual defendants, the Chilean government has yet to pay anything.

Because of this, efforts are currently being made in the United States and abroad to seize Chilean assets which are not regarded as immune.

Outpouring of emotion

Tigar reflected, "our efforts have not gone unnoticed in Chile. Despite the repression, the details of our lawsuits, the activities in which we have been engaged, have been front page news in Chilean newspapers . . . It has kept alive a sense of a potential return to democracy in Chile."

He also spoke of the outpouring of emotion which greeted Isabelle Letelier during a recent visit to Chile. While attending the theater she was spotted and politely rose to receive the applause of the crowd. "At first there was the applause, then the stamping of feet, until the whole theater seemed like the floor was going to give way. The announcer pleaded for order and finally, when the sound died away, there was a voice from the balcony that said 'Companero Orlando Letelier . . . presente.' And so he lives," concluded Tigar.

Union

Energy conservation can be carried too far, as Union students have learned. Over the summer, all lights in the library were connected to ten-minute timers and carrels were outfitted with bulbs that "give off about as much light as a candle," reported the Union Concordiensis.

Librarians joined students in protesting the "dark age." One staff member noted, "A library is not a library without lights, as a swimming pool is not a swimming pool without water."

The only energy savings comes when students can't find the light switches in the dark, librarians claim. Even this savings is offset by students who turn on all the lights in retaliation.

So far, all complaints have fallen on deaf ears. "We will all go blind if things are not fixed," predicted one student.

word patriotism lost much of its meaning when those working for peace in southeast Asia were labeled "unpatriotic."

Don't let the label "anti-semitic" be debased in the same way or it will become as easy to be "anti-semitic" as it was to be "unpatriotic" a decade ago. I would be as distressed if being opposed to the actions of the Israel government was considered anti-semitic as I would if being Jewish were to guarantee support for the Israeli government. Let us for once and for all stop trying to intimidate those who disagree politically by labelling them anti-semitic. Surely we are capable of better.

Be Vocal

To the editor:

I attended a recent Williams Disarmament Forum meeting, and to my dismay there were only eight people present. To my mind, nuclear arms and the threat of nuclear war are the most important issues of our age. For that reason it is appalling that only a handful of people would show up for this meeting.

Regardless of the side you take on the need for a nuclear deterrent, a supposedly enlightened campus such as this should be more vocal in showing the need for nuclear arms and keeping them safe. Those who find the nuclear arms race a menace should be more vocal and act coherently to gain a wider base of support.

The main point is this—nuclear weapons are too important for people to be apathetic. The "let someone else deal with it, it doesn't affect me" attitude will not work here. In essence your life is far too precious to put its fate in someone else's hands. If you feel we need nuclear weapons, then prove it. If you think they are a threat to humanity, then get on the ball.

Provocative

To the editor:

Last Wednesday's panel, "The Crisis in Lebanon," was the most provocative and educational evening I have ever had at Williams. The faculty here is our most valuable resource, and I believe we should have more informal gatherings like this on topics of mutual faculty-student interest. It is in situations like this—people not clutching pens and staring at notebooks—that a much freer exchange of ideas is possible.

Correction

We wish to rectify three misunderstandings in our article of Sept. 28. Regarding Maria Lourdes Roberto of the Philippines: Maria Roberto studied in the field of business economics rather than political economics. Also, Maria's response to our question, "Is it exceptional for a woman to hold a position of responsibility in the Philippines?" should be that there is only one woman whose position is higher than hers in her division, not in the Philippine government. Regarding Harvinder Kaur of Malaysia: Harvinder Kaur works for the Social Planning section of the Economic Planning Unit which is responsible for overseeing and allocating funds for development projects. Please accept our apologies for these misunderstandings.

A little more cooperation

Sponsor Sawyers reminded the Council that the resolution did not have to challenge the CUL's authority. He argued that the point is "to try to work together with the CUL using whatever resolution(s) we adopt as a working basis." He suggested that it might be in the interests of both the CUL and the Council to invite Cris Roosenraad, Chairman of the CUL, to some Council meetings. "A little more cooperation on the part of both parties is in order."

Finally, the Council formed an ad hoc committee headed by Sawyers and Derede Arthur '83, to formulate specific housing proposals. The subcommittee met on Saturday and will present its recommendations at this evening's College Council meeting.

Volleyball

by Denise Ross

The volleyball team boosted its record to 8-5 as the women defeated Union, but lost to North Adams on Thursday.

Due to a unified team effort, Williams defeated Union in the first two games of their match 15-6 and 16-14. Lisa Pepe '83 led the team with her powerful and accurate serves as she contributed four straight points.

Maria Villano '86 and Sara Griffiths '84 followed the same pattern as they each got numerous points off their serves.

Intense & Competitive

Even though Williams was playing well, they were not able to knock down North Adams as the leads bounced back and forth. The Mohawks pulled out of a 12-12 tie to win 15-13.

The second game was equally as intense and competitive, but North Adams won again 15-13. The Ephmen were led by the strong combination of Lisa Jayne '86 with her spiking and Carol Dorfman '84 in the back row. Pepe and Kathleen Gilmore '83 also complemented each other with superb hits.

Coach pleased

Overall, Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin was pleased with the work of the team, and especially with the freshmen who have worked their way into starting positions and kept the team competitive.

Williams will try to keep their intensity strong as they take on UNH and Springfield on Wednesday at UNH.

Water polo

by Ken Irvine

The water polo team crushed Amherst in front of a full house at Muir pool Friday night. The Ephmen, who are now 7-1, defeated the Lord Jeffs in both A and B games.

Williams took a commanding lead in the first quarter of the A game, overpowering Amherst with their tight defense. They let up a bit in the second quarter, allowing Amherst to score a few goals, but throughout the game Williams was in control.

Colt 45

Will "Colt 45" Andrew led the Eph scoring with seven goals and co-captain Mark Weeks had five goals, while Jeff Mills, Greg Masters and John Gould added singles, making the final score 15-10.

In the B game, the Ephs displayed their depth as they also led their opponents from start to finish and ended up winning 10-8.

Chance for Championship

The Ephmen, who last week beat Division I UMass, have an excellent team this year and have a good shot at winning the New England Division III title for the first time.

Williams hosts URI and Trinity on October 23rd.

Soccer

by Ted Johann

The women's soccer team (3-1) beat Trinity 2-0 on Saturday, and just missed against Dartmouth last Tuesday, losing 1-0.

Jean Loew '84 made both scores in the victory with alert play. Twenty minutes into the first half, Loew took a ball which had been deflected by the visiting goalie, and pounded it home. Halfway through the second half she iced the game by kicking a loose ball into the goal.

Slippery conditions

Goalkeeper Laura Napolitano '85 had an outstanding game, recording her second shutout despite the difficult, slippery conditions. Sweeper Karen Montzka '85 continued to play consistently superb defense. The game was one of the best of the season for the team, as they played together two strong halves of play.

Women zip to head of pack

by Liz Strelitz

With five of its runners placing in the top ten positions, the Women's cross-country team was the clear victor in a four-team meet held at Trinity last weekend.

Defeating Smith, Trinity and a strong Union team that last year traveled to the Division III Nationals, Williams again relied on its depth.

Individual finishers

Close behind victor Elizabeth Amrien of Trinity was Williams co-captain Susan Bragdon '83, who placed third with a time of 18:02 to lead the Williams pack. Margaret Lynch took fifth place with a time of 18:21 and Susan Flynn finished in sixth at 18:26.

Also placing in the top ten were Liz Moore '85 in eighth with a time of 18:45 and Chinyere Uwah in tenth with a time of 19:06. Lynn Vendinello '84 and co-captain Kerry Malone '84 took thirteenth and fifteenth places, respectively, which further increased the gap in the final standings between Williams and second-place Union.

Achieved their goals

Coach Bud Fisher said "Our goal this weekend was to both win the meet and to run fast first-mile times. We accomplished both these goals and were able to maintain the strong pace we had established in the first mile during the second and third miles." Overall, the cool, windy conditions at Trinity led to fast times on the three-mile course.

NESCAC Tournament

The Williams runners are looking forward to the New England Small College Athletic Conference twelve-team competition this next weekend. Although there will be no official team scoring, Williams is looking to defeat both Middlebury and Bates.

While the Williams team defeated Middlebury at the Williams Invitational two weeks ago, they were edged by both Middlebury and Bates in the first meet of the season at Middlebury.

Green tramples runners

by Lyman Casey

Strong performances by the top five runners were not enough for Williams on Saturday, as Dartmouth and UConn beat the Ephmen in men's cross-country action.

The extremely deep Dartmouth squad put three men in front of John Nelson '84, who turned in a personal best of 25:34 on the Williams course, taking 5th place. Brian Angle '84 also turned in a personal record of 26:02 in taking 12th place overall and 2nd for Williams.

The overall winner was Dartmouth's Jim Sapienza, whose time of 24:32 was the second-fastest ever on the Williams course.

Ian Brzezinski '86 and Dan Riley '83 ran solid races, grabbing 15th and 16th respectively, and Bennett Yort '84 rounded out the scoring, taking 24th place in an impressive return from an injury layoff.

The meet with Dartmouth and UConn, who are both ranked among the top teams (Division I thru III) in New England, represents an effort on the part of the team to upgrade its schedule which should help the team when the highly competitive late season meets arrive.

In other Saturday action, the Men's B squad dropped its away meet against strong Trinity and Union Varsity teams. Running top man for the Ephs was Tom Pingree '86 in 10th place. Also placing well for Williams was Allen Doyle '83, who took 11th place.

Williams travels to the New England Small College Athletic Conference Individual Tournament Saturday at Tufts.

Booters revive to tie

by Dave Woodworth

In a match noteworthy for its comebacks, Trinity made the last one and managed to fashion a 3-3 tie with the men's soccer team on Saturday.

Williams had the better of the play for much of the opening period, getting several golden scoring opportunities but frustrated by Bantam goal-keeper Ed Simmons.

In an instant, however, the flow of the game changed, as Trinity striker Jerry Weinberger took advantage of a mis-play by a Williams defender to uncork a slow roller from about 20 yards out. As Eph goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 bent down to scoop up the ball, another defender, trying to clear it, accidentally tapped it past him and into the net with 19:29 left in the half.

. . . the Ephmen mounted an unbelievable offensive . . . three goals in six minutes.

The score remained at 1-0 at the intermission, but the goal had given Trinity life, and at 56:17, after a hand ball in the penalty area, Bantam Barney Carnig booted home the ensuing penalty kick to give Trinity a seemingly insurmountable 2-0 lead.

Not over yet

The Ephmen, however, were far from dead, and after a few moments of panicky play, they regained control of themselves and the match. Then, with the momentum completely shifted to the home side, the Ephmen mounted an unbelievable offensive that resulted in three goals within the space of about six minutes. The first came off the foot of Eric Stein '84 at 69:34; the second was scored by Doug McKenney '85 at 72:15, and the third by Jeff Sutton '83 at 75:48.

All three goals were scored in the same manner, with the Williams front line beating the Trinity defense and forcing Simmons out of the goal, then knocking the ball past the beleaguered keeper and into the net. The Ephmen almost had a fourth goal, but Simmons covered the ball inches in front of the goal line and a millisecond ahead of a Williams striker.

Still not over

This save turned the tide once again, and another mistake by the Williams defense gave Trinity the equalizer at 83:24. This time it was Murphy who was forced out of the net, as he ran to get a ball passed back to him by an Eph fullback. The ball was intercepted by Trinity's Peter Miller, who took a shot that deflected off Murphy and trickled into the net.

The overtime periods saw Williams regain the upper hand, but the Ephmen were unable to score. One final opportunity came with about 20 seconds left in the second overtime, as a shot by Marty White '83 was not held by Simmons. However, the follow-up shot somehow managed to hit the keeper square in the chest, and Williams had to settle for the draw.

Defense adjusts

Coach Mike Russo said of the game: "This was the best Trinity team we've faced in several years, and they played well. I'm rather pleased at the way in which we were able to come back from adversity.

"Our defense had some problems adjusting to their style of play, which featured a quick-strike, long-ball, over-the-top offense. We had faced more patient teams in the past several games, and it threw us off. Our defense has played well up until this point, however, and I think they'll put on a strong show against Clark on Monday."

The tie placed Williams' record at 3-1-1.

Field Hockey: Eph win in overtime

by Andrew Garfield

Bea and Allison Fuller and Jane Rech scored consecutively on overtime penalty strokes to clinch the field hockey team's two to one victory over Trinity Saturday.

The game ended with the score tied at 1-1 and remained deadlocked after two seven-and-a-half minute overtime periods.

The decision then went to penalty strokes. Each coach selected five players to hit penalty strokes at the opposing goaltender. After goalie Jean Hakmiller '86 had easily saved the first Trinity shot, Bea Fuller '83 scored, giving the Ephwomen an advantage.

Trinity evened it up with a shot off the post which Hakmiller could not reach. Allison Fuller then put Williams ahead to stay with a stroke which went through the Trinity goalie's legs.

On the next Trinity scoring attempt, Hakmiller made a spectacular hand save. Then Rech wristed the ball into the upper left corner, extending the penalty stroke lead to three to one. Hakmiller stopped the fourth Trinity shot, eliminating the visitors from the contest.

Fuller hurt

Williams started the scoring in the first half. On a corner stroke, Cary Cento '86 set up Sue Harrington '84, who slapped it into the net.

Bea Fuller was hit with a stick in the second half and temporarily forced out of action. Trinity's Laura Gill took advantage of Fuller's absence to score the tying goal 16 minutes into the half.

Bea Fuller returned shortly afterwards and from then until the end of regulation time, Williams applied constant pressure. The best scoring opportunity occurred when the Trinity goaltender fell on the ball. However, Bea Fuller missed the ensuing penalty stroke.

Tied Middlebury

In a tough defensive battle on Wednesday, Williams played Middlebury to a scoreless tie. The Ephwomen's record now stands at 3-1-3.

Goal line stands were the rule of the day at Saturday's game against Trinity. Trinity's were successful; Williams' were not. (Scheibe)

Bad breaks lead to gridder loss

by Mike Gillis & John Clayton

Trinity built up a 13-0 lead in the first half and then coasted to a 21-13 victory over the football team Saturday.

Bad breaks characterized the Williams offense, as twice they moved inside the two-yard line but failed to score.

Sophomore fullback Ted Thomas was a bright spot for the offense, gaining 112 yards on 20 carries. But juniors Sean Crotty and Jeff Congdon were held to nine and twelve yards, respectively.

Quarterback B. J. Connolly '84, who replaced Scott Garabedian '83 late in the first quarter, went 13 for 25 with two touchdowns and two interceptions. Garabedian was three for five with one interception.

Turnovers hurt

Unfortunately, those interceptions were costly. The play after the Garabedian interception, Trinity quarterback Joe Shield threw a 50-yard pass to Mile Elia for the first touchdown.

Trinity added another score on an 80-yard drive late in the second quarter. Ned Ide plunged one yard for the touchdown. They missed the extra point.

Bad breaks continued for the Ephmen in the second half, when they attempted to punt from their own goal line. The snap to punter John DeLorenzo '84 sailed over DeLorenzo's head and over the end line for a safety, making the score 15-0.

Goal line chances

Thomas ran 34 yards on a draw play to set up Williams' first goal-line chance, but a penalty negated Thomas' touchdown plunge, and Connolly was intercepted on the next play.

The Ephmen had another chance early in the fourth quarter, but failed on a fourth and goal on the two yard line.

Williams, outplaying Trinity in the fourth quarter, finally scored on a nine yard pass from Connolly to tight end Paul Coleman '85 after a 42 yard drive. The attempt for a two-point conversion failed.

Trinity, however, came right back to squelch Williams' comeback hopes as Elia sprinted around right end for 70 yards, although the extra-point kick was again no good. Elia's run marred an otherwise excellent defensive half for Williams.

Williams scored its last touchdown with no time remaining on the clock, as Connolly threw a five-yard pass to Marc Hummon '84, and Dave O'Keefe '86 added the extra point.

The Williams offense failed to mesh in the first half, as they had only 67 total yards compared to 212 for Trinity.

The rushing game had trouble all day, as 51 rushes netted only 100 yards. They had 266 yards total offense on the day, compared to the Bantams 329.

Punter DeLorenzo was a bright spot, with a 43.6 yard average on seven punts.

The gridgers take their 1-2 record to Bowdoin on Saturday.

Rugby stomps on Rheinbeck

by Bert Sallsbury

In a day of high scoring and superb play both sides of the rugby club were victorious over Rheinbeck: A-side 56-12 and B-side 28-0.

The A-side game was dominated by effective scrum running and a line that played to its scoring potential. Dan Maynard '83 and Hugh Hulzenga '84 put over 6 tries between them while Jim Bell '84, Bill Donovan '83, Jim Steggall '83 and Vince Duran '83 also had their turn at putting the ball down for a score.

Eric Russell '84 added much to the WRFC point spread. Mike Chambon '83 ran both around and over the Rheinbeck defense having a great birthday in the scrum. It was a fine day of rugby as the whole team played well together in a satisfying victory.

B-side shutout

B-side fared as well in a 28-9 shutout. Bill Best '83 had his share of points with a try, a conversion and a field goal. Colin Moseley '83 was a key element in the fine line play as he put over one try and assisted several others. Chris Foley '85 and Dave Skinner '86 also touched down a try each, while Jeff May '85 added a field goal.

The intensity of play in the scrum was overwhelming as Rich Weber '83 and Pete Saulnier '83 both had great games. The day was summed up with a long solo run by John May '84 that brought forth chants and cheers from the mass of spectators.

This weekend the WRFC looks forward to the Berkshire Tournament in Pittsfield.

Muhammed Kenyatta '81 said Harvard Law School needs an open-arms policy with regard to black professors. (Scheibe)

Kenyatta clarifies Harvard Law boycott

by Brett McDonnell

"Affirmative action is not an exercise in charity, but an effort to correct a wrong that has been committed, a wrong that continues," said Muhammed Kenyatta '81 in a speech in Brooks-Rogers Wednesday, October 13.

Kenyatta, a civil rights activist in the 60's, second year student at Harvard Law, and husband of Dean Many Kenyatta, has recently been in the middle of a national storm over the hiring practices of Harvard Law School. The Harvard Black Law Students Association, headed by Kenyatta persuaded 500 students (out of 1600) to sign a petition asking the Law School to reinstate a course on constitutional law and minority issues.

"This was seen by the students as a strategem to persuade the school to hire at least another black professor," said Kenyatta. Currently, only two of the sixty-five law school faculty members are black, and only one of those is tenured.

Class boycotted

The school did reinstate the course, but it is to be taught by a visiting professor, Julius Chambers. Chambers, in turn, asked Jack Greenberg, the executive director of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, to help teach the course.

Because no new blacks had been hired, Kenyatta and his organization decided to boycott the course. Since Greenberg is white, people misunderstood the students' motives, said Kenyatta, and a furor developed which was widely reported by the national press. "We found," remarked Kenyatta, "that here at the law school, the citadel of liberalism, allegations of reverse racism had taken hold."

This led Kenyatta to the subject of blacks and white liberalism. "At this point," he commented, "we (blacks) find ourselves in a very dangerous position. There is a danger of being isolated by and within the liberal establishment." He pointed to major differences between blacks and white liberals.

Williams not perfect

One such difference is busing. "Survey after survey," explained Kenyatta, "indicates that most black parents are not enthusiastic about school busing simply as a way to achieve racial balance."

Another example is the comments Kenyatta received about allowing himself to be interviewed by the Williams Republican: "The assumption seemed to

by Ned Ladd

Conventional conservatism marked U.S. Senate hopeful Raymond Shamie's address to a sparse gathering of Williams students and faculty on Wednesday, October 13. The Garfield Republican Club, in conjunction with the Massachusetts College Republican Union, brought Shamie to Williams in a continuation of its protest of the liberal policies of Senator Edward Kennedy.

Shamie, president of his own corporation and an innovator in the medical industry, spoke of the merits of the private enterprise system. He called for lower federal spending and tax cuts to spur business. He explained that tax cuts may actually bring in more money for the government in the long run by creating growth.

Spending cuts would come from many areas of the budget. "As much as $10 billion" can be taken out of the defense budget without any loss in military capability, according to Shamie. He went on to say, "It costs the Army $3.00 to buy a 9¢ part . . . We can cut out that waste."

Welfare waste

Welfare, as well, could be restructured to save money. "Of every dollar spent on welfare, only 25¢ reaches the poor," Shamie stated. He feels that direct cash assistance, rather than Food Stamps or other bureaucratic programs, will provide the most effective aid.

Tax cuts, according to Shamie, will bring American business out of the present recession. When questioned why the Reagan tax cuts have not done this, he replied, "We didn't have a tax cut last October. With the payroll tax increase, the average American family paid $150 more in taxes than the year before. The first real tax cut occurred in July. We're only two months into Reagan's policies." He also pointed to the rise in the stock market following the cuts as evidence

A New York DAILY NEWS cartoonist penned this impression of Williams without "maids" to accompany a story on the phase-out of matron service at the College.

Nation chuckles over matron loss

Some "well-heeled" Williams students are "ever so grossed out about having to clean their own dormitory rooms," according to a report in the New York Daily News. In the weeks following the Record's publication of a story on the end of College matron service, newspapers and radio stations across the country spread the word about the "maid service" at Williams College.

The Daily News ran a story on October 13 which included the above imaginative cartoon and the title, "Swept Away: College Maid Service Bites the Dust." While the Daily News used uniquely sarcastic phrasing, it was not alone in devoting space to the College's loss of "maids."

The story was picked up by both the Associated Press and United Press International wire services and distributed coast to coast. Among many other papers, the story ran in The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal. Across the country it was picked up by the Fresno, California Bee.

In New England, the story ran on page one of the Worcester Telegram & Gazette. The Gazette used the Associated Press version which contained some information new to the Williams administration: "Wendy Hopkins, director of student housing, said the College apparently was the last one, private or public, with maids, but Southern Methodist University in Dallas said it had maid service and has no plans to discontinue it."

The AP version, however, did imply that Williams' "maid service" included bed-making by beginning the story "students at exclusive Williams College must make their own beds and clean their own rooms because cost-cutting has prompted school officials to dump maid service."

On the airwaves the maid story was broadcast by Boston radio stations WBZ and WEEI and Worcester's WAAF.

College Council submits 'just' transfer policy

The College Council voted overwhelmingly Thursday to submit its housing transfer plan to the CUL at the next CUL meeting.

The "Prioritized Lottery System Proposal," sponsored by Perry House Representative Paul Pomilla '84, includes a point system for housing transfer candidates and a lottery for house choice. The plan will give juniors four points and sophomores one point, with from zero to eight further points given inversely according to preference as stated on freshman inclusion applications.

A sophomore living in his first choice housing category, for example, will only have one point, while a junior living in his fifth choice will have 12 points. The lottery will involve students, in order of points, choosing a house from among those with rooms available for transfers, as determined by the Housing Office.

Justice emphasized

The plan identifies justice, rather than diversity or freedom, as the first priority for a transfer system. It is designed to correct the perceived inequity of a present system that does not discriminate between students trying to leave their first or their fifth choice housing, or between sophomores and juniors.

To counter objections that the plan will squeeze out freshmen or will fail to redress class imbalances in housing units, it includes authorization for class quotas within houses. Hardship cases may also be considered outside the system.

Finally, Council hopes the new plan will encourage freshmen to make housing choices on the basis of their real preferences rather than applying their first choice merely to the category they think they can get into.

"Given the disparity of quality in physical plant on campus," said Joe Beach '84, "it's impossible to make everybody happy. There are going to be drawbacks to every proposal." But Beach saw the Pomilla proposal as "a basis for further action on the house transfer dilemma. It is important for us to submit something to the CUL; we're acting in the interests of students," he said. Council President Stuart Robinson '83 emphasized that the CUL is not bound by any College Council mandate on transfer policy.

Racism seminar

In other business, Robinson suggested a greater educational role for the Council. In particular, he proposed a campus-wide seminar to be sponsored by the Council in January, probably January 13-15, on the topic of racism. "We're always ready with a statement on behalf of the student body when something (like the crossburning) happens—why can't we take a more educational role before?" asked Robinson.

While agreeing with the general idea of a seminar, several members felt that more student input should be sought on its topic.

Extension overdue

The current closing times of Sawyer Library make inefficient use of its resources. Only a handful of students use the library during daylight hours. Instead, most study well beyond midnight—but Sawyer closes at eleven. Students must leave their theses and term papers behind at the carrels with their research materials; everyone is forced into the noisy and crowded basement or to loud dormitories.

The upstairs contains nearly all of Sawyer's books and comfortable work areas. Shutting them down before many students even start studying causes incalculable loss to academic pursuit.

The College went through tremendous pains to design a library that would suit the students' study habits. It was built to be a study center, not merely a book repository. To close this center just when students most use it is inimical to its purpose.

We urge that Sawyer Library's hours be extended until 12:00 or 1:00 a.m. in the upstairs levels and returned to a 2:00 a.m. closing downstairs. Relatively minor staffing problems could be overcome: if necessary, students could oversee the late night hours. Even now, Sawyer is run by only students during many hours of the week. The library should suit the needs of the students rather than the library staff.

We are privileged to have the unique resource of Sawyer Library; it is a shame that it goes to considerable waste.

Egregious error

To the editor:

I vehemently protest your publishing an advertisement for a term paper service. I consider it so serious a breach of academic integrity in our college community that, were it in my power to do so, I would withdraw all College funding for the Record for the remainder of the academic year. You take College Council monies, allocated from the mandatory Student Activities Tax of $66 per student, and use them to support a newspaper that is often an embarrassment, but now has become an outrage. Do not blame the ad manager. You are collectively responsible for an egregious error, and I, for one, can think of no way for you to redeem yourselves.

Standards

To the editor:

I wanted to share my concerns with you over the advertisement for term papers I found on page 8 of the October 5, 1982, Williams Record. During my four years as business manager of the Record, the editors and I were also faced with the considerable temptation of extra advertising revenues from these so-called "research" services. While I suppose the individuals placing this ad deserve some consideration for their candor, I was further distressed by the blatantness of their sales pitch—"we ship in plain brown envelopes."

Williams' most enduring legacy is its total dedication to the maintenance of the highest academic standards. The recent toughening of standards for Phi Beta Kappa is but one example.

Finally, the possibility of disciplinary action being brought against students purchasing these "canned" term papers is obvious. I hope the editors and staff will reconsider their decision to add to the temptation by offering space in the Record to these companies.

Anti-semitism?

To the editor:

Regarding the "anti-semitism" which Professor Katz perceives in current cartoons exaggerating the facial features of Prime Minister Begin:

Not only are such "classical Nazi devices" not limited to the portrayal of such Jews as have attracted a caricaturist's reprobation, they are far less likely to be directed against Jews than Arabs. For the past eight years, cartoon representations of Arab sheiks, greedy for OPEC gains, have been editorial-page staples, displaying exactly those hooked noses, beady eyes, and avaricious grins cited by Mr. Katz—and with a viciousness which makes caricatures of Begin appear mild. I recognized these ethnic stereotypes, but I did not protest them. Did Mr. Katz?

There are Semites who are not Jews, and more uses than one to be made of old cartoons from Der Stürmer.

Sensationalism

To the editor:

Your front page headline "Reckless drinking on the rise" is sensationalistic and misleading; not one fact offered in the article indicates an increase in alcohol abuse. Such claims as suggested by the headline and Dean O'Connor's assertion that "perhaps people are drinking for different reasons now—not just to have fun but to blot our reality" are simply unsubstantiated by the information provided in the article. Although concerns voiced by reporters Stanton and Mayher warrant attention, they do not indicate an increase of reckless drinking, but instead indicate a trend where alcohol related problems are becoming more apparent; in other words, there may be an increase in the awareness of alcohol abuse. "Reckless drinking on the rise" did, however, point out that a greater effort must be made to educate students about what constitutes alcohol abuse and what to do if it is indeed a problem. To this end the article raises an important issue, but it is unfortunate that the Record had to raise this issue by irresponsibly reporting that alcohol abuse is escalating at Williams.

Impact

To the editor:

Maybe the Center for Environmental Studies should do a study on the overall environmental impact and general wisdom of digging a 100-foot long trench through the grass, soil, and tree roots of Stetson Hall's side lawn for the purposes of a gravel walkway.

The members of Seeley House

Inconsistent

To the editor:

The Committee on Undergraduate Life's recommendation to limit the house transfer policy is based on questionable assumptions and contains several obvious inconsistencies.

First of all, is a sense of house community really necessary? Obviously it is needed at a large city school, but Williams is already such a small community. Need we further limit ourselves by separating into even smaller, stricter units? It is very enlightening that the vast majority of those who favor a change in policy either already live in a superior physical plant or have just been unlucky with the current housing system. This is because community isn't even the issue; why should it be when we have a unified community already?

Admittedly, I do not have much hope of affecting the final outcome of this matter, since it seems that Big Brother has already decided what is best for us. All right, what if interhouse transfers are severely limited? One inherent inconsistency immediately presents itself: How can you ask a freshman to spend his next three years in a house he has been shoved into by an essentially random, untrustworthy placement system? It's like asking him to pledge to a fraternity without knowing either the brothers or the building. You can't expect a student to be

I could complain until I was a deep shade of violet in the face, and such would be expected, accepted, and categorically overlooked by most. But virtues are never extolled; no one writes of the good that exists, for indeed, it might as well "lay interred with their bones."

I am certainly culpable for waiting so long to introduce it, but I was hoping that it would make itself evident: live while you can, do what you can while you have the chance to do it. Too many people consistently and continually delay immediate gratification for the sake of some illusory, though hotly pursued long term goal. Take those little (and big) chances while you can, do now what you may never have the opportunity to do again. Approach each day, each opportunity, as

Williams Record
Williams College
Williamstown, Massachusetts

Dear Editor:

I am a convict in Ohio's prison system and presently "doing time" at the Chillicothe Correctional Institution in Chillicothe, Ohio.

I am a Black male who got caught up in the fast, sometimes exciting, sometimes violent "Life of the Streets." Over the years, things had gotten to the point where I was only interested in doing: what I wanted to do, when I wanted to do it, and at whomever's expense it happened to occur. My thought centered around the pleasures of the present—not being that concerned with whether or not I infringed upon the rights of others nor did I consider the long term consequences of my actions!

"Over the past few years,
my family and friends seem to have taken the stand: 'Out of sight, out of mind.'"

Locking a man up, putting him in an overcrowded, violent and dehumanizing environment with little or no treatment/rehabilitation and then expect him to come out with a healthy outlook towards society just isn't realistic. The only changes that occur in a man are those he initiates himself and follows through on. Ohio's prisons are not geared toward reforming the prisoner—rather, they act as a warehouse to confine him for as long as possible and upon release, they "hope" that he has learned his lesson!

One of the problems that the offender faces is that the public wants him off the streets and the courts usually reflect the basic attitudes of the public caught up in their own little world that they just can't find the time to write or visit.

If possible, I would like for you to print this letter in your paper and if there is anyone that would like to correspond with me (offering advice, friendship, or just a few words of encouragement), I would appreciate it very much.

Sincerely,

though it may be your last. But don't think of this as morbid, for it is at most realistic. We have always been exhorted to make the best of things, and we should certainly continue. But let's start right here and now. Life is nice. We may have frighteningly little control over how long it will be, but we can and must do our best to make it worthwhile, both for ourselves and for everyone else. For, hasn't our education always stressed quality over quantity?

The last time you were in a bad mood, what was it that brought you out of it? Getting drunk and passing out in your hallway? Locking yourself in your room in the soothing company of PASCAL or FORTRAN? Breaking bottles in the stairways? Or rather was it somebody, either a casual conversation that snapped you out of the doldrums, or a long talk which, as it were, brought you to your senses? People are wonderful. There are people around here who make life so much more bearable, so much more livable, so much more fun, just by being around. They don't do anything in particular, but they talk, and listen, and are generally just there. Yet people never make it to the list of resources. That is reserved for libraries, museums, "facilities," and the like. Unfortunately, wherever we go, be it small college campus or large city, there is abhorrently little emphasis on interaction, cooperation, socialization, or just plain hanging out.

". . . people never make it to the list of resources.

That is reserved for libraries . . . and the like."

Such are considered indulgent luxuries. Picking up a book is great, but it does no good for anyone but yourself. It is selfish, but it is the way we are told to go.

What does it all come to? My naive opinion. I see too many people walking around here, heads bowed straight to the ground, grunting reluctant greetings to anyone they might pass, and generally trying to ignore the presence of other human beings. This annoys me. Worse yet, it isn't nice. Want a cliché? For better or worse, we are all in this together. Let's make it for better. Smile today, talk to somebody today. Those around you now need you more than you will ever need yourself. Take a little time out from what you are doing, stand back, and see if this is not so.

"All YOU touch and all YOU see is all your life will ever be."

Radical poet fights for change

by Cindy Stone

Audrey Lorde's poetry reading was not light or witty or nice or pretty. It was basically serious, its message political, its content gruesome. But it was also inspiring, for she writes not simply to dwell on problems but also to change them.

". . . they are disturbing and unnerving for those of us who are male, or white, or who like to gloss over the differences and relate to others on a purely abstract, individual level."

Audrey Lorde, as a Black lesbian feminist poet, is not exactly what one would call entertaining. The title of one of her essays is, precisely, "Poetry is not a luxury." Rather, she sees poetry as "the skeleton architecture of our lives." Poetry, by making our feelings accessible to language and thought and thereby communicable to others, is a necessary prelude to action.

Audrey Lorde's writings are a political critique. In them she is radically aware both of her allegiances and of her separateness. They are an attack on those who have traditionally oppressed her as a woman, as a Black woman, as a lesbian. As such, I think they are disturbing and unnerving for those of us who are male, or white, or who like to gloss over the differences and relate to others on a purely abstract, individual level. But the purpose of her critique is not simply to attack, but also, I think, to foster communication, to highlight and stay true to differences in order to make it possible to bridge them.

Although Audrey Lorde's hope seems to be to transcend differences, she does not thereby seek to ignore or obscure them. On the contrary, she uses her writing and her poetry as a means of attack, not only on white male-dominated patriarchy but also on those who pretend to speak for her without fully recognizing how she is different.

In "An Open Letter to Mary Daly," radical feminist and author of Gyn/Ecology, Audrey Lorde accused her of drawing only on the heritage of Western European women in her attempt to build a creative source of mythic power for all women, of "Dealing with non-European women . . . only as victims and preys-upon each other." She continued, "This dismissal stands as a real block to communication between us . . . Assimilation within a solely Western-European history is not acceptable."

I do not think that Audrey Lorde's poetry speaks exclusively to women, or Black women, or lesbians, but it is written especially for them in some ways. Significantly, the last poem she read "Need: A Choral of Black Women's Voices"—focused specifically on Black women. It is an especially violent poem, describing in gory detail actual murders of Black women, going on to accuse the entire city and its inhabitants of needing their blood.

". . . it is through poetry that we can tap that deepest darkest source of power . . ."

According to Audrey Lorde, it is through poetry that we can tap that deepest darkest source of power within ourselves: "Beautiful and tough as chestnuts/stanchions against our nightmare or weakness." There were moments during the poetry reading in which her voice took on a deep, vibrating, signing quality, as if at these moments the poem quivered as it touched that dark chestnut core within herself, that core which holds her own Black ancient history and tradition.

Faculty probes alcohol issue

by Lucy Lytle

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor noted at last Wednesday's faculty meeting that alcohol use at Williams "is less severe than at comparable colleges." The meeting also touched on the annual budget and the need for more space for the computer center.

In discussing the College's new alcohol awareness program, O'Connor stressed that it is "not a response to a new overwhelming crisis" but that the College wants "to find responsible and appropriate ways to use alcohol."

College Treasurer William Reed relayed the findings of the "space study" aimed at uncovering ways of "using existing building space more intensely." The study recognized the need for additional space for the computer center, more seminar rooms, and more lab space for organic chemistry and psychology courses.

The study recommended that the computer center be centrally located in Jesup Hall and that the offices there move to the Weston Language Center. The language laboratory will move from Weston to Stetson and utilize the space currently occupied by the art department. Weston will lose three classrooms in the process but the Bronfman Science Center is expected to handle the overflow.

Longer registration period

O'Connor recommended that the course registration period be extended from four to eight days to "encourage students to take preregistration seriously." Currently, less than half of Williams' students remain in their pre-registered courses, according to O'Connor.

O'Connor also announced that the ad-hoc student-faculty committee organized to monitor the Williams Bookstore situation "is satisfied that the textbook area of the store will be operated on a break-even basis" with owner Joseph Dewey hoping to "make a profit on the trade area of his operation."

Reed also noted that endowments are down 5.9% from last year although Williams still has the thirteenth largest endowment per student in the country.

that tax cuts spur investment. In addition to tax cuts, Shamie called for a balanced budget to bring the economy out of recession. If elected Shamie promised to vote for the Constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. "If we balance the budget, inflation stops," he said, explaining that recovery could be brought about by facilitating growth in the private sector.

Kennedy a hypocrite

Shamie called present Senator Edward Kennedy a "hypocrite" for promising the working people of Massachusetts tax cuts, less government regulation, and more jobs and then deserting them in Congress. Shamie's campaign literature stated "Ted Kennedy is faking it in Massachusetts," a pun on the popular state slogan, and much of his speech was marked by bitter anti-Kennedy rhetoric.

In terms of foreign affairs, Shamie backed President Reagan's policies. He stated that "totalitarian countries start all wars," and offered as a foreign policy the use of "the economic weapon" against these states. By only trading in cash and consumer products, Shamie believes the U.S. can severely weaken totalitarian countries. He was particularly critical of the effort by Western European nations to help build the Soviet gas pipeline. He said that such a pipeline would "relieve cash flow problems" in the Soviet Union.

"Israel must be supported at all costs," Shamie stated, because it is America's only real ally in the Middle East. In addition, he believes that Israel is the most stable Mid-East nation, and that peace there is contingent on Israeli-PLO talks.

excited about living in a particular Row House if he is forced to apply to all Row Houses as a unit. If he is not guaranteed to end up where he applies, he at least has the right to know specifically where he's applying (or the right to move later).

Finally, any way one looks at it, limiting the amount of house transfers is simply taking away a liberty. People can best guarantee their own happiness by acting in their own interests, and will do so if allowed. The C.U.L. does not have the right to eliminate that freedom. We are not children, incapable of making the proper decisions for ourselves, and we should not be treated as such.

The C.U.L. does have one point that I can not argue: there is a definite imbalance of classes among the houses, since upperclassmen are more likely to get into the better buildings. However, given a system in which some buildings are clearly physically superior to others, there must be a fair, non-random method of deciding who is able to live where. Class imbalance is a small price to pay for such a process.

In closing, if the C.U.L. is so confident that a limited transfer policy is what is best for us, then they should welcome a student vote on the matter. I will not argue the results.

Sincerely

The past lives on: Williamsiana

by Vernon Squires

If your father or your professor went to Williams, you may be able to read his senior honors thesis there. If they didn't go, then look for the pair of silk stockings from 1799 or the baseball from 1900.

If stuff like this intrigues you, or you simply have an interest in the history of Berkshire County and Williams College, then the Williamsiana collection may provide a bonanza of knowledge. Located in Stetson Hall, these official college archives are a veritable gold mine of fact, legend, and trivia.

Alumni artifacts

The collection is divided into several classifications, ranging from administration to student life to alumni. This last category is a substantial one, with books, letters, and artifacts recalling such names as Ebenezer Fitch, James Garfield, Washington Gladden, and Mark Hopkins. In addition to these prestigious graduates, other less illustrious alumni are recognized in associations, biographies, and various writings. Faculty, too, have their place on the shelves and in the vaults of the archives, attesting to the comprehensiveness of the collection.

Besides the pictures in the literary works, there are photos in several display cases in the library that houses Williamsiana. The evolutions of Main Street and College architecture are depicted in these cases, which also contain notecards of anecdotes concerning Williams. On the lighter side are photos reflecting the College's pastoral setting; imagine a cow grazing on the lawn in front of Griffin Hall!

Supplementing the multi-shelved library are two vaults, one containing manuscripts and the other objects. Among the more unusual pieces in the vaults are the original Indian deed to Ephraim Williams, Jr., nails from the original West College building, old final exams, course catalogs from 1795-1820, the baseball from the Dartmouth-Williams game in 1900, a Civil War map sent from James Garfield to Mark Hopkins, and a certain pair of silk stockings from one T.H. Wood.

Resourceful librarian

The Williamsiana collection is more than a bundle of trivia, however. In the past, a history course has been taught using the archives. The collection is also patronized by students for other reasons, according to Karen Drickamer, the archive librarian.

"I have several students a day come in. Some are here for thesis work, others are interested in history, and a few are simply curious," she explained.

Because the library is non-lending, students must do all research on the premises.

"My goal is to be able to immediately know the best resources for students' questions," she acknowledged.

Such a goal is no small matter because of the size of the collection. Williamsiana is more than the history of Williams College; it is a history of the liberal arts education in New England, and the history of the rural life in New England. Whatever the query involving the College, the county, or the country, Williamsiana can probably provide the answer. You might even say it is a "trivial" matter.

Moments from the past:

Dixieland band: Stompers jazz up Chapin

Back in the 1950's, dixieland jazz swept East Coast colleges into a swirling orgy of Charlestons and saxophone solos. Williams' contribution to dixieland, the Spring Street Stompers, rose to the top of the college band scene. Now, 30 years after their undergraduate career ended, the Stompers are back together, and plan to blow Chapin Hall down this Saturday night at 9:30.

The Stompers came together in 1952 and played through 1956, according to Associate Director of Admissions Russell Carpenter '54.

"I can't think of a parallel to describe the Stompers," Carpenter commented. "Their concerts would fill Chapin. People just couldn't stay still."

Won Arthur Godfrey

The Stompers were in demand at parties and clubs all over the east coast. They won the Arthur Godfrey Talent Scout Show in 1955 with an enthusiastic rendition of "That's A Plenty," one of few songs from their original repertoire that they still play today.

The Stompers parted ways in 1956, but reunited in 1964 at an alumni reunion. Fifteen years passed before they met again at a twenty-fifth reunion in 1981. Seeing no reason why they shouldn't, the Stompers decided to meet once a year thereafter. They recorded a public concert at Faneuil Hall in winter 1982 and chose the Parents' Weekend date so they could appear before current Williams students.

Better than ever

Informal leader Bob Ritter '57 says the band is better now than they were in the '50s. Banjoist Bill Fischer '56 explained, "The tightly phrased precision of our younger days has given way to a swingier continuity, a mellower movement. What seems to be intuitively preserved though, is that pleasingly perverse effect... of hearing a somewhat prurient tone quality issuing from a group of relatively clean-cut looking musicians."

The Stompers are clean-cut for a reason. Only pianist Don Coates '57 continued as a professional musician after college. Ritter, the cornetist, went into insurance. Drummer Ken Redmond '54 is a Boston architect, while Fischer is an English professor at the Buffalo campus of the State University of New York. Bassist Tom Yankus teaches and coaches at Choate, and in his earlier years played baseball in the Yankee farm system.

Walt Lehman is the only regular non-Williams member. He taught at Pine Cobble School and cornered the clarinet performance in Berkshire County.

One Stomper, Texan trombonist Jim Hayne '56, was unable to make it to Williamstown, so Phil Wilson of Boston will stand in. Wilson first played with the Stompers in 1956 at the age of 14.

Jazz preservation

All proceeds from the evening will go into the Spring Street Stomper Endowment for the Preservation of Jazz at Williams. Carpenter noted, "I don't know how the money will be spent. They don't have much yet." Saturday's concert is free with a Williams I.D., and $2 without one.

A group from the Williams Jazz Ensemble will play during intermission and stay on stage to do a few numbers with the Stompers. "It'll be fascinating to see what happens," Carpenter predicted. "There's a common denominator in that kind of music."

The art of elegant babble

Autumn in Williamstown provides many good excuses not to study, so it's only natural that people find themselves behind in their coursework at this time of year. Not having prepared for class does not mean you have to sit comatose in the back row praying that the instructor won't call on you. On the contrary, you can turn your ignorance to your advantage by following these simple suggestions:

1. String large words together in such a way that no one understands what you're saying.

Examples: I think we can all see the general implications of this crucial turning point in the development of (look at your syllabus and see who you were supposed to read)'s world outlook, which naturally underlies his (or her) specific views regarding this.

I would rather understand the overall process of the reasoning behind this conclusion than raise quarrels with the more obtuse aspects of it, which should not be separated from the aggregate if we are to fully appreciate the author's point of view.

2. Pass the ball to someone else.

I wasn't quite clear on (name of someone who said something)'s interpretation. Could you amplify it for me?

3. Pass the ball back to the instructor.

I think an historical perspective would help me reconcile my difficulties with this issue, Dr. (name of instructor, also found on syllabus).

In Other Ivory Towers

Wellesley College

Tea parties have some Wellesley students up in arms. The membership policies of Tau Zeta Epsilon and Zeta Alpha are more like those of sororities than the literary societies they claim to be, accused a group protesting the teas at which members for the two societies are selected.

The demonstrators complained that the societies sponsor very few literary activities and don't open their events to the public. Society representatives responded that all events were open and most are "publicized by invitation and word-of-mouth."

More disturbing is the perceived discrimination in membership policy. "I feel the discrimination is implicit. They tend to vote for the people who are most like them, i.e., fairly well off," argued Norine Leemans '83. "They perpetuate a stereotype of the well-groomed Wellesley debutante with her Harvard beau."

"That's completely wrong," countered Donna Farrell '83 of Zeta Alpha. "There is a lot of ethnic and geographic diversity. We actually have very few WASPS."

On what do the societies base membership? "Of course it helps if there's a grandmother or a mother from ZA," explained ZA president Barbara Dallas, "but each club member is looking for something different."

Could you recommend some outside readings in this area?

What do other experts in the field say about this development?

4. Bluff.

I agree with (name of someone who did the reading). I don't think I can add anything to his/her fine explanation at the moment.

I don't think a question like that can be answered. I'd prefer to continue on to something more concrete.

5. Digress.

Do you think this has any relevance to modern conditions?

How does this relate to (name of another person you were supposed to read at some point)'s stance on the subject?

6. Admit you haven't done the reading. (To be used only when absolutely necessary).

I'm sorry, but I haven't done the reading for today. I've been in the infirmary with ennuil (beriberi, mono, typhoid fever, potato famine, warts, mumps, etc.).

I'm not prepared today because I found out last night that (my grandmother died, my grandmother's pet moose Leroy died, I won the Massachusetts State lottery).

7. Combine two or more of the above.

As (name of person in class) implied, we have to understand the essential dichotomy between the radical manifestation of this theory on one hand, and its parallel yet opposing reaction on the other. Don't you agree?

A few general hints:

Always talk like you know what you're saying. Speak slowly so people will get bored and pay no attention to what you say. Use lots of hand gestures (pretend you're an English major). Above all, get in the habit of saying nothing in as many words as possible early in the year. Most instructors and students will tolerate just about anything if it is said confidently and authoritatively, and indeed they'll come to expect it of you. So when you really have nothing to say, you can go ahead and say it, secure in the knowledge that no one is listening closely.

CUL counters Council resolution

Public relations problems arising from College Council Resolution R-1 occupied the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) two weeks ago. In response to the widespread campus perception that the CUL will institute a tighter transfer policy, Committee chairman Cris Roosenraad noted that neither the CUL report nor the Gifford Report mention "limited interhouse transfers."

The CUL report does call for the establishment of class balances within houses. "What we have yet to make is a decision (on how to achieve this)," asserted Roosenraad. "We've got a lot more work to do... We are not trying to move ahead without consultation or further input."

The Committee also concluded that their creation of a Housing Subcommittee under CUL jurisdiction was a "non-issue." Roosenraad pointed out that the Dean's Office had originally organized a Student Housing Committee, which the College Council entered into their constitution four years ago.

Housing Committee chairman John Carlson '83 reported that the Housing Committee thought the voting procedure change, which gives every committee member a vote, was the most important part of the realignment. The switch to CUL jurisdiction was of little consequence, Carlson held, "We have no authority either way"—under the Council or under the CUL. He characterized the Council's response to the change, as "On my God, we've got an issue. Let's do something with it."

The CUL invited faculty associates to the meeting to discuss establishing a house associate for each class and the role of a house associate in general. The associates unanimously agreed that more associates are not necessary. "There's a tough enough visibility problem," noted Steven Flx, Hopkins house faculty associate. "It will also institutionalize (class divisions within the house)." Art professor Ed Epping added, "We'll be back here a year from now saying, 'We have two duds and one active associate.'"

Panel says capitalism out

by David Kleit

"The American economy and world capitalistic economy are in crisis," agreed three economists on October 18, in a panel discussion called "The Political Economy of Economic Decline." The panel included Michael Plore of MIT, Frances Fox Piven of the City University of New York, and David Gordon of the New York School for Social Research.

Plore opened with a general review of the points of agreement among the panelists. He said the group views political and economic institutions as structures which eventually outgrow themselves, causing a crisis out of which a new structure is formed. The crisis period of transition is thus viewed as producing a new long term structure.

Piven concentrated her remarks on the current crisis and what groups will enter the conflict over the composition of a new structure. She advanced the view that the current corporate and conservative Republican program is based on the idea of solving the problem of declining profits by lowering the living standards of workers.

In Piven's view, while the corporate plan has been the first on the scene, other groups will soon join the conflict. She cited a new, clearer link between issues as a cause of unity among opposition groups. She noted the Reagan administration policy of social spending cuts combined with increased military spending is a particularly unifying force for the political opposition.

$6.50 minimum wage

In his remarks, Gordon set out to promote an alternative to the mainstream viewpoint. He outlined a program including emphasis on needs—responsive development, the elimination of economic waste, and an improvement of the international situation through what he termed democratic trade agreements. In particular, he called for full employment and the entry of workers into the corporate decision-making process. Gordon repeatedly asserted that his program is based on traditional American and progressive democratic values.

In response to a question, Gordon stated that the minimum wage should be raised to "about $6.50." He advocated a permanent price control authority to control inflation, but noted that steps would have to be taken to limit the negative side effects usually associated with price controls.

Plore, in detailing some of his own views, put forth the concept that technological advances have caused production to outgrow national markets. Stating "We have reached a crisis," Plore added that while a new structure is being formed, its shape is still unclear.

Boycott clarified-

be that there are only certain forums that black people can legitimately take," said Kenyatta. He rejected this view.

Kenyatta noted that Williams is not blemish-free on the question of minority hiring. "Here, like at the law school, there has not been institutional resolve for affirmative action in faculty hiring." He did, however, praise Williams for its admissions policy and said it was far ahead of Harvard Law School.

Intense education

On the law school front, Kenyatta said the boycott is still planned (the three-week course is supposed to begin in January). It is likely that a group of students will file a complaint against the law school charging race and sex discrimination. The students are in the process of developing an alternative, semester-long course.

A poll of law school students found that 71 percent disagreed with the boycott, but 91 percent support the notion that the school should be taking extraordinary steps to hire blacks. "This is classic," snapped Kenyatta. "We agree with your goals, we disagree with your tactics."

"One of the things that this business at the law school has done," Kenyatta concluded, "is that it's put the students involved through a more intense education than anything the school could have done. What I hope for is that this tempest in a tea pot will help to train the people in law school and lead to lives of political activism."

Other Ivory Towers—

Protesters also assert that dues of $85 per semester for Zeta Alpha and $65 for new TZE members are prohibitively high for most people. "The one thing they cannot argue is that they dress as high society, act like high society, and are in fact members of a higher social class," charged one protester. "Their dues and image keep it that way."

Wellesley also has a toxic chemical dump on campus, reported the News. The spot is the site of an old paint factory on the shores of Lake Waban. In the past years, area residents have noted that one-third of an acre is marked by patches of vivid blue, green, and yellow soil and that no plants grow there. Outside studies indicate high levels of lead and chromium in the area. The college claims that there has been no evidence of a problem in fifty years.

University of Michigan

Arson is becoming the most popular crime on college campuses, according to the Campus Press Service.

A suspect in a University of Michigan case told officials he set a fire because he was "mad at the economy, mad at the university and mad at (university president Harold) Shapiro." The fire destroyed a $3 million dollar economics building last Christmas eve.

Arson expert Dr. Herman Weisman suggested other motives. "Two students living together in a dorm might get mad at one another, and one sets fire to the other's closet. Or as student flunking out might set fire to the department or instructor's office he feels is responsible."

Pranks are another major cause of fires. At Michigan State, a student started a $50,000 blaze by shoving a few firecrackers under a friend's door.

Most of the nation's 430 major campus fires go unsolved, Weisman added. Overall, in 1980, campus arson damage totaled $2.5 billion.

Castleton State

Vermont prison inmates have more living area in their cells than Castleton State College students have in their rooms, the Spartan reported.

Many students at the Vermont college housed in triples complain they have no room for desks. When informed of student's complaints, Dean of Students Joe Mark responded, "The quality of life is not a function of square footage."

Netwomen victorious

The women's tennis team completed their season this weekend with a successful showing at the Division III New England Championships held at Amherst Saturday and Sunday.

Renee George '83 sailed through her first three matches to qualify for the semi-finals, where she lost in a tie-breaker 7-6, 6-3 to Tufts' Mary Johnson.

Liz Peay '86 was eliminated from the play in the second round when she faced number one seed Claire Slaughter of Trinity, who went on to clinch the championship title.

In doubles action, Margo Stone '83 and Susan Brown '86 advanced the farthest for Williams. In their first match they forced the number two seed team from Trinity out of the running. They then trounced a Middlebury team to qualify for the quarter-finals where they lost to Wellesley.

Coach Curt Tong commented that he was quite pleased with Williams' overall performance and that he saw a lot of improvement over last year. The team finished at 6-4.

Rugby remains undefeated

by Anne Melvin

The women's rugby team defeated Tufts on Saturday to raise their record to 3-0.

The confident Jumbos were no match for Williams' strong scrum. Although Tufts fielded an excellent line, the Eph line and scrum concentrated on preventing the breakaway runs that had allowed Tufts to beat Williams two weeks ago at Dartmouth.

Williams dominated the first half of the game playing frustratingly close to the Tufts try line, although never quite getting the ball in. Close to half-time, a tired but determined scrum took advantage of a penalty kick. Scrum half Louise Hurd '85 rushed the Jumbos with Williams supporting her close behind. The Ephwomen pushed her over the try line for the first and only points of the game.

The Ephwomen nearly scored a second time when the scrum pushed Captain Jane Parker '83 into the try zone, but the try was not awarded due to technicalities.

After the game, the disheartened and defeated Tufts abandoned the women ruggers who were expecting the traditional post-game festivities. Apparently the lures of the homecoming football game, and Ruth, the live pachyderm in the stadium, were too strong to resist.

Next Saturday the Ephwomen challenge Mt. Holyoke at 11:00 a.m. on Cole Field. Spectators are welcome to watch the game and participate in the post-game hospitality.

Field Hockey routs North Adams

by Andrew Garfield

In probably their last game of the season, the field hockey team trounced North Adams 3-0. The team will find out Monday if they will be entering any tournaments.

Co-captain Mary Pynchon '83 called it "one of our best games of the season. We controlled the game from the time we got there." Diane Lewis '85, in her first varsity game, opened the scoring in the first half.

Mace Foehl '85 and Allison Fuller '85 slipped into the net together a centering pass from Pynchon for the second goal. Pynchon closed out the scoring in the second half. She cited "good passing and stickwork" as the reasons behind the decisive victory.

The team's final record stands at 4-3-4. Many of the ties could have been victories.

Pynchon said that the improvement of the team was evident over the course of the season. She said Coach Chris Larson Mason was responsible for this. "At the beginning of the year our stickwork was really bad. Now it is close to the best in Division III. Chris has really helped us."

Women run well

Women's cross-country coach Bud Fisher was very pleased with the team's fourth-place finish at the Fitchburg Invitational on Saturday, as the Ephwomen finished ahead of all other Division III teams at the meet.

Sue Flynn '85 was the top Williams runner, finishing seventh with a time of 19:03. Mary Keller '86 was 17th with 19:51, Chynere Uwah '85 was 27th at 20:17, Teresa Casey '86 was 33rd at 20:34, and Katherine Boozer '85 finished 44th with a time of 21:23.

Flynn was also the top Eph runner at the NESCAC Individuals finishing ninth with a time of 19:01.

The Ephwomen's big Little Three meet against both Amherst and Wesleyan will be this Saturday at Amherst.

Harriers place second

by Mark Averitt

The cross-country team finished second in Saturday's match against M.I.T., Tufts, and UMass-Boston.

Williams was led by John Nelson, finishing third with a time of 25:56, Dan Riley, fourth at 26:06, and Brian Angle, eighth at 26:41.

Other Eph finishers were co-captain Lyman Casey '83 and Bennett Yort '84, who came tied for eleventh at 27:01.

The runners take on the Little Three at Amherst on Saturday.

Eph gridders upset Jumbo homecoming, 13-11

by Robert A. Tercek

With three seconds left on the clock, Tufts' Mark Harasimowicz's 35-yard field goal attempt was wide left, and the football team was able to hold onto a 13-11 upset victory over the Jumbos.

The ecstatic Ephmen led the whole game, holding Tufts scoreless until the second half. "There's an intangible in the game that you can't measure," said Head Coach Bob Odell of the unexpected win, "that's the enthusiasm of the upset, the thrill of the win."

Williams' first score came on a 95-yard drive, using the combined attack of sophomore fullback Ted Thomas' rushing and junior quarterback B. J. Connolly's passing.

Throw on first down

"When we make up our mind to throw the ball, we'll throw it on first down," said Odell of the potent attack. "We threw on first down eight times in the first half."

The Eph's second touchdown came on a Connolly sweep with 1:36 left in the third quarter. But a failed extra-point attempt haunted the Ephmen in the final quarter.

"Our ability to move the ball shocked them somewhat," said Odell, noting Tufts' traditionally stubborn defense. "Just shifting in our backfield caused their defense to move, and our strong slot formation put them off balance."

Missed field goals

The game wasn't over for the Jumbos, however. With 1:30 left, quarterback David Piermarini hit halfback Lenny Barber in the endzone. A two-point conversion pass made it 13-11, and the Jumbos rallied before their giant homecoming crowd of 10,500. But their field goal attempt failed. It was the third such failure in the game for Tufts.

The Williams defensive secondary, which was tested by 44 Tufts passes, gave up 26 completions. Defenders Tim Curran '83 and Steve Monroe '83 each intercepted a pass and fleet-footed Tomas Alejandro '83 twice prevented breakaway touchdown runs by running down Tufts receiver Bob Galvin from behind. "The defensive secondary did a good job under a lot of pressure," said Odell.

The defensive line often flushed Piermarini from the pocket. Defensive end Gary Pfaff '83 and tackles John Kowalik '83, Gary Stocz '83, and Reggie Hollinger '85 were in the thick of the pass rush, each involved in two backfield tackles.

Thomas leading rusher

Ted Thomas led the rushing with 100 yards on 22 carries. "Ted is very steady," Odell observed. "Again, he was the main man in the running attack and picked up critical yardage when we needed it." Halfbacks Congdon and Crotty gained 56 and 44 yards, and Connolly rushed for 23 yards to give the Ephmen a total of 223 yards on the ground.

Connolly and his aerial circus were the key to a huge momentum change for the Ephmen. Connolly connected on 13 of his 24 throws, gaining 34 yards in the air. His primary receiver is Marc Hummon '84, whose six catches resulted in 76 yards.

Lady booters lose in OT

The women's soccer team, involved in some close low-scoring games, lost 1-0 to Tufts on Saturday and 2-1 to Keene State on Tuesday.

The team played well on Saturday, and held Tufts scoreless in both halves. Tufts scored in overtime, and the Ephwomen were not able to even it up, resulting in the disappointing 1-0 defeat.

Keene State is a very strong team, and with a home-field advantage they proved to be too much for the Ephwomen. Senior Becky Baugh scored early in the first half for Williams, but they were unable to hold on and Keene State scored two in a row for the victory.

Enthusiastic team

Coach Ed Grees said that Williams was hurt by a small travelling team and therefore did not have the depth to facilitate many substitutions. He praised the team for strong defensive play and undaunted enthusiasm, both in the Keene State game and throughout the season.

Perhaps more important than the losses was the Ephwomen's 1-0 victory over Amherst last Saturday.

Williams lost to Smith last Tuesday—again a 1-0 loss despite an excellent team performance.

Last game today

The team's record is now 4-6-1. Coach Grees hoped to end the season on a happy note and somewhat even up that record as the Ephwomen played today at Westfield State.

Junior Jean Loew beats a Tufts defender to the ball on Saturday. The team, however, lost in overtime, 1-0.

Volleyball takes third in tourney

by Denise Ross

While Williams didn't place first or second in the Northeast Invitational Volleyball Tournament this past weekend at Williams, they did manage to come up with an overall record of 4-2, good for third place.

Spikers take two

Williams started out on Saturday with two easy wins against

W.P.I. 15-10 and 15-9 in their first match against Wellesley proved to be more difficult as Williams fell 15-8 and 15-9. Williams came back in their final match of the day against Bryn Mawr to easily take the first two games 15-8 and 15-9.

Defeat Union

Sunday proved to be a bit more competitive for Williams as they faced Union in their first match. The Ephs took the first game 15-8, but lost the next game 15-4. But they bounced back to take the final game and the match 15-6.

Battle for second

The women displayed their true colors in the next match against U.V.M.; a match that would decide the second place standing in the tournament. While Williams lost both games to U.V.M. 15-11 and 15-11, the scores didn't display just how well Williams played against an equally as intense and competitive team.

Gilmore and Pepe displayed the reasons why they were chosen to the All-Star Team as each supplied the team with excellent spikes and played superbly on the net.

Division III women's swimming coach of the year Carl Samuelson.

Coach of the Year

Swimming coach Carl Samuelson, has been named Division III Coach of the Year by the National Collegiate Women's Swimming Coaches Association.

The award caps a year for Samuelson in which his women's swim team won the NCAA Division III national championship and his men's team was runnerup to national Division III champion Kenyon. "I just absolutely could not be happier," says Samuelson. "It's a wonderful honor for me personally and it's one I share with every one of our swimmers."

The 1982-83 season was the first in which the NCAA sponsored national championships for women. The competition, was dominated by Williams women who won 14 of the 24 events. Their total of 402 points gave a comfortable margin over runnerup Kenyon with 303. In late February, the women also won their third straight New England championship.

Soccer takes two

by Dave Woodworth

Freshman Jeff McEvoy scored one goal and assisted on the other as the men's varsity soccer squad defeated Tufts by a 2-0 score on Saturday.

Good defense on the part of the Jumbos and a sluggish Eph offense kept the match scoreless at the half. However, at 59:50, Marty White '83 broke the ice when he took a cross from McEvoy on the left side of the goal and knocked it past diving Jumbo goalkeeper Alex Glickman.

With the score 1-0 in their favor, the Williams midfielders began to assert themselves and took complete control of the match. The continual pressure resulted in the second goal, as McEvoy eased home a centering pass by John Campbell '84. The play was made by a fine individual effort on Campbell's part, as he ran down a ball that the Tufts defenders apparently thought was going over the end line.

The Jumbos made several strong bids to tighten the match in the closing minutes, but Kenny Rhodes '85 turned in an impressive performance in goal as he recorded his first shutout of the season. Rhodes notched 15 saves on the way to the win, while Glickman made 9 in a losing effort. The Ephs outshot the Jumbos by a 21-19 margin.

New alignment

The victory was the third in the last four games for Williams. The strong play of the Ephs during the past fortnight can be attributed in large part to their new set, which shows four backs, four midfielders, and two forwards, rather than the traditional 4-3-3 which had been used previously.

Another factor is the superior conditioning and depth of the Williams side: they have been a second-half team throughout the season. This was particularly evident on Saturday.

Two more wins

The other wins came over Bates and Clark. In the 4-0 defeat of Bates last Tuesday, Dave Nasser '83 scored two goals while Doug McKenney '85 and Eric Stein '84 added one each. Goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 was tested only six times in racking up his third shutout of the year.

The victory over Clark on October 11 was a thriller, as the Ephs rallied from a 1-0 deficit at the half to win 2-1. Rob Kusei '83 got one tally while Jeff Sutton '83 got the game winner with three minutes left. The loss came at the feet of Bowdoin, 2-0, on October 16.

The wins raised Williams' seasonal record to 6-2-1 as they go into a tough match against ranked Babson today at home.

Unemployment kills, says prof

by Jim Peak

The Williams College faculty has a new celebrity in economics professor Morton O. Shapiro, who has received national publicity for a recent study correlating high unemployment rates with a rise in male suicides. His research shows that "a one percentage point increase in the annual unemployment rate leads to 320 additional suicides for men per year."

In the past two weeks, Shapiro's findings have been featured in dozens of newspapers around the country (including the front page of the Wall Street Journal) and on the evening news broadcasts of the three major television networks.

Although the press has tended to concentrate on the most sensational aspect of the study, namely the increase in suicides, Shapiro and co-author Dennis A. Ahlburg, an assistant professor and member of the Center for Industrial Relations at the University of Minnesota, discovered a variety of other negative social effects of high unemployment rates. These included "increases in homicides, admissions to mental institutions, alcoholism, and cardiovascular disease." Shapiro further noted that "while suicide is certainly the most extreme reaction to job loss, it is only one of many indicators of the unmeasured psychological devastation experienced by many who are either unemployed or face the threat of unemployment. Each additional suicide precipitated by job loss represents a fraction of the people who are adversely affected by unemployment."

Publicity snowballs

The authors also theorize that when men who grew up during the post-World War II economic boom lose their jobs, their trauma is increased because they had expected to continue their fathers' economic progress.

Shapiro first showed his findings to Sidney Weintraub, editor of the journal Post-Keynesian Economics, last spring when Weintraub was a visiting professor of economics at Williams. Weintraub felt that the results were important, and offered to print the study in his journal to make it available to a wider audience.

Williams' News Director Ray Boyer heard about the study and began publicizing it. The story was first picked up by the Berkshire Eagle, and was carried on UPI's national news wire a week later. The story "just began to snowball after UPI carried it," said Shapiro.

Shapiro is pleased, although surprised, at all the attention he has received. "I never expected this kind of reaction, but I feel very strongly that ignoring the social costs of unemployment is a big mistake, and I am glad that this report has received some publicity."

Shapiro will discuss his theory on Channel 10 News Wednesday night at 6:00.

'No clean hands'

PLO doctor lays blame

by Ned Ladd

Tempers flared as pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli factions squared off during and after Dr. Chris Giannou's lecture "What I saw in Lebanon" last Thursday night. The lecture served to heighten the emotion of the issue and the fervor of the audience, causing one political science professor to protest the anti-Semitic atmosphere he perceives at Williams.

Giannou, a Canadian surgeon, spoke of his experiences as doctor in residence at Nabatiya Hospital in southern Lebanon. Anticipating the emotional reaction of his audience, he prefaced his talk by saying that "nobody's hands are clean."

He began by outlining the events leading up to Israel's June 6 invasion of southern Lebanon. He emphasized that Lebanon before the invasion was really a group of "states within a state," and that the PLO was fully one of these states.

Giannou said that to the Lebanese, "the Palestinian cause was a sacred one, and Israel was the enemy." The PLO possessed not only an army, but a government with a parliament and ministries of health, welfare, and education, according to Giannou. "Technically, I am a member of the PLO because I worked in Red Crescent (the PLO equivalent of the Red Cross) hospitals in Nabatiya and Sidon," he said.

However, Giannou said that when Israeli tanks moved into southern Lebanon, the Lebanese greeted their "liberators" in the streets. He explained this apparent contradiction by equating the Lebanese with the French in 1940. He said that greeting an occupying army is a common survival instinct and that "once you have survived a terrible war, you must continue to survive." He offered evidence to prove his contention that the Lebanese were pro-Palestinian by saying that he watched Lebanese villagers in Nabatiya celebrate when an Israeli jet was shot down.

Refugee camp destroyed

Giannou then spoke of his personal experience with the Lebanese and Israelis. While in Nabatiya, the government hospital in which he worked was bombed "five or six times." He spoke of the destruction of a nearby refugee camp by "cluster bombs and phosphorus bombs" which left "blackened craters, tons of masonry, twisted iron bars, and cadavers." According to Giannou, "The true number of casualties will never be known" since bodies are deeply buried under rubble.

The Israelis claimed to have dropped leaflets telling civilians to flee, and to have used loudspeakers warning civilians of the danger, but Giannou said, "Bombs fell with the leaflets, and we never heard the

Botswana honors Lewis

Stephen R. Lewis Jr., Professor of Economics at Williams and an adviser to top governmental officials in the southern African nation of Botswana, has been named a recipient of that nation's Presidential Order of Meritorious Service.

Lewis is the first American, and only the fifth non-citizen to be given the honor since Botswana became independent from Great Britain in 1966. A spokesman for Quett Masire, President of Botswana, says the award was given to Lewis for "outstanding contributions to the development of Botswana."

A specialist in the economic problems facing developing nations, Lewis has spent three of the last five years in Botswana serving as economic consultant in the Ministry of Finance and Development Planning. He was also a member of the Presidential Commission on Economic Opportunity in Botswana. The Commission, which completed its work last May, explored ways the mining-based development of Botswana can produce growth in opportunities for its citizens.

The announcement that Lewis was to be honored came during Botswana's Independence Day ceremonies on September 30. The award will be presented during the same ceremonies next September 30.

Botswana has attracted international attention for its political stability in a turbulent region. The semi-arid, landlocked nation is surrounded by South Africa, Zimbabwe, Zambia and Angola. The government, a democracy, is led by President Masire, who was awarded an honorary degree by Williams in 1980 when he was

Special Thursdays

Sunday we were pleasantly surprised by candles and orange tablecloths—Halloween Night. The Tuesday before we were surprised with candles and blue and white tablecloths—German Night. While we enjoy surprises, we also recognize the significant unused potential of Food Services' Theme Nights. Now they are a mere diversion. With planning they could become a revitalized form of guest meals.

Guest Meals were a wonderful excuse to dress up, spend an evening with a date or faculty member, and eat an unhurried meal. They not only improved neglected student-faculty relations, but were a big boost to male-female relations on the campus.

The elements that made guest meals work: regularity and a special environment. Students knew that Thursday was unique. They would plan for it, asking faculty and friends to join them. Tablecloths, candles and waiters made it a genteel break from the everyday grind.

We propose a rejuvenation of guest meals based upon the Theme Dinners. Have them every Thursday so students can plan ahead. And compromise on the waiters; put food on the tables beforehand for sit-down family-style dinners. The same people who now serve on the line can set things up instead. Students can go back themselves for seconds, so we won't need waiters. But whole houses can sit to eat at the same time, guest-meal style.

By adapting Theme Dinners, it would take no special effort to make Thursdays very special.

Term ad bad . . .

To the editor:

Since it wasn't an April 1st edition, I was surprised and disgusted to read the term paper ad in your recent Williams Record. Last I knew, such a service was immoral, dishonest, and in violation of the honor system. If the extra edge to win in the '80's is cheating, the '90's promise to have some pathetic leaders. Even for the desperate pragmatist who wants to get ahead at any cost, don't you think an "A+/A/A—" paper would be recognized as fraudulent by a Williams professor who knew the student?

Concerned but mostly disgusted,

. . . no, worse

To the editor:

I had the opportunity last evening to catch up on some of my reading, including the Williams Record issue of October 5th. I found the issue generally informative, especially to hear about the departure of Barbara-Jan Wilson. Upon returning to the next page, Page 8, my eye was caught by an ad in the lower left-hand corner, which at first I took as a spoof.

In checking this morning, I was saddened to find that it was not a spoof, but indeed a "bonafide" paid for commercial advertisement. I have had an association with Williams College since the early 60's, which more recently culminated in the graduation of our daughter in the class of 1981. Over these years, I have felt there is one thing that the college exceeded in, if nothing else—the development and practice of a realistic and workable honor system.

It disturbs me, as a former parent and friend of the College to realize that there are apparently those in the college who would put monetary gain ahead of any honor code or respect for their fellow students. I cannot understand how anyone of your presumed accomplishments, intelligence or responsibility could in any way even consider running such an ad, let alone printing it.

I hope you understand while there are many times that I have not agreed with the Record's editorial position (and that can be said for many papers), I have nonetheless felt enlightened by having the opportunity to learn of other viewpoints. I certainly do not believe in censorship in any form, including even guidelines that would supposedly direct the policies of a college publication. I must say, however, your lack of responsibility in this matter makes me certainly wonder how this sort of happening can be prevented in the future.

Maybe for starters, you should both consider terminating your relationship to the RECORD, for the record!

P--ed?

To the editor:

This letter "is intended to provoke thought not moralize." Is there anyone at Williams who views one of the words in Jeffrey H. Bralnard's opening sentence in his article in the October 12 Record as "legitimate" writing? I hope he can "master" his own "potential" to express (Quotes from Mr. Bralnard's article.)

No monopoly

To the editor:

Professor McNally's strident letter to the editor advocating a severe punitive defunding of the Record implicitly raises crucial questions about the character of Williams. She is outraged, it seems, at the Record's publishing an advertisement offering the services of a paper-writing firm. Undoubtedly Professor McNally believes that if students avail themselves of such a "service," they would be actively undermining the very purpose of a liberal arts college.

That purpose, I would think, rests fundamentally upon teaching students to think critically about the world. If this is true, Professor McNally must believe that she and her colleagues are profound failures, because she obviously fears that Williams students are incapable of evaluating the dubious philosophy of the Trident Company. If it is so clearly true that by purchasing compositions students destroy their own educations, why does Professor McNally expect that any conscientious student would employ the terrible Trident Co. to subvert his own pursuit of knowledge? Is the worthy professor suggesting that Williams students do not genuinely desire to be educated?

In the Honor Code Williams calls itself "an institution fundamentally concerned with the free exchange of ideas."

In terms of this statement Professor McNally's fervent desire to shut down the school paper represents a curious sort of "concern."

The Trident ad promulgates a specific set of ideas about education at Williams. These ideas, though perhaps inaccurate, certainly deserve a "free exchange." The advertisement suggests that education is nothing intrinsically sacred; rather, it is an economic means to an economic end. In short, an investment. The Trident people apparently believe that no one would invest the huge sum of $40,000 unless he expected some financial return on his investment. A "good job with high salary," perhaps. It is telling that this Trident Co. feels it worth the monetary risk to purchase an ad offering Williams students to betray their educations in order to "get ahead in the '80's." Clearly, the Trident Co. has little faith in Williams' commitment to the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake.

Suppose, somehow, that Trident is correct in its wager. Williams only masquerades as a place where people value education for its intrinsic worth, goes the reasoning; Williams actually serves as an investment house dealing in "human capital." Hence certain professors' outrage would be quite understandable. When Williams students "get ahead in the '80's," Williams wants the credit. The Williams Company would strongly resist any competition for this credit from the likes of the Trident Company. So strongly, in fact, that some personnel of the Williams Investment Co., under the guise of industry standards or "academic integrity," would call for the cen-

Class of '70 responds to protest

The recent RECORD article commemorating the Cambodia Strike at Williams in May 1970 brought back recollections. Among other things it reminded me that in releasing my Seniors that year I asked each one of them to allow some time for reflection and then write me a letter describing as best they could their thoughts and emotions related to those events. All of them responded. From May through August their letters came. I hereby offer a few excerpts in an attempt to present as many diverse reactions as possible. There was more, of course, much more—but space limitations are draconian. So here are a few fragments of voices from the past . . .

Nicholas Fersen

(Eds. note: Nicholas Fersen is a Russian professor.)

As a draft counselor during my last three years at Williams, I have experienced extreme exasperation over the draft, its inequities, the involvement in S.E. Asia and the racial problems in the U.S. Most of those whom I counseled have discovered that it is difficult for individuals lacking power to contribute much towards constructive change . . . The Strike appears to be an encouraging development. At last the Nation is seeing a body of student opinion too wide and serious to be dismissed as coming just from a few radicals . . . Most analyses of the present situation on college campuses have overlooked the part played by the elimination of occupational deferments. Suddenly, many students who planned careers in teaching, Government, the Foreign Service, the Peace Corps, etc., had the rug pulled out from under them. They were left with the specter of the Vietnam war staring them in the face . . . I would venture to say that a great number of the recent demonstrations at such traditionally conservative schools as the U. of Maryland, Kent State U., U. of Ohio, U. of Virginia, etc., were the result of events coming so close together. Many of my moderate friends were radicalized overnight—most of them had counted on occupational deferments for the next few years . . . Now they have taken control of the "movements" previously controlled by more radical and irrational students . . .

For Williams College to terminate its classes . . . seemed like an outrageous joke—at first . . .

Without a doubt the first Strike meeting in Chapin Hall was one of the emotional experiences of my four years at Williams. My rationality, as well as that of other students and faculty members, may have been slightly distorted, but in retrospect it seems not to have hurt the national Strike effort . . . I voted not as I was thinking, but as I was feeling—and I was excited . . . The strike issue was particularly exciting, as it promoted the establishment of a national student body, one which would by numbers alone force the very same politicians for whom it worked to respond to some of their most concerned constituents . . . We had our own group of super-bureaucrats here . . . All of a sudden there was a new criteria for campus status, or worth, or whatever. It was essential that everyone appear at all times to be as busy, as overwhelmed and overworked as possible . . . I had two roommates who worked on draft resistance . . . One spent two whole days trying to compose a hundred-word resistance letter on a yellow pad of paper—finally a "superior" composed the letter himself in fifteen minutes and thus ended the drama of literary creation. The other roommate spent those same two days writing RESIST THE DRAFT in red on 3,000 pieces of mimeographed information—his reason being that "It gave it some color." . . . I was sensitive to their emotional apprehensions primarily because they both enjoyed trying to make me feel more guilty than they might have (sic.) . . . In terms of an evaluation, I feel that the national Strike and subsequent events were valuable and educational from both a personal and a national perspective . . . My greatest fear is now of what might happen if the system does not respond more directly or legitimately to students who consent to work within that system in order to effect some significant change.

I felt, as I do now, that the real significance of a Strike here would be to create a new consciousness among Williams students that would carry beyond this Strike and beyond the issue of Cambodia, informing the future behavior of the College and the people in it. This consciousness existed from Sunday night until Wednesday night . . . at which time it died. And to me, the revolution and the real importance of the Strike died that night also . . . Williams is too safe . . . by Wednesday the old Williams returned. Orders were given to move out of the aisles and not to smoke—perfectly legitimate decisions, but decisions which showed that the students were now passive once again, waiting for, expecting and willing to be led. And led they were. Who better than Mr. Bevis—one of the youngest and most popular faculty members—to sugarcoat the faculty decision and to set the students up to acquiesce, to relinquish their power? And who can forget Mr. Waite's immortal "chicken-shit"? If there had been any doubts in the students' minds, they were relieved. For what Mr. Waite said was, "See? The faculty is right with you, we identify with your cause. We are ready to stop being academicians and take action." But action was no longer possible for students. The faculty was now running the show . . . The movement could have included faculty as well as students, but the real chance for change, the real significance of the Strike and why I felt it was worth fighting for, depended upon the students seizing and holding on to power. Because without it, the students lost responsibility and lost the existential element of the action . . . I realized how isolated my feelings and beliefs are in this country. I see the war go on and the country continue to slide deeper and deeper into insanity, perverting and inverting every human value in the name of some object and personal power game. I may leave this country only because I do not want to engage in violent revolution. And I am afraid that violent revolution will soon be forced on those who think like I do, who wear their hair long and who dare to question the insane life that America has created and calls the best in the world.

In an environment marked by incredible, increasing violence, by destruction and self-destruction, and by duplicity and hypocrisy on the part of social and government leaders, the Williams College community who in many respects, as potential soldiers or as repressed intellectuals, are the victims of these social forces has, by striking, finally said: "There is some shit I will not eat." This statement is the most significant occurrence during the Strike and probably the only occurrence that has any real effect on every striker's future. This statement reclaimed a certain amount of dignity for every individual involved even if it did not produce any power for the individual . . . So whether I am receiving gratitude from students at (other colleges) for assisting in the organization of a student Strike there or being asked: "Where do you want your body sent?" by a construction worker on Wall Street, I know I am really living . . . (This person also includes a copy of e.e. cummings' poem "I sing of Olaf glad and big" q.v.)

What did I learn in May? A frustration so immense, so overwhelming at times that it is hard to get up and go fight again. A generation, weighted, firm, unthinking—Middle America. The Government, its people, its places are too large and most difficult to move. And what do we do when we come back, where is our hope? Not in Mr. Nixon's hands. Our Country is deteriorating—the stockmarket, war, poverty, violence, and there seems to be no end. And where are our leaders? Maybe among us. Those who have the strength to continue, daily. Williamstown, I've learned, is a veritable sanctuary, not the real world. It's bitter out there, but I've learned that someone must act, must try, must continue to survive, or we will not continue as people, a nation or a world. If I must, I will hope for the sake of hope. Hopefully the faith I have in myself and those around me, especially at Williams, can find the strength and vitality to keep working on our worlds around us.

. . . the insane life that America has created and calls the best in the world.

The greatest change in my personality has been my belief on my military obligations . . . Before the Strike I felt that the National Guard was the most realistic means of fulfilling my military obligations. I thought the National Guard would allow me to avoid the conflicts of conscience that would result if I was forced to fight in Vietnam. The Strike, however, changed these beliefs, especially during the memorial service . . . for the Kent State students. I suddenly saw that the National Guard might put me in a position that would threaten my beliefs . . . I have now applied for a Conscientious Objector classification. The problem with this action is that I have a selective conscientious objection . . . Because I refuse to go outside the system, I will still join the National Guard if my C.O. application is refused . . .

A strike at Williams. This was a very curious idea . . . For Williams College to terminate its classes, to engage in political activities, seemed like an outrageous joke—at first . . . I had been here four years and I had usually felt quite alone in my political and social views . . . "What are you, an idealist, one of those damn liberals?" I had gone to a Quaker school and had been weaned on pacifism and a doctrine of social concern . . . I campaigned for McCarthy and peace candidates, I marched and I argued . . . Approaching graduation I noticed . . . It was now uncool to support the war; the draft loomed in the distance for us all. It was cool to smoke grass, considered by some to be a political act, and most of my freshmen acquaintances now had longish hair, a symbol which if only in your parents' minds serves as a sign of rebellion . . . The Wednesday night meeting brought on a complete change in my faith. The students proved themselves totally insecure to act without faculty consent, and most were willing to compromise to any degree to "keep this thing going." In doing so they also kept their bodies nestled comfortably in the seats of power which they had created . . . The corraling and adamant holding of power by certain people made others who were walking the streets jealous and resentful. Bustling around Seeley House with duties of national importance became the modus operandi for the pseudo-bureaucrats who squabbled among themselves for the privilege of leaning back in the soft chairs behind the desks . . . the faculty resolution was not adequate in my eyes, but it was so sugar-coated and polished by those who read and defended it that the students were seduced. They accepted it, applauding it wildly, even ferociously. I wanted to explain to my fellow-students that "you are men who can stand up without your fathers and you should." No, they would not listen . . . In clamorous, gestapo-like gestures they overran me . . . All my friends who had previously been in agreement seemed deathly silent, many of them had inter-ally disappeared under stress . . . All my activities were anti-climactic in light of Wednesday night's festivities. The campus had not been radicalized or even politicized . . . I joined my fellow students in the continuation of my [academic] work—I had a thesis to finish . . . I was wrong to think that things could be changed by leaving the classroom . . . It is hard for me to close my eyes and ears to the world, but it seems that if I am to find the few things in life that I want, then I must chisel my own world out of this morass and build my defenses against the evil outside.

[AND FINALLY]

. . . At this point I would like to announce that I have decided to stop typing this because: 1) I don't like to type because it always reminds me of filling out application forms . . . 2) Because I don't type very well. 3) Because this is almost a letter and I don't think letters should be typed. 4) I have stayed up all night to watch the sun come up with a girl whom I met while walking down the middle of Route 2 at two in the morning and whom I would like to talk to before she leaves for home in Pittsburgh . . .

Instead of closing down the newspaper, instead of censoring the Trident Co., perhaps we would do better by critically examining the cynical ideas the Trident Co. has about education at Williams. What if they are correct?

In light of the recent barrage of criticism of virtually every aspect of the Williams Record, I feel compelled to come to its defense and give credit where it is warranted:

Cocktail talk

To the editor:

I strongly take offense to Charlie Mitchell's contention that the college campus is a pseudo-intellectual environment, the inference clearly being that Williams is that college campus. The difference between an intellectual and a pseudo-intellectual is that one has mental concerns that are actively pursued and the other mentions academic topics only for their name value. It is gravity and emotion versus clever cocktail conversation. This is perhaps the most serious complaint that can be leveled at an academic institution. It is better to be considered less-adept than to be thought as frivolous. By implying that Williams exists only as grist for tea parties, Mr. Mitchell impugns the seriousness of intent of every student, professor, and administrator here.

It is painful to know that when this charge was made it was under this appellation. The phrase "pseudo-intellectual" has become a quite fashionable smear within the past few years. After all, it carries just the right tone before you ask for the sherry to be passed or after you mention Michelangelo.

Psychobabble

To the editor:

Having read the article, that is to say, imbibed, ingested, and ingurgitated the quintessential and universal assertions, jactations, implied in "The Art of Elegant Babble" we feel we can all see the general implications implicitly implied in this crucial (yet trivial), profound (yet trite) literary manifestation of the author's mental pabulum, that is to say, mental pabulum, as it were (which is not to say that we do not appreciate the essential dichotomy and yet unity of that which has been, and is, and always will be, as it were, both dichotomized, and unified, in its manifestations, notably, of unity, and dichotomy, neither one being more, nor less, nor equally what is, was, will be, etc.). Broader view

To the editor:

By coincidence I was reading the interview with Professor Joan Robinson in your October 5th OUTLOOK section when a news interview with Dr. George Stigler of the University of Chicago appeared on the television evening news. The interview was in connection with Dr. Stigler having been awarded the Nobel Prize for Economics.

My reaction, I'm distressed to report, is that I'm saddened to think that Williams students are being exposed to Mrs. Robinson rather than Dr. Stigler. Her brand of economics, divorced from reality, obviously created the need for the policies of Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Reagan which she bemoans. I hope you're getting a broader view of things than I think you are; but, if Mrs. Robinson is representative of faculty quality in the area of economics, I'm upset.

Truth

To the editor:

This past Tuesday night Tyler House held its first "Tyler Talk"—the inauguration of what we hope will be a year-long series of informal discussions involving students, faculty and the often elusive ideal of learning outside of the classroom. Professor Mort Shapiro, aided by the clear insights of Joan Robinson, enlightened us all on the trade-off between inflation and unemployment in economic planning, and the history of that choice in the United States. He went on to examine the Reagan administration's radical strategy in this regard, and make suggestions as to alternatives and less harmful programs.

Most gratifying however, was the response of the forty-odd students who attended; asking hard questions in response to Prof. Shapiro's challenging remarks, these students proved that they had the wits to initiate very relevant discussion—outside of the world of classrooms and assigned readings.

I want to take the opportunity to a) publicize forthcoming "Tyler talks" which will be a poetry reading (Larry Raab—November 18 at 7:15) and a discussion of the Malvinas/Falklands controversy with Carlos Egan, a first year Political Science professor who is an Argentine (unscheduled) and b) draw attention to this kind of thing, which is greatly lacking in the Williams community.

Though this Tuesday night we only had two members of the faculty attending, it is our hope that faculty, not just students, will come to present their viewpoints. As the year progresses we hope to delve into topics ranging from student activism to the conflict for women between producing children and pursuing a high-power career—and the tough choice that entails. Suggestions for other topics are welcome. We encourage other houses to start up their own discussion groups and pursue what may be the truest education.

Viva musica

To the editor:

As a senior music major, I take my hat off to students who take music courses without any previous experience. Music 101 is no gut and for some people, studying music is frustrating and time-consuming. Classical music is a slow friend.

People here have plenty of opportunities to hear live performances: Berkshire Symphony, Music in the Round, Choral Society, plus Department-sponsored recitals and lectures. You wouldn't take chemistry and skip the labs, would you? Attending a live performance is the real culmination of studying music—recordings suffice only as preparation. All Music Department functions are free to I.D. cardholders, so the price is right.

One more thing: The Record could do a better job of announcing cultural events. The last issue made little or no mention of the three Department-sponsored events for Parents' Weekend (and it did receive press releases).

Greg Capaldini '83

Eds. note: Considering space limitations in the newspaper, the Record generally relies on the Williams Weekly Calendar to publicize events in advance.

Andy Crain '84 leads the Marching Band in spirited support of the football team.

Band marches to other drummer

by Derede Arthur

Last Saturday it happened again. More than 60 normally mild-mannered Williams students donned strange outfits and bizarre hats, paraded down Spring Street, and, before a crowd of hundreds, engaged in antics ranging from bawdy cheers to outrageous formations.

The group which sanctions and practices these activities—variously described by observers as "crazy," "tremendous," "obscene" and "appropriately preposterous"—is, of course, none other than the Williams College "sometimes Marching" Band.

Inspired lunacy

Participating in its nineteenth year of "inspired lunacy" and creative chaos under the direction of Francis Cardillo of the Music Department and student leaders Andy Crain '84 and Steve Spears '83, the Band performs during half-time at all home and two away football games. Each half-time performance focuses on a different theme; at Saturday's game against Union, for example, each formation-and-song combination depicted a different academic department.

During half-time Saturday, the band paid "tribute" to the Math Department, which, the crowd was informed, sends out more freshman warnings than any other department. The formation—an "F"—was entitled the "Quickest Way to North Adams State College" formation and was accompanied by the Williams Math Department Anthem: "Shaft." The band went on to "honor" other departments by playing such selections as "Music to Watch the Acropolis Crumble By" (for the classics department), "Give My Regards to Wall Street," (for the economics department), and "The Mountains" (for geology).

The Band's unique presentation of organized chaos ("We all tune up to the base drum," asserts Crain) is usually well-received by students, alumni, and even the press. The Hartford Courant, notes Crain, "spends as much column space

Freshman revue

Plot merely adequate

by Ric Johnson

The 1982-83 Freshman Revue was a pleasant, if fairly standard, musical experience. Given on the Friday and Saturday evenings of Parents' Weekend, and again on that Sunday afternoon, it presented typical revue fare.

The book, by Howard March and Cliff Leaf, tells of application, initiation in, and completion of both a revue and a freshman year. Narration of a sort is provided by a senior, whose title indicates her elevated status both as director of the revue within the revue, and as older college student. The musical accompaniment was written and directed by Dave Sprouse and Cliff Leaf.

Mildly laudatory

The best adjectives to describe this production are mildly laudatory. Pleasant, amusing, sincere are all possibilities. This offering made no great mistakes. None of the necessary ingredients for success was missing. The players were engaging, the music melodious, and the plot adequate. There were problems with character development, the set was somewhat uninspiring, and the choreography was annoying and distracting. However, the overall effect was still fairly good. The real problem is that, with one major exception, the combined effect was flat.

This exception deserves mention and investigation. In Act I, as the various players are bemoaning their fates should they be rejected by the college/revue of their choice, one of them, Timberly, injects a note of sanity into their panic. She says that if she is not accepted, it is not the end of the world. She will move on and investigate other possibilities—such as working in a European cafe.

Brassy style

The resulting musical number, done in a brassy, cabaret style, effectively breaks out of the humdrum routine of the majority of the show. Genuinely entertaining and fast-paced, it is unexpected at this point. Prior to this, one is treated only to the anxieties and

They have told her this on the basis of such scientific processes as the study of the bushiness of the tails of Williamstown squirrels. All she knows about Williamstown squirrels is that they resemble small dogs. She is a native New Yorker and never knew real snow until her Freshman year in the Berkshires.

On the first day of frost she thought someone had spray painted the grass. She is short, and has learned to walk only on the shovelled paths. Where other people sunk into the snow up to their knees, she went up to her waist. And now, they say, the snow is coming again. She is not pleased.

Homecoming tradition

The winter does bring out many Williams traditions. Foremost in everyone's mind, of course, is Homecoming. Last year, she noted, even though they lacked a Homecoming Queen and lost for the first time in God knows how long, Williams still celebrated. She is convinced that Williams would party over anything, given the chance. The only real difference between the Homecoming parties and a Rec room party is that at Homecoming everyone is wearing the one piece of dress-up clothing they own (usually borrowed from Mom or Dad), and everyone makes a more concerted effort to get drunk.

Williams Heat Paradox

Another tradition that invariably comes with the snow is the Williams Heat Paradox. Simply stated, there is always too much heat when you don't want it, and never enough when you are freezing. Don't try to understand it. It is no one's fault, it just is. At this time you will find everyone in the library, no, because they want to study, but because it is the only warm place on campus.

One Williams tradition she will not see this year is her friendly matron. According to the New York Times, her matron made her bed. The New York Times didn't interview her. She believes her matrons were the exceptions. Her matrons got vicarious pleasure in coming at 7:30 in the morning and vacuuming under her bed. She had known them to boycott certain rooms for fear of ants, cooties and inhabitants. She is thinking of hiring herself out as a matron for a little extra cash this year.

Winter also brings the famed Williams Cold. Typified by stiffness, coughing, aches, pains, and an inability to distinguish any kind of dining hall food from another, this malady most often hits right before your most important exam, and sticks with you until the first buds of Spring.

Obsessive Knitting

Most importantly, winter brings Winter Study, that very special time when the Williams student leaves his/her room approximately three times a week to learn such skills as fixing the carburetor, and blowing up glass. She would like to see a Winter Study course initiated that would set out to study the peculiar Williams phenomenon of snow in April.

Orchestra starts season

by A. G. Simas

The Berkshire Symphony opened its 1982-83 season last Friday night with a generally good but uneven performance of three diverse and exciting works by composers Peter Mennin, Felix Mendelssohn and Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov.

A perfect beginning for the evening, Mennin's "Moby Dick" had all the power, fury and wonder of its namesake. The orchestra, under the direction of Julius Hegyi, skillfully pulled the audience into the intensity of this energetic orchestral composition. Because the piece was written only thirty years ago, many in the audience were pleasantly surprised by its vigor.

Sloppy "Reformation"

Unfortunately, this enthusiasm could not be sustained through Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 5. The delivery of "The Reformation" was weak and disappointing. The orchestra sounded ragged and sloppy, and Hegyi appeared to have a hard time keeping things running smoothly. In all, this was the low point of the concert.

However, any dissatisfaction with the evening was quickly dispelled by the wonderful rendition of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade". At once majestic and mystical, his composition is the musical embodiment of the charms of the legendary Scheherazade herself. Highlighted in this piece were the impressive talents of Janet Rowe, concert mistress and solo violinist, whose interpretation of the Scheherazade motif running throughout the work was lyrical and inspiring. But Hegyi and the entire orchestra deserve much credit for the overall fine quality and captivating performance. It was with this fine finale that the symphony concluded a satisfying concert.

Julius Hegyi conducts the Berkshire Symphony through the intricate movements of Mennin's "Moby Dick." (Farley)

In Other Ivory Towers

The CBS Sports department, in its quest for something to fill up time on Sunday afternoons, has run up against a wall of Little Three presidents united in defense of educational ideals.

When CBS offered to send Pat Summerall and John Madden (along with $30,000) to Maine three weeks ago if the Amherst-Bowdoin game could be moved to Sunday, Bowdoin refused on practical grounds.

"The events of Saturday are part of the (Parents' Weekend) program," explained Bowdoin President A. LeRoy Greason to the Orient. "It just didn't make sense to move the game."

Greason also worried about how the school would appear on television. "There are all sorts of possibilities over which we have no control."

Vetoed by the Polar Bears, CBS offered Wesleyan the same deal. But Bowdoin got there first. Greason had spoken with Bates, Middlebury and Wesleyan, figuring that CBS would be interested in their football games. They decided that televising the games would violate the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) emphasis on academics.

Boston Globe columnist Leigh Montville congratulated the Little Three presidents for realizing that no one wanted to see them play on TV anyway.

Amherst and Tufts, however, were willing to accommodate CBS. While supporting NESCAC's goals, Amherst athletic director Peter Gooding told the Wesleyan Argus that NESCAC schools "are so isolated in our beliefs in running our athletic programs in harmony with our educational goals that sometimes we tend to overreact to outside influences."

"It would have been a good test of our high-mindedness, though," Gooding added, "if $120,000 had been offered instead."

He called the $30,000 a "token amount. The networks clearly sense what telecasts of (this) kind are worth."

Tufts sports information director Peter Carren noted resignedly, "It's a Wesleyan home game... we went along with their decision."

CBS is interested in these games because the professional players' strike leaves them little choice. Under agreements with other networks, CBS may broadcast only Division III games on Sundays. "Our analyst told us that the most profitable way to fill (the time left open by the players' strike) is with football; any kind of football," explained Mark Carlson of CBS Sports.

So instead of Amherst-Bowdoin or Tufts-Wesleyan, viewers were treated to Baldwin-Wallace at Wittenburg and Wisconsin-Oshkosh at Wisconsin-Stout.

self-centered worries of the players about selection for the revue/college. Here (and only here) the traditional approach to revue themes is discarded in favor of something more quirky and vigorous. The number was also helped by the noteworthy singing of Libby Miles, whose vocal skill and animated delivery were the highlight of the show.

The rest of the production retold the paths of other revues and thereby gained little distinction. Issues such as those of sexual mores and the nature of certain types of friendship were treated superficially. The final denouement was unconvincing. In sum, one could object to very little in the revue. However, except for the European cafe number, it proved remarkably conventional. Had the production explored the same themes, but in a more creative manner, everyone involved would have benefitted.

Peggy Southard '84 commented that although "it's great that they can be so crazy and enthusiastic," she preferred a band which would "promote spirit... but not in such a derogatory manner."

What, precisely, is the (ir) rationale behind the Band's antics, and what do the members think of the Band? "Our irreverence exemplifies our concern for the moral and social fabric of the Williams community," responded Ned Ladd '86. Peter Pollock '85 explained, "We're everything Williams is not," while David Jaeger '86 characterized the group as "Inane, profane, insane—that about sums it up."

The enthusiasm of the band members runs high. Stephen Page '86, an alto sax player, commented that "It's the most fun I've ever had playing in a marching band, because it's so chaotic and you can really do anything you want. The whole idea is to have fun but still put on a good show."

Sado-masochism

Marc "Chino" Mazzone '84, trombone player and three-year veteran of the marching band, insisted that "We're really in the running for being one of the prime musical organizations on campus." Why has he joined the band every fall? "Beer," Mazzone replied without hesitation. In tones of deep affectation he added, "I think it gives us a chance to express ourselves musically and to really use this gift God has given us... sado-masochism's a part of it too."

Steve Farley '85, who plays the nose, was equally enthusiastic. Like many of his fellow band members, Farley played in his high school marching band ("the Star Spangled Banner solo in a couple of games") but finds the Williams Band much superior: "I don't get much of loudspeakers." On June 13, Giannou was detained by Israeli authorities. According to Giannou, he was singled out of a line of people by "a man with a black mask on his head" and was taken to a convent school which had been converted into a prison. During this time, he experienced, "the greatest fear I have ever felt." He stated that his hands were tied behind his back and he was forced to sit in 100-degree sunshine for three days.

However, the Israelis treated him more leniently because he was a Canadian citizen. Palestinians and Lebanese who were detained with him were beaten by Israeli soldiers and refused water "until they admitted they were members of Al-Fatah" (a PLO group), he said.

Some Israelis condemned torture

He also stated that many Israeli soldiers tried to alleviate the suffering of the prisoners. According to Giannou, many arguments and even a few fights broke out over their treatment. However, he said that beatings took place in front of officers and "if the beatings were not condoned, at least they were tolerated."

Giannou concluded by saying, "The country (Lebanon) needs help. There is a very real possibility of a new outbreak of civil war." He reiterated that "nobody's hands are clean," and explained that the placement of blame is irrelevant. He stated that the only chance for peace lay in direct communication between the PLO and Israel, and he characterized this chance as "slim."

Stiglitz charges anti-Semitism
In the subsequent question and answer session, Professor Robert Stiglitz attacked Giannou's stand and asserted that the PLO was not the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Giannou responded that the majority of the Palestinians he came in contact with called the PLO their representative body. Another member of the audience, Samla Nakhoun, then said, "I am a Palestinian from West Beirut and Yassir Arafat is our leader." After this, a bitter exchange of accusations between members of the audience ensued, and Stiglitz stormed out of Brooks-Rogers Hall saying, "Can't you see how deep the anti-Semitism is in this place?"

Stiglitz followed up his comments the following day in a posted exposition. In it, he called Dr. Giannou a "demagogue" and "poet" who used "mass psychology" and "a mountain of anecdotes" to mesmerize his audience.

Panelists discuss gay lifestyles

by Christian K. Howlett

Members of the Williams community packed Weston Lounge last Tuesday to discuss the roles gays play in a straight society and on a straight campus. The talk, entitled, "Life Styles: Straight Assumptions / Gay Realities," featured a panel of three students and one faculty member, speaking from their experiences. The informal discussion was sponsored by the Williams Gay Peoples' Union.

One major concern of the panelists was that homosexuals are a largely invisible minority. Since there is no skin color or identifying feature by which to recognize them, many homosexuals may feel more isolated from each other than they actually are.

This invisibility is aggravated by "attitudes which permeate our society that assume that everyone is heterosexual, wants to be, is going to be," one speaker said. There is simply nothing analogous to "schlock gay culture." Especially on TV, "everything that is related to you is heterosexual roles."

"No gays at Williams"

Similarly, another panelist related how a faculty member blithely told her in conversation that there simply weren't any homosexuals at Williams. The panelist added, "You are living in a society that keeps telling you you don't exist. . . I want it to be very clear, physically and concretely, that there are lesbians at Williams, that there are gay men at Williams."

This speaker went on to say that she had been reticent about speaking at the discussion because she felt her sexuality was no one's business. "It's not the first thing I want someone to know about me." However, she remembered that in high school and college other lesbians had been invisible to her. "I'm speaking because I would like to have heard me speak then."

Other concerns discussed by panelists were problems they had personally faced in everyday life; problems straight people may never have thought of, such as the tensions arising when well-meaning straight friends tried to fix them up. "There is pressure to conform and conceal what you feel. It's everywhere, all the time."

One recurrent problem with gay people is how to tell others about their homosexuality. Even in everyday conversations about relationships and love, problems exist. A homosexual has the choice of keeping quiet, deceiving people or making a public declaration of his or her sexuality. This last is often the most difficult because of uncertain reactions.

"Gay people don't want to hide or repress, and they shouldn't have to. But it's a hard thing for straight people to deal with," one speaker said.

still characterize society's view of homosexuals. In many positions of authority, particularly political ones, to be known as a homosexual still means ruin.

Hence the need for this sort of discussion. As one panelist stated, "the gay community (at Williams) is so subverted . . . it's not obvious at all. There has to be some sort of vocalism that I didn't find here."

For the most part, said one speaker, homosexuals don't want to accept the fact that a whole straight society exists out there that won't accept or support them, that they must rely upon themselves. "A big problem among gays," one speaker concluded, "is that they don't

There is pressure to conform and conceal what you feel."

Public affection disallowed

In their most simple relationships gay people often find themselves restricted in ways straight people are not. A double standard exists about public affection between homosexuals; society may say they have the right to love, but not in public. As one speaker said, "It's O.K. if you're homosexual, but don't remind us of it." This attitude can be very damaging to someone trying to come to terms with his or her homosexuality, the panelists said.

"Heterosexual relationships have the advantage that society enthusiastically encourages them, but if you have homosexual tendencies you have to go against everything society endorses," another speaker stressed. This point is driven home daily because so much of literature and culture centers around straight love. "There's very little we study here that has to do with gays. There should be some sort of alternate voice."

Stereotypes still prevail

The panelists noted that the feminist movement had done much to counteract the lack of female role models, but ignorance and prevalent stereotypes affirm themselves. It's the responsibility of every person within themselves to go out and say: "This is who I am."

Author's note: Most of the panelists at Tuesday's discussion wished to remain anonymous. This was not out of shame or fear but because many believe that their parents receive the Record, and they have not yet resolved their homosexuality with their families.

Joel disc holds few surprises

by Mark Averitt

Billy Joel and his music are somehow inseparable. Conversation about Joel's art always seems to break down to an analysis of the man himself and what he has decided to publicly stand for. Some people like the tough-talking, egotistical, adolescent shadow that Joel throws on the popular music scene, and others don't.

Joel is extraordinary in that he has become, whether by choice or not, a performer whose self-consciousness infuses his music so completely that it forces the listener to become as obsessed with Joel's "image" as he is himself. Billy Joel has never been able to climb outside of himself in his music and evoke a picture or a feeling which is not dominated by his distinctive personality.

Joel's latest album, The Nylon Curtain, is another example of start-to-finish Billy Joel, with a slight twist. If you are generally sympathetic to Joel, the record will delight you. If not, you should probably stay away from it.

Temporary defeat

Rolling Stone's October 28 issue featured an article on a reformed, adult Billy Joel who, after a painful divorce and a life-threatening motorcycle accident, had picked himself up off the ground and decided, "Everyone has to deal with temporary defeat." Indeed, The Nylon Curtain is an attempt to change Joel's image. This time his photo is not even on the cover design; a shot of Joel holding a cup of coffee and reading about his favorite baseball team losing a game graces the flip-side of the record jacket.

Has Joel mellowed, and if so, will The Nylon Curtain appeal to the audience which condemned him for being a maudlin, narcissistic teen-age idol? Yes, the theme of his new album is surrender to fate, but Joel's intentions of "growing up" are so evident in his lyrics and carefully manipulated melange of early, Piano Man sentimentality with his later, uncompromising Glass Houses rock-and-roll realism that a courageous change-of-pace becomes another self-indulgent attempt to appeal to all audiences.

Rock and digression

Billy Joel is unquestionably a good musician, and this is reflected in a couple of songs (Allen-town, "A Room of Our Own") with such a compelling rock beat that they would be appropriate for any occasion from a dancing party to a romantic evening. "Goodnight Salgon" and "Scandinavian Skies" are blues digressions about war. Neither song has the lasting impact of "The Stranger" although the former is a much more sophisticated treatment of Vietnam than "Still in Salgon" by the Charlie Daniels Band. "Laura," "Pressure," "She's Right on Time," "Surprises," and "Where's the Orchestra" would fit in on any Joel album.

None of the tunes on The Nylon Curtain could be classified as "fillers." The album is Joel in his element; and, in the words of "Surprises," "It shouldn't surprise you at all."

Bollinger blasts government aid

by David Kleit

While evoking an image of an America where citizens helped each other and did not rely upon government "handouts," a top Reagan official explained and defended his Administration's recent budget cuts in a lecture entitled "New Federalism and Urban Policy" October 25. Stephen J. Bollinger, Assistant Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, said that government social programs have "encouraged the deterioration of the work ethic" over the past 40 years.

Bollinger, who is Assistant Secretary for Community Planning and Development, strongly attacked the policies of past administrations and noted that the number of federal programs has increased more than ten-fold in twenty years. "We have attempted to solve our problems through federal intervention," Bollinger said, adding that not all of these programs have been successful.

Bollinger asserted that although the government has been trying to buy its way out of problems for 40 years, the country is no better off than when many of the relief programs started. He suggested a coalition of church, private sector and government efforts to replace the major social programs. "The only real solution is not in the federal budget," he said.

According to Bollinger, Reagan's tax cut was based on the assumption that states would raise their taxes in response to a decrease in federal funding. This would ideally place more money and control in the hands of state and local government.

Private sector aid

Bollinger used his lecture to promote the Reagan Administration's proposal to experiment with turning over projects to the private sector. He touted the advantages of enterprise zones, in which the government would remove itself from designated areas and then provide incentives for business to take over what had been the government role. The incentives would take the form of tax and regulatory relief.

The enterprise zone proposal will come before Congress either late this year or early next year, Bollinger explained. The initial proposal includes adding 25 cities per year to the program for the next three years.

In addition to the enterprise zone proposal, all current federal programs are being critically evaluated, Bollinger said.

Sawyer cuts hours, displays

by Carol Davenport

Late-night patrons of the Sawyer Library reserve room have been forced to cut short their studies this year. The reserve room now closes one hour earlier, disappointing some eager students. In addition, the Sawyer display cases are now displaying library materials instead of student exhibits.

The reserve room now closes at 1:00 a.m. instead of 2:00 a.m., although the Van Alstyne Lounge still remains open all night.

Reject student monitors

Head Librarian Phyllis Cutler claimed that the reserve room is primarily used for social purposes during the late hours. "It is not a place for serious study," she said. There have also been incidents of vandalism in the reserve room late at night. For instance, last Monday night every piece of audiovisual equipment was tampered with, according to Cutler. She was referring to an incident where the power was turned on overnight for each of the reserve room turntables and tape decks.

Library staff cannot be spared to watch over the reserve room late at night, said Cutler. She rejected the use of student monitors, saying that in the past their use did not reduce the "social atmosphere."

Students object

Some late-night studiers objected to the change. "I think a lot of people are here to study, not to socialize," said Brent Butler '84. "I pay $11,000 a year to go here, and I should be able to study when I choose."

Bob Rolader '84 concurred. "You need the library to be open later because some students are involved in so many activities during the day that their studies take them into the early hours of the morning."

Displays go to Baxter

The discontinuance of student displays in the Sawyer lobby was at Butler's request, according to Dean Daniel O'Connor. "It just seemed like a reasonable thing to do," said O'Connor.

New arrangements are being made for student displays. James Hodgkins, Director of Food Service, has ordered a display case, which will be installed in Baxter Hall where the "for sale" board is located now. Students wishing to exhibit there will be able to sign up in the Food Service office.

Non-issue?

Activists square off over draft

by Brett McDonnell

"The Garfield Republican Club thinks of the draft as the second biggest non-issue since sexual harassment," says Danny Blatt '85, chairman of the GRC.

Not everyone on campus agrees with this assessment. "It's naive to say the draft is a non-issue," responds Dave Yaskulka '84, a leader of the Williams Coalition Against Militarism (WCAM) and an organizer of the new Berkshire Draft Counseling Center. "It has already begun with registration. There's a definite likelihood that there will be a draft."

Nice students

The draft has once again become an issue on some college campuses across the country. Still, it is not exactly the burning question of the day here at Williams, say students involved with the issue. Yaskulka, who has been to three freshman entries and two upperclass houses talking about the new Center, commented upon the reaction he has received.

"I get mostly congeniality," Yaskulka reflects. "Niceness—that typifies the political attitude of most Williams students."

No need

The Chaplain's Office and WCAM co-sponsored the Center at the beginning of this year in hopes of better informing the campus about the draft. Although turnout for the Center has not been exceedingly high, Yaskulka expects that the numbers will grow when WCAM starts their Outreach program, which will involve, among other things, talks at local high schools and information cards in student mailboxes.

Will Gillespie '85, author of a pro-draft article in the Williams Republican, agrees on students' attitudes. "I don't think the draft is that big an issue on campus this year," he states.

There is little organized support of the draft. "I don't think we see it as quite as serious an issue since there is no draft right now," explains Gillespie.

Blatt agrees, saying "Draft registration is just a necessary first step in case there's a strong need for the draft. I don't think there will be a need for a long time."

Spreading the word

Gillespie questions the need for the Draft Center. "I kind of wonder what they're doing since there isn't any draft." Still, he says "its existence doesn't bother me at all."

Blatt is not so restrained. "The Center is absurd," he maintains. "There's no prospect of a draft. They're making a mountain out of a molehill."

Yaskulka defends the Center. "We're just trying to tell people that they ought to be thinking about things." He pointed out that the Selective Service supports such centers as a way to distribute information.

Yaskulka says that despite student non-interest he will keep on spreading the word. "I'm always hopeful," he states. "I'm spending my time going around and talking to people. What else can you do?"

College Council

by Jack Mayher

At the College Council meeting last Tuesday night discussion focused on several student proposals that dealt with changes in the curriculum.

One proposal suggested the implementation of a pass-fail option at Williams. The Council reacted positively to the idea, but concluded that it needed input from house members before taking a stand. Council tabled another proposal until the next meeting in order to gather more information. The Council will meet twice next week on Tuesday and Thursday in order to get through both the budget and their housing proposal.

Apartheid

by Lucy Lytle

Civil rights activist Arthur Serota was the featured speaker at the Anti-Apartheid Coalition's Informational Fair on Saturday.

During a brief interview beforehand, Serota, a defense attorney specializing in civil rights who lived and worked in Nigeria and Zimbabwe for a year, stressed the role played by United States corporations providing oil and computer technology to South Africa in maintaining the current apartheid situation. He charged that General Motors has a plan to "convert their South African plants into military machines and their workers into military police" in the event of a major black uprising there.

Burns predicts

Elections on "war and peace"

by Ned Ladd

Professor James McGregor Burns spoke to a packed Dodd House living room last night on the political importance of today's election. He stated that "there will be profoundly important choices on the Massachusetts ballot."

Springboard to '84

He was referring in particular to the U.S. Senate campaign. Although he conceded that

According to Coalition members, the purpose of the fair was "to give Williams students and parents the opportunity to educate themselves" about the apartheid conditions in South Africa, but, as Roger Doughty dryly observed, many people "show an amazing capacity to turn a blind eye to anything but the Purple Calendar."

Watson Fellows

Williams has nominated four seniors for the Watson Fellowship, which provides a year of independent study and travel abroad. The nominees were chosen by a faculty selection committee on the basis of their proposed project, capacity for leadership, and potential for creative achievement and excellence within a chosen field. The Williams nominees will compete with candidates from 50 other institutions; 70 recipients will be chosen.

Susan Bragdon intends to pursue a long-standing interest in predator-prey relationships by observing canids in the wild in Africa, Canada, and Germany. Bryan Cannon hopes to travel to India to study religious shrines and temples and the culture surrounding their use. Mara Dale would like to investigate the role of women in Mexico as evidenced in the Mexican oral tradition of village communities. Cecilia Danks' project would take her to Latin America to explore her interest in tropical ecology and the problems of agriculture and rain forest preservation.

Incumbent Senator Edward Kennedy has little to worry about from the Republican candidate Raymond Shamie, he emphasized that Kennedy must measure up to "expectations." He said that Kennedy must use "1982 as a springboard to 1984." If Kennedy falls below the percentage expected of him, Burns stated that there could be problems with Kennedy's expected presidential campaign in 1984.

War and peace

According to Burns, "The stakes of 1984 may be the stakes of war and peace," because there will be a "dramatic contrast" between the platforms of the Republican and Democratic parties. He believes that the Democratic party will shift to the left and absorb many leftist special interest groups such as anti-nuclear and environmental factions. This "convergence between peace and liberal labor forces" will, Burns believes, strengthen and rejuvenate the Democratic party.

The result will be "wide-open politics" and "party conflict" in the 1984 elections. "I'm very much against centrist politics," says Burns. "1984 will present us with two meaningful choices."

Head of the Charles

Crew goes to Regatta

by Lee Farbman and Molly Tennis

The Williams crew travelled to Cambridge on October 24 to participate in the 18th annual Head of the Charles Regatta. The Women's Crew entered four boats; the men had only two, because of increased competition for the 40 spots in each event.

The men's varsity eight clocked a 16:09.6 over the three mile upstream course to finish 15th out of 40. This finish guarantees the men a spot in next year's race.

Women hold off Boston

In the Women's Championship Eight event, the varsity eight was able to hold off the Boston Rowing Club eight (consisting of most of the women's national team) for several minutes.

However, as Boston Rowing Club passed Williams, the varsity eight was able to hold off the Boston Rowing Club eight (consisting of most of the women's national team) for several minutes.

Undefeated Ruggers beat Western Mass.

by Bert Sallsbury

Looking like a brand new team, the rugby club travelled to Springfield last Saturday to face Western Mass. and returned from the day with an A-side win 16-0 and a close B-side loss 10-12.

Long game

Though the A-side had a tough time handling the Western Mass. "football" style of play in the beginnings of the match, the team rallied to win the shutout. The game started late and was prolonged by the numerous calls for "two minutes sir" (for an injury) by the Western Mass. players.

Russell converts

Dave Lipscomb '83 had an outstanding game at wing as he scored one try and set up the other by Dixon Pike '83. Eric Russell '84 was able to convert one try and added 6 points in field goals to account for the rest of the WRFC points. Mike Brownrigg '83 had a fine game before he had to leave with an injury.

B-side loss

The B-siders played a good match but lost in a close game by two points. Larry Hebb '83, starting the game at fullback, put over the first try on a nice pop kick that he caught to touch down. John May '84 put over the other WRFC try and Bill Best '83 was able to convert it with a nice kick. Chris Foley '85, Mark Evans '85 and John Dagnello '85 all showed good efforts.

As the club won three games on their way to becoming Berkshire Tournament Champions two weekends ago over Fall Break, they are still undefeated with a record of 7-0-1. This Saturday

The women's varsity four had a strong race from start to finish; they passed the boat directly in front of them in the first half mile and rowed past Wellesley with two miles to go. The novice men finished 23rd in the 27-boat Youth Eight event.

The first novice women raced a very solid race—they finished eleventh out of thirteen with a time of 19:35 over three miles. The rating was low, but the only boat that passed the eight was Smith.

Bump into shore

The second novice boat had some minor difficulties—they ran into the starboard shore. The accident, and it was an accident, was a failure in the boat's P.A. system.

The boat was approaching the wide starboard turn when the "cox-box" quit. The coxswain tried to steer the crew with her voice but was misunderstood. The boat sailed into the bank and coxswain Robin Flag jumped out to push the boat back into the race. The novices finished last, but they finished.

urday R.P.I. comes to Cole Field for an 11:00 match; and the traditional WRFC Fall Program comes out this weekend for Homecoming.

WUFO sails to good year

by Ward Katsanis

This past weekend the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization ended its season, competing in the Intersectionals at UMass. Despite a somewhat discouraging finish, the fall schedule as a whole was successful and exciting.

During the Intersectionals, Williams sailed forth displaying bright day-glo face paints and high psych. Unfortunately they lost their three matches against Tufts, Dartmouth and tournament host UMass.

The weekend prior to Intersectionals, Williams participated in the Northeast Sectionals at the University of Connecticut. In spite of losses to both UConn. and a club team called "The Mob", W.U.F.O.

Harriers take Little Three

by Lyman Casey

It had to happen. Bo Parker could not go through an entire season as co-captain of the men's cross-country team without running a single meet. The team had to bounce back from the injuries it had heaped upon it early this season, sidelining Parker (foot injury), co-captain Lyman Casey '83 (muscle pull), and Bennett Yort '84 (foot injury). Most of all, the team had to win its 13th consecutive Little Three Championship.

Wesleyan put a much improved squad on the line Saturday at Amherst, and figured to be in the thick of things at this year's Championships. Early in the race, however, the Eph harriers took the initiative. Juniors John Nelson and Brian Angie, Senior Dan Riley, and freshman Ian Brzezinski broke to the front of the pack and never looked back.

Individual finishers

Soundly beating its conference rivals, the team took five of the top seven places, and put seven men ahead of Wesleyan's fourth runner and ahead of Amherst's third man. Nelson, Riley, and Angie ran brilliant races for Williams, finishing second, third and fourth, respectively, packed in behind the individual champion, Wesleyan's Seb Junger.

Yort looked strong in grabbing sixth place, and helped junior Parker return to racing in amazing form, pacing him to seventh place in a very quick

Keep the title

No one at the meet was willing to venture a guess as to how long the Ephmen will be able to keep their string of titles going, but it seems likely that it may continue for quite some time if future squads show the resilience and determination to overcome adversity that this team did in compiling a 6-5 record for the season.

The varsity went to Boston today for the IC4A's, and the squad competes in New England on Saturday.

Netwomen place third in tourney

by H. Denise Ross

The women's volleyball team finished their season with a winning record of 17-12, as they placed third in the Northeast Intercollegiate Athletic Conference Volleyball Tournament held on Saturday at Connecticut College.

Williams, seeded fifth out of eight teams, opened up well against fourth seeded Wellesley College, beating them 15-7 and 15-12. This win was emotionally motivating for Williams, because Wellesley was one of the teams who beat them in the tournament held last weekend at Williams.

Ephwomen in finals

Next came second-seeded Smith College, which Williams also defeated over a period of three games. Williams won the first game 16-14, Smith won the second 15-3, and Williams came back to win the final game 15-6. This win put the Ephs into the finals against Mt. Holyoke for first place. Unfortunately, Williams could not defeat Mt. Holyoke as they lost 15-7 and 15-12; Mt. Holyoke won the tournament.

Lose consolation

Since M.I.T. lost to Mt. Holyoke earlier in the tournament, they faced the Ephs in the consolation bracket for second and third place. Williams lost the match to M.I.T. 15-4 and 15-4, thus finishing third.

There were no superstars for the Williams team because they displayed a strong and consistent sense of unity throughout the tournament, said Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin. She was very pleased with the team's performance, and felt that everyone contributed something. She considered this tournament to be the peak of Williams' ability, because they were able to upset top-seeded teams. Hudson-Hamblin said that all the games were extremely intense and Williams played their hearts out.

While Williams will lose two of their best players to graduation—Lisa Pepe and Kathleen Gilmore—Coach Hudson-Hamblin is very optimistic about next year's team because she will still have a strong nucleus.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK
This week's recipient is senior Jeff Sutton, who is leading the men's soccer team in scoring with four goals and six assists. Sutton scored the lone goal in the Ephmen's 2-1 loss to Babson last Tuesday. Jeff, this Bud's for you.

First loss to Union since '69

Turnovers lead to gridder loss

by Robert Tercek

Two touchdowns and 140 yards in the air in the first five minutes gave Union a commanding lead they welded to hammer the Williams gridder's to a 34-0 defeat. The victory was Union's first over the Ephmen in 13 years.

Six of Williams' eight second-half drives were stalled by turnovers. The Ephmen gave up four fumbles and five interceptions, giving up possession three times inside Union's ten yard line.

"We're not making any excuses," said Head Coach Bob Odell. "Union played a very good football game and deserved to win. They came out and scored 14 points in two series, while we'd only run four plays."

Thomas injured

Sophomore Ted Thomas, leading rusher for the Ephmen, did not play against Union due to a separated shoulder. Thomas, who averages nearly five yards per carry with 494 yards in five games, was injured in Friday's practice.

"Ted's not being available to play kind of shook us up," said Odell. "All our offense is built around him, and without him we fell flat on our face. We lost a wheel off our wagon," Odell continued. "Both offensively and defensively, individual breakdowns cost us a lot. We held them pretty well until the big play was made. Unfortunately, this year everybody seems to be making the big play on us."

Union jumps out

Union started off the game with a bang. On the opening play after the kickoff, they did not start with a huddle. QB Dan Stewart completed a 24-yard scoring pass to John Johnson in that first series. A 49-yard pass and a 19-yarder set up the Dutchmen's second touchdown with 9:50 on the clock.

"We were snakebit," said Odell. "Everything we tried to do went sour on us. B. J. Connolly had one of his less than sterling performances." Junior Connolly, who completed only three of eleven passing attempts and had two intercepted, was replaced at the half by senior Scott Garabedian.

No momentum change

Linebacker Dan Wilen intercepted a Union pass in the end-zone midway through the half, preventing Union from going up 21-0 and briefly changing the momentum. However, a fumble on first down set up a Union field goal to put the game even further out of reach.

Dutchman Len Huttner picked off a desperation pass by Connolly at the Union 36-yard line and carried the ball back 64 yards for the third touchdown to make it 24-0, just seven seconds before the half.

Force the ball

"We were trying to force the ball," said Odell of the turnovers. "The turnovers and fumbles cost us a lot, but in spite of them we played a lot of good football."

Williams gained 311 offensive yards, giving up 349 to Union. The field position advantage and turnovers were the factors that allowed Union to convert their yardage into points.

"It's very difficult to maintain an emotional peak," said Odell, referring to the previous weekend's upset victory over Tufts.

"But we'll be emotionally high as we enter the Little Three. It's our second season. The rest is all over, but we can still win the Little Three competition." The 3-3 Ephmen will host traditional rival Wesleyan for Homecoming at 1:30 this Saturday.

by Dave Woodworth

The men's soccer team strengthened their bid for a post-season tourney berth with a 1-0 win at Springfield on Saturday.

Freshman Mark Schroeder tallied the lone goal of the match at 49:59 of the game off a corner kick by John Campbell '84. Williams' defense, led by captain stopper Aytac Apaydin '83, sweeper Mike Sullivan '84, and fullback Krls Strohbehn '83, which has allowed only 10 goals in 11 games thus far this season, made it stand.

Springfield outshot Williams by a 21-16 margin, but as Coach Mike Russo noted, "Their shot selection was not that good, and few were threatening." Those that were on target were turned away by goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85, who made 13 saves for his fourth shutout of the season. His Springfield counterpart, John Bennett, had 8 saves.

Loss to Babson

Earlier in the week, the Ephs dropped a tough 2-1 decision to Babson, one of the top-ranked teams in the northeast. In that match, Babson got the early lead when Jay Nusblatt knocked home a pass from Rudy Von Berg on a perfectly executed play about 26 minutes into the first half.

Williams came right back to tie four minutes later, as Jeff Sutton '83 was able to head a 40-yard indirect kick by Rob Kuzel '83 past Babson goalie Bob Muzcaro, who was out of position.

Babson, however, regained the lead within two minutes as John Ingalls booted in a rebound off a corner kick for a 2-1 Babson advantage. The Ephs pressured the opponents' goal throughout the second half, but the Babson defense was up to the challenge.

Chance for tourney

The split gives Williams a 7-3-1 record on the year, and Coach Russo was optimistic about his team's chances for an ECAC tourney bid, which went out yesterday. "We're right up there with Amherst, Colby, and Salem State. I'm sure that our win on Saturday legitimized our claim. A lot depends on who gets the NCAA bids, but I think our schedule is tougher than the competition's."

"We set three goals for ourselves this year: to get the most wins by a Williams soccer team (the current record is 8); to win an ECAC tourney berth; and to win the Little Three. Those are pretty high standards, but we're within reach. We have definitely turned this program around."

The Ephs are guaranteed no worse than a .500 season as they go into today's match at Siena, with Little Three action against Wesleyan and Amherst in the next two weeks.

Women ruggers romp

by Mary Flanagan

In a smashing victory this Saturday, the women's rugby team cracked Mt. Holyoke's tough defense to win 14-0. The Mt. Holyoke team, scrambled and scorched by their A-side victory loss, went on to defeat the Williams B-side 6-0.

Dory Dewar, sophomore super-rugger, led the A-side victory by scoring two tries. The third try was scored by Robin Rutishauser '86, while team captain Cindy "Boot" Lytton kicked in the conversion goal for the total 14 points.

Human sacrifice

This week's human sacrifice was Suni Edelstein, who proved her rugged dedication by tearing ligaments in her ankle and pulling a hamstring.

The B-side game was less excruciating although no less exciting. Egged on by spectators, Williams women tenaciously held their ground. In the last ten seconds, however, one determined Holyoke rugger separated from the pack and battered her way to the try zone, scoring the winning try. "They may have beaten us this year," grumbled one B-side lineswoman, "but we'll fry them next season."

The women's rugby team smashed their way to a 14-0 victory over Mt. Holyoke on Saturday.

Little Three Champs

Women race past rivals

The women's cross-country team ran all over traditional rivals Wesleyan and Amherst in the annual Little Three meet at Amherst Saturday.

Capturing the first five places gave the Ephwomen a perfect score of 15 points, with second-place Wesleyan far behind with 58 points and Amherst in third with 65 points.

Top finishers

Senior co-captain Sue Bragdon and sophomore Sue Flynn shared first place with a time of 18:14 on the 5000 meter (3.1 mile) Amherst course. Chinyere Uwah '85 and Liz Moore '85 also tied, capturing third place with a time of 18:56.

Coach Bud Fisher said that freshman Mary Keller "zinged Amherst's Bonnie McLeod in the last 50 yards" to beat her by one second for fifth place, securing the shutout.

Team running

Fisher said that the key to the victory was that the Ephwomen ran together as a team, as the two ties indicated.

The Ephwomen end their season at the NCAA Division III qualifying meet on November 13.

Man nabbed after assault

Students fight off area resident

by Lucy Lytle and Ned Ladd

Two female students are shaken but unharmed and Williamstown police have taken a local man into custody following an attack made early Thursday morning near Cole Field.

The suspect, described as a "white male, 6'4", early twenties, prominent nose, dark hair, wearing blue jeans and a green turtleneck sweater" in a notice sent out by the Deans' Office, was questioned by Williams police Thursday afternoon whereupon he confessed to attacking one of the girls. Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zolto said that formal charges cannot be filed nor more information released until a complaint against the suspect has been processed, although he did indicate that the suspect currently is charged with misdemeanor, not aggravated, assault and battery. The suspect has ten days to respond to the complaint.

The attack occurred at 12:35 a.m. Thursday as the two students were walking near Cole Field. They realized that a man had begun to follow them, and tried to run away when they saw that he had pulled the collar of his turtleneck up over his nose and mouth, partially concealing his face. He caught up to one of the girls and locked his arm around her neck. Hearing her cries, the second student returned and they began to struggle with the man. As they fought, two more students emerged from some nearby trees and yelled at the man, who quickly ran off in the direction of the Cole Field House.

No joke

In an interview Thursday afternoon, the students recalled that their attacker "was really drunk—you could smell the liquor through his turtleneck." They also remembered that he said "This is something I have to do."

They explained that there was something almost unreal about the attack. One girl remembered, "The whole time it was happening I just kept saying to myself that it had to be a joke, he must have been only kidding around. Things like that aren't supposed to happen at Williams."

Immediately following the attack, the girls reported the incident to campus security, which in turn notified the Williamstown Police Department. Two pieces of evidence that the girls got hold of during the struggle were turned over to the authorities and were of major importance in revealing the identity of the attacker. However, Chief Zolto has requested that no further information on the subject be given out pending the hearing.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor and Dean of Freshmen Cris Roosenraad praised the quick action of local police, as did the victims. One of the students involved said "I was impressed by the way the Williamstown police handled the situation. They could have put it on a back burner but they didn't . . . they really care about the safety of the students at the College."

Potential for trouble

In the wake of the attack, the Deans' Office is reemphasizing the availability of the college escort service and urging students to exercise caution when walking about the campus at night. Dean Roosenraad reminded students that "it is unwise for any of us, male or female, to be out late at night alone" because "there is always the potential for trouble, even in Williamstown."

He added that the College security system will not be beefed up as a result of the attack, but that two security cruisers will continue to patrol the campus at night. He also predicted a reduced risk of such types of attacks as winter sets in and students spend more time indoors.

Roosenraad praised the two students for immediately reporting the attack and described the reaction of the Deans' Office as "appropriately cautious" emphasizing the need to avoid "hysteria and paranoia."

Although the victims requested that their names not appear in print, they said they hope that their experience illustrates that such attacks are "a potential security problem" and that others will be more careful in the future as a result. Feminist Alliance representative Elena Bertozzi '83 agreed, saying, "the best policy is one of awareness."

Languages lose Weston

The language departments may be the losers in a massive game of musical offices to be played next year, say some faculty.

The moves will begin in January and continue through next summer. The computer center will be moved from Bronfman Science Center and the basement of Weston Language Center to a renovated Jesup Hall, giving Bronfman added lab and classroom space. Jesup offices, including the Alumni and News offices, will relocate to Weston. The Language Center will move to the Roper Center on the lower floors of Stetson Hall.

Although the College could have constructed an entirely new computer center, College Treasurer William Reed said the architect in charge of the switch "has estimated that we will save $750,000 - $1,000,000 in construction costs alone (by renovating); and that doesn't include savings in heating, cleaning, and other new building costs."

"Computers can expand

The Board of Trustees approved the Administration's moving plans. The Board wanted "to make better use of space, rather than adding new space," said Reed.

"First on the priority list was the computer center," said Reed. "They had to have 17,000 square feet of space." Jesup's "convenient location" in the Science Quad made it a prime choice for a center that is "a resource, like a library," said Reed.

Mathematics professor G. L. Spencer felt the move would benefit the computer center. Having the computers together will make it "easier for students, especially if they need assistance, since there will be other people there to help." The center will also have room to expand.

Profs unhappy

Some language professors were less pleased about the decision, noting that space in Stetson is limited and that many classrooms designated for language use, such as several in Griffin Hall, are inappropriate for their use.

"They are giving us the lowest quality," said Professor of French George Pistorius. "The classrooms in the basement of Griffin are huge, ugly and in proportion to our needs. We need many classrooms for 10-15 students each."

"I don't think that the situation is reversible at this stage," added Pistorius. "On the other hand, I don't accept that I should be happy about it or that the new center would be better. . . We will survive, but we will not have one elegant building, and that's it."

German professor Edson Chick concurred. "I'm not sure what the effect will be, but symbolically, losing our own building looks bad," he said. "This was an administrative, not a curricular, decision that's flawed in terms of use of space, but

by E. A. Stanton

"America is still a racist country," said Julius Chambers last Wednesday. Chambers, president of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, described "Civil Rights Enforcement Under Reagan" as an "abandoned ship" in his Jesup Hall lecture.

Chambers emphasized that what he called the blatant and consistent failure of the Justice Department to enforce civil rights statutes, a recent controversy over the absence of minority faculty and students at Harvard Law School, and division in the ranks of civil rights activists exemplified by a recent lawsuit between the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and the NAACP have made Americans realize "the need for renewed intensity and renewed approaches to free all citizens of racial discrimination."

During the 60's and 70's, demonstrations and protests made it "popular for political leaders to advocate civil rights . . . the progress of the 60's and 70's, however, affected only 10 percent of Black Americans," said Chambers. For example, a 1982 Urban League Report shows an increase in the earnings gap between white and black workers rather than a decrease, according to Chambers.

Separate but equal

At the same time that minorities were making little real progress in the fight against discrimination, some black leaders questioned busing and school integration as the right solution to discrimination problems. Chambers noted, "This division in the ranks of the blacks gave solace to those who opposed desegregation and equal opportunity. Reagan felt that he had a mandate to turn the clock back."

The Justice Department has refused to use the legal tools of previous administrations to fight discrimination in fair housing, education and employment litigation, said Chambers.

In this issue...

Williams Life looks at Shangri-La, a.k.a. Williamstown, how it works, and how Williams fits into the community.

The Williams Record Adieu, Weston

The planned shift of College departments among several buildings will apparently encourage maximum use of existing space. We regret, however, that the language departments will lose Weston, their elegant and distinctive headquarters.

Potential student interest in foreign languages is strong, as proven by overwhelming interest in taking Italian during Winter Study. Record numbers of students are planning to study abroad. This interest stands in the face of perhaps unfair reputations of some language departments as the weakest departments at Williams. Whatever the final form of the new language center, placing it in the depths of Stetson can only reduce the foreign language presence on campus.

The decision is made, but steps should be taken to alleviate its negative impact. The College should develop stronger, more diverse foreign language courses.

First steps would be the addition of new, non-literature courses in the present departments, and of another language department, perhaps Chinese or Japanese. Although nearly every college of Williams' caliber offers one or both of these languages, here they can only be studied independently as part of the Critical Languages program.

The College has weakened its foreign language departments by taking Weston away from them. Offering an Asian language will undo some of the damage by expanding our foreign language horizons beyond Europe. And making extraordinary and creative effort to provide the small classrooms, comfortable clubrooms, and advanced listening rooms essential to a strong language program is the least we owe to these displaced departments.

Rare opportunity

To the editor:

I write to assure Thomas Blair '43 and anyone else who would be upset if Mrs. Robinson were representative of the economics faculty at Williams. With due respect to the fine Williams economics department, I think her visit is a rare opportunity for undergraduates to learn from a leader in the field for half a century.

In the class Mrs. Robinson teaches and in her mealtime conversations with students she shares experiences rich with the history and controversy of economics. She addresses topics that economics traditionally ignores—issues of distribution and the inevitable inadequacy of national governments' solutions to global problems to name just two.

Mr. Blair, however, seems to object not to her competence, but rather to her ideology. In fact, Mrs. Robinson extols no "brand of economics, divorced from reality" so much as she encourages students to look beyond the easy answers and logical inadequacies of graphs and theories we've been taught. She likes to point out, "I'm not giving you any answers, but I hope you'll be able to think these things out for yourselves now." Surely questioning our own economics teaching can only strengthen our understanding.

Personally, I wish required courses and the evening news gave "a broader view of things," and if I thought narrow-minded rejection was "representative of (alumni) quality" I would be disappointed.

Alison M. Tucher '84

P.S. The economics department recently held an informative panel on Dr. Stigler's Nobel prize winning work as well.

Uplifting

Here's to the men of the soccer team, who really gave me a lift.

In my haste to get off the pavement in order to shoot that perfect photo while travelling west on route 2 last Saturday, I misjudged the junction of shoulder and ditch and ended up with two wheels in each. Equitable, no doubt, but not preferable.

I had just about decided to accept a ride to a town to arrange for a tow when several men arrived on white horses—I mean in a station wagon—and lifted those two wheels, and all associated with them, out of the ditch.

I sincerely hope no studying/soccer/relaxing muscles were strained, and again offer my thanks to these gallant Williams gentlemen.

Facetious

To the editors:

We found Robert A. Tercek's facetious letter (elsewhere in this issue) appalling. It is hard to believe that anyone could find it funny to joke about the venerable Williams tradition of the maid service.

Best Regards!

Seriousness

To the editor:

I wish to thank you for printing so many of the reactions to the term paper advertisement in the October 5 edition of the Record. They were nearly as entertaining as the ad itself. I too saw the advertisement. Very good, very amusing, I thought. Ha ha.

I sincerely hope no studying/soccer/relaxing muscles were strained, and again offer my thanks to these gallant Williams gentlemen.

Susan Forbes Hansen

However, it is November now and the letters continue, all of them coming out against the printing of the advertisement as they persist in expressing their profound concern and disappointment. So I write: as I was amused by the initial ad, so was I delighted with the reactions it prompted. But what bothers me is the furrowed brow-ness of the letters and the utter, unrelenting seriousness with which the writers take both the advertisement and themselves. On a college campus, such pretensions of maturity and higher enlightenment are pompous, obnoxious, and tiresome. Such seriousness is a deep overreaction to such a harmless, entertaining ad. "Don't take yourself too seriously," he said.

Still Terribly Amused,

To the editor:

The alumni-ae of Choate Rosemary Hall will recognize Tom Yankus, the bassist in the Spring Street Stompers pictured on the first page of last week's issue, as a respected teacher and coach at the school.

What they may not know, and your caption did not indicate, is that he is a member of the Williams Class of 1956 and a former president of that class both as an undergraduate and an alumnus.

Israel vs. PLO: some hands are cleaner than others

by James Better

In seeing Lebanon through the eyes of Dr. Chris Giannou the Williams audience was treated to a distortion of Middle East history. It is important to realize that Dr. Giannou worked for the Palestinian Red Crescent, an organization headed by Yassir Arafat's brother.

Beyond being a medical organization it is also inherently a political one. The Red Crescent was responsible for the wildly inflated casualty figures which were uncritically accepted during the early days of the war. Even these figures put civilian casualties at less than ten percent of the loss of civilian life which resulted from the preceding years of PLO, Syrian and Christian terror. Yet Dr. Giannou complained that Israel upset the "balance" that existed between the PLO, Syrians, and Christians in Lebanon prior to June 6. This balanced situation resulted in the deaths of over 100,000 people. Had Israel not altered the situation many more civilians would have fallen victim—probably without provoking much notice in the West. The civilian casualty issue has become a tool in the campaign to vilify

When the PLO murders babies in their nursery at the Misgav Am kibbutz, the PLO celebrates its "victory."

Israel rather than a genuine human rights issue.

Dr. Giannou brushed aside the past thirty-five years of Middle East history by saying that, in this conflict, "nobody's hands are clean . . . everyone is to blame." This truth obscures a greater one: some hands are bloodier than others, some people deserve a greater share of the blame. When atrocities like the refugee camp massacres occur, Israelis turn out in massive displays of anguish. When the PLO murders babies in their nursery at the Misgav Am kibbutz, the PLO celebrates its "victory." The wild celebrations following Anwar Sadat's assassination is the most recent example of this characteristic. These are the people Dr. Giannou says represent the Palestinian people. I think more highly of the Palestinians.

It is this kind of leadership that has resulted in the current misery of the Palestinians. Dr. Giannou said he believed in history, yet he casually ignores it. In 1947 the U.N. offered the Palestinians a state. The Arab nations, on behalf of the Palestinians, rejected this proposal and promised to kill the Jews. The PLO was formed in 1964—a time when the Arabs controlled the West Bank, Gaza, the Golan Heights, and East Jerusalem. The Arab commitment to a map without Israel resulted in the loss of these territories.

Now, an agreement exists which calls on Jordan and the Palestinians to negotiate the final status of the West Bank and Gaza. Israel has offered to talk with any Palestinians including members of the PLO if they dissociate themselves from that organization. This is a reasonable condition since there is little to talk about with people who are officially committed to your liquidation. Israel has been searching for partners for peace for thirty-four years. Except for Egypt, none have stepped forward. Despite Begin's intransigence, he could not withstand public pressure for a territorial compromise if the Palestinians made a sincere offer of peace.

Dr. Giannou further revealed his disregard for historical reality when he compared Israel's bombing of West Beirut to the slaughter of six million Jews during World War II. In World War II 7000 gunmen hijacked the capital of another country. The Israelis actively encouraged the civilian population to evacuate. In World War II six million innocent people were targeted for death by the Nazis. Dr. Giannou's obscene analogy was viciously perverse.

Lastly, Dr. Giannou scoffed at the notion that "war is peace." Is it necessary to remind him that the road to the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty began with the Yom Kippur War? The war in Lebanon has created unprecedented opportunities for peace both in Lebanon and in the Arab-Israeli conflict. In Lebanon there is the possibility that a strong central government will emerge and regain Lebanon's sovereignty. For the first time in twelve years there is a chance that Lebanon will be rid of foreign troops.

Israel has destroyed the PLO's military option and significantly weakened the rejectionist camp. Freed from fear of PLO terror, moderate Palestinians may now be able to step forward. Those of us who are interested in peace and in the rights of the Palestinians must recognize who the true obstacles to a settlement are. If King Hussein and the Palestinian leaders do not declare a readiness to negotiate peace, then the Palestinians are likely to be incorporated into a Greater Israel through Begin's annexationist policies. As David Pryce-Jones says in New Republic, "Then the Palestinian people will have paid in full for the faults of their leaders."

Sharing papers for free ideas

by Aileen Lachs

The Williams College Honor Code states very simply: "A student . . . agrees to respect and acknowledge the research and ideas of others in his or her work . . ." Whether or not we can recite this declaration from memory, it is certain that we have all signed our approval. What then prevents us, as students, from sharing the ideas we present on paper every week to four different professors?

Rosemary Tong, professor at Williams, reads on the average some one-hundred twenty papers each week, every year. And, like most professors, she repeats courses from year to year. Considering the number of professors and courses taught at Williams, by this time a wealth of opinion has surely accumulated . . . on the desks of our professors.

A student takes a total of twenty-four courses in the four years she/he is at Williams—we never repeat. No one has the time, and most people lack the funds, to remain at Williams long enough to take every course offered.

Taking courses is not the issue. Williams College already provides this facility—this method is already institutionalized. I am talking about paper-sharing—students hearing what students have to say. We lack such an institution.

We spend maybe a total of fifteen hours inside classrooms each week (where discussions are rarely the emphasis); the time outside of class is our own. We value this, and perhaps are overly protective of its private nature.

Such self-preservation keeps us, again closed within four walls. We bury ourselves in papers breathing only through thin spaces between the lines. This time is ours alone.

"Respecting . . . the research and ideas of others" is not like respecting someone's privacy. If published literature is available to a diverse, general public, why are so few papers circulated within a small and familiar community of students?

With the encouragement and assistance of members of the Feminist Alliance, students last year taking Rosemary Tong's course, Foundations of Feminist Thought, (a core course for the Women's Study Program) agreed to make available thirty of their papers for the benefit of other students.

Students . . . agreed to make available thirty of their papers for the benefit of other students.

Nada Velimirovic, a senior and member of the Williams Feminist Alliance, expressed her appreciation for this facility . . . "Just realizing that another student had come to similar conclusions, encouraged me to expand upon my own thoughts. Familiarizing myself with opinions of other students helped put the direction of my own thoughts into perspective on the subject. And I realized that there's no need to reinvent the wheel."

If you are involved in your own studies, another student's research and ideas may provide an excellent source of inspiration. If you feel trapped within a narrow major, other students' work may provide a creative outlet. If you stayed up writing a paper until four this morning, you probably feel exhausted. But, tell me, what did you write about?

. . . a lack of willingness to allow for Jewish culture and religious thought to be integrated in the Williams education.

culture has made in the fabric of civilization. Judaic studies is something the school should offer as a part of its educational curriculum and its lack, thereof, does not show the College's commitment to the idea of an active Jewish presence on campus.

It is in the interest of all that we work to eliminate these frustrating conditions that give rise to an anti-Semitic atmosphere. I don't charge that the Administration is personally anti-Jewish in any way; however, I urge the College to change the conditions that exist which are definitely anti-Jewish. It is time we come to the realization of the existence of an active Jewish presence at Williams and it is time for the school to take the right steps to eliminate present injustices that exist here.

The presently inadequate level of funding that the Jewish Association receives from the College is indicative of an anti-Semitic institutional condition. If the school is unwilling to provide for the religious, social, and cultural needs of a sig-

A look at Soviet future

by David Kleit

With Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev again reported to be in failing health, speculation over the identity of his successor or successors has increased in recent weeks. Jerry Hough, Professor of Political Science at Duke University, gave his view of the most probable outcome in his November 1 lecture, "Leadership in the Soviet Union: Succession to Brezhnev."

After prefacing his remarks by deemphasizing the importance of the personalities involved in the transition, Hough stated that Yuri Andropov, former head of the KGB, and Konstantin Chernenko, Brezhnev's protege, are the two most likely future Soviet leaders. "There will be collective leadership for the first years," he said, adding that it has always been that way in the past.

Reform school emerges

Predicting that reforms will follow the change in leaders, Hough noted that the current leadership has been in power for a long time, and has found it hard to change policies. He described both Andropov and Chernenko as reformers.

Concerning the Soviet military, Hough gave particular attention to the probable easing of tensions between China and the USSR, which he views as an opportunity for cuts in Soviet military spending and troop levels. He theorized that the Soviet military buildup was a response to border disputes with China.

Hough argued that contrary to the conventional viewpoint a USSR-China reconciliation is in the best interests of the United States because it could lead to a reduction in Soviet military spending.

After discussing the sizable role of the military in the Soviet economy, Hough considered that economy's problems. He thinks the basic problem is the government's policy to subsidize the production of items considered to be necessities.

Subsidies mean scarcity

According to Hough, the subsidies, which lower the price to the consumer, have resulted in scarcity, since supply cannot meet artificially inflated demand. He asserted that the current Soviet approach to the problem, which has been to increase production rather than raise prices, will never solve the problem while subsidies are in effect.

Arguing that "the situation is just not going to get any better," Hough suggested the use of price rises and higher wage inequality as two possible but unpopular solutions. Hough said that although reform of this kind would cause inflation, unemployment and inequality, without reform the Soviet economy would continue to decline.

Cut defense

Hough said Brezhnev simultaneously emphasized spending on defense, social programs, the agriculture sector and industry, adding that something had to give as a result, and so far it has been growth. He feels that, instead, "the obvious place to make a cut is the defense realm."

He also predicted that the Soviets will leave Afghanistan once Poland has quieted down.

CUL on life's essentials

Meeting deals with food and housing

by Brett McDonnell

The Committee on Undergraduate Life had relatively little to say last week to the College Council Ad-Hoc Committee on Student Housing Transfers concerning the Council's "lottery system" proposal, and referred it to the Housing Committee.

Bill Sawyer '85, chairman of the Ad-Hoc Committee, explained that the proposal, formulated in response to the CUL resolution of May 11, addressed two issues. First, "our priorities are based on justice and equity," he stated. Second, the proposal "recognizes the importance of freshman inclusion."

The lottery proposal essentially gives students who received their fourth or fifth choices in freshman inclusion top priority in the transfer process.

Several CUL members asked for ways to get more information to freshmen about inclusion, one of the Council representatives' prime concerns, but few suggestions were forthcoming.

Dean Cris Roosenraad, chairman of the CUL, immediately referred the proposal to the Housing Committee, noting, "It seems to me that it should be discussed by those who would have to implement the proposal as house presidents." Roosenraad also said that at future meetings the CUL will discuss broader aspects of transfer policy.

The CUL also discussed Food Service billing policy. Geoff Mamiet '83 suggested billing students on the basis of meals that they actually ate, rather than the current meal plans. Roosenraad and Jill Nassivera of the Theatre Department replied that this would raise costs as Food Service would not know how much food to prepare for each meal.

Racism rampant

The number of cases filed by the department in housing has dropped from the '69-'78 annual average of 32 cases to the present two cases since Reagan took office.

In education, the government has "sanctioned or condoned blatant discrimination" by reactivating the principle of separate but equal, said Chambers. He cited several cases in which states have ignored guidelines for higher education and a prohibition of state laws outlawing busing which had been established in the 70's. Not one case has been filed concerning school desegregation.

Racism still with us

Chambers also noted that the Justice Department has recently ignored formerly enforced statutes concerning illegal discriminatory employment practices. He said that some university affirmative action policies may now only require minorities in their employment applicant pools rather than require that these minorities be hired.

"The Reagan administration has caused minorities to realize that racism is still with us. It has helped us appreciate that we differ about the programs and remedies we support," he said.

Chambers has accepted an offer to teach a civil rights course at Harvard Law School, which he feels has "failed miserably in hiring minority faculty members and in accepting minority students." Chambers emphasized two related problems at the law school: the fact that black students are less interested in public interest or civil rights litigation because it provides a lower salary than corporate law; and the difficulty of choosing which minority faculty candidate (black, Hispanic or Asian, for example) should receive hiring priority.

Finally, Chambers emphasized that the black community's "healthy diversity" has grown into a more pronounced division. "I had hoped that organizations appreciating the need for working together would be able to put their differences behind them." The recent NAACP-NAACP Legal Defense Fund dispute suggests that black leaders have been unable to reconcile their differences. Chambers concluded with an appeal to minority group solidarity: "We all are searching for a remedy. We will learn to appreciate that there is diversity even among those of the same color and same views, and we will learn to accommodate that diversity to make a better America."

College, town: a 'beautiful' relationship

The sign at the intersection of Route 2 and Spring Street boasts "Williamstown: The Village Beautiful—Post Office, Free Parking." Is this what Thoreau meant when he said about Williams "it would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain?"

College handbooks and catalogues across the country exalt Williams-town's idyllic rural paradise of rolling farmland beneath our familiar purple mountains. Beauty abounds; the whole place emanates a certain quaintness.

Williamstown: more than meets the eye

"If we could pick up the College and take it away tomorrow, Williamstown could not survive economically," says town Manager Howard Redfern. Although the College may not run the town, it is its bread-and-butter.

The College, with 700 employees, is the largest employer in town. Its annual payroll is $12.5 million. According to a College News Office estimate, $7.7 million more is earned by some 1200 other townspeople who don't work directly for the College but make their living because of it.

Also, the roughly 500 Williams employees who live in Williamstown pay some $650,000 in property taxes to the town annually. By law, no property taxes can be levied on any of the land Williams uses for educational purposes (which includes administration and dormitory buildings), but the College does pay $120,000 a year in property taxes on the property it owns on the eastern side of Spring Street (which includes all of the buildings from Route 2 down to the Log, except the Post Office.)

Ransom Jenks, director of security at Williams and a town Selectman, said some townspeople think the College ought to be taxed on all its property. "But for what it loses in property taxes," he summarized, "I think the students and faculty bring in a greater amount of revenue and employment."

"Microcosm of society"
The College may be the town's biggest economic force, but it is not the only one. Chemistry professor Bill Moomaw points out that in Williamstown there are also three factories, seven dairy farms, four other commercial farms, a large tourist industry and 8000 non-student citizens.

"Most students come from the suburbs; Williamstown is not a suburb," Moomaw said. "It's a fairly complex community. It has its own integrity—it's authentic." He suggests that students should learn more about the town. "There's a lot they're missing in their life education by not looking at this community . . . Williamstown is a microcosm of the larger society."

Although Williamstown has more than meets the eye, it remains an affluent town. "We're seeing an influx of well-to-do people buying big

'Town meeting' government in Williamstown

Power seated in old fraternity house

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

Although few Williams students come in contact with it, Williamstown's local government, headed by the Board of Selectmen, keeps municipal services running smoothly and attracts active participation from volunteer townspeople.

New England towns have a long tradition of "town meeting" government, under which the entire town meets annually to decide democratically its budget and priorities for the coming year. The job of administration which is usually performed by a mayor in other parts of the country is done by the Board of Selectmen here in Williamstown. There are four Selectmen, who are elected to three-year, non-salaried terms. Ransom Jenks, director of security at Williams, is one of the Selectmen.

As towns in New England have grown, so have the complexities of administration. Some towns, including Williamstown, have hired a full-time, paid town manager to execute the town's day-to-day administration. Williamstown's town manager since July 1981 has been Howard Redfern, formerly mayor of Chicopee, a town in southern Massachusetts. Redfern was appointed by the Selectmen, not elected, and reports directly to them.

"Honorary post"

Other elected officials include the two separate school boards, one for the elementary schools and one for the regional high school; and the town moderator, which Williamstown Advocate editor Lauren Stevens called "a somewhat honorary post." The moderator runs the annual town meeting and appoints the members of the Finance Committee.

The Finance Committee, which consists of nine volunteer members, does the nuts-and-bolts studies on costs and funding and suggests how much should be budgeted to the various town departments.

The rest of the posts on the various town committees and departments are appointed by the Selectmen, in the case of the Planning and Zoning Boards, or by the town manager, for the jobs of police chief, assessor and tax collector, among others.

Municipal building bar

The town government is housed in the Municipal Building, which is located on North Street, across the street from the Greylock quad. The building used to be a Williams fraternity; when fraternities were abolished in 1964 its owners refused to allow the building to be sold to the College, since it would have been used as a dorm. So it was sold to the town instead.

Redfern noted that alumni still bring their families back to visit the building, even though the interior of their former stomping grounds has been greatly changed. But some vestiges of the old days remain: "We're probably the only municipal building in Massachusetts with a bar in the basement," he noted.

And perhaps they need it in contending with today's major municipal headache in Massachusetts, Proposition 2½. By approving this measure, which was part of the national tax-rebellion of a few years ago, Massachusetts voters limited property taxes to 2½ percent of the assessed value of the real estate, statewide. Towns over that limit had to cut back on the rate of taxation at a fairly drastic rate: at least 15 percent a year over 3 years. Towns under the limit may increase their tax rate up to 2½, but the rate at which they may do so is also restricted.

Proposition 2½ hurts

Redfern explained that this hurts cities and towns which were far over or under the limit, or which have declining property values. It has also hurt school districts, especially in urban areas, whose governments tend to put basic services like police and firemen ahead of educational programs.

Williamstown is doing better than most towns in the Berkshires, Redfern said, because property values are not declining, population is slowly increasing and it has "a sizeable amount of free cash." Also, the town's tax rate was below, but close to, 2½ percent before the measure was passed.

Stevens says the town is adequately meeting its municipal needs, including recent repairs on sewage and water pipes, and on roads. The town is also making progress on its landfill problem—where to put processed sewage waste. Landfills usually become unusable soft ground; the town has been experimenting with composting, which involves mixing wood chips and garbage into the waste to shrink its volume.

With roughly three-fifths of Williamstown's $5 million annual budget going to the public schools, education is a major concern of townspeople. There are two separate school districts because Williamstown has its own elementary schools but shares Mount Greylock Regional High School with the town of Lanesboro, to the south.

Too many districts

Over-staffing results, Stevens said, but it is a very political question whether those extra jobs should be eliminated through a unification of the school districts. On the other hand, Williamstown has too few students to have its own high school; as compared to Greylock, a smaller high school "would reduce the variety and quality of education," Stevens added.

"Probably the only municipal building in Massachusetts with a bar in the basement."

Another of Proposition 2½'s measures was to take away fiscal autonomy from local school boards. Formerly, town governments were legally bound to accept school budgets as submitted; now budgets can be challenged and changed.

At Mount Greylock this has resulted in some cuts in materials, maintenance and field trips. But Redfern maintains that the community "is very pro-education" and that cuts here have not been as drastic as elsewhere.

Another problem the school boards face is declining enrollment. The town is increasing in population, but mostly in the elderly age bracket. Student numbers are falling; Mount Greylock now has less than 1000 students from both towns. And according to Stevens, "It's hard to whip up enthusiasm to plan for declining enrollment."

"Greylock Country Day"

But, he added, the overall quality of education in town is good. Mount Greylock, which is referred to by some as "Greylock Country Day,"

Faculty expertise brought to town

by Michael Govan

"There is a long tradition of Williams faculty being involved in town affairs," says Chemistry professor Bill Moomaw. A number of faculty and administration members, including Moomaw, bring their enthusiasm and experience to the Williamstown community.

Some such as Mac Brown (Political Science), George Goethals (Psychology), and William Reed (Treasurer) have been directly involved in local education issues as members of school boards and parents committees. Norman Petersen of the Religion Department is the current chairman of the Mount Greylock Regional School District Board, which includes both Williamstown and Lanesboro.

Petersen became involved because, like many other professors, he has children in local schools. He said that "most faculty involvement in the community is on school committees," as faculty generally are "sensitive to educational issues." Three of four recent chairmen of the school board have been from the Williams faculty. Petersen attributes this to their experience; as faculty "we live by the committee system," he said.

Particular expertise

The Williams Faculty "definitely bring an expertise and an interest to the town," said William Reed, College Treasurer. Although he has been in Williamstown only 15 months, Reed and his wife are currently co-presidents of the Mount Greylock School Community Association, a kind of Williamstown PTA. They have two children in school in the town. "Faculty get involved because it's their community," said Reed.

Besides education, faculty are also involved in an advisory capacity in issues of environment and development. Among them are Jack MacFayden (Geology), and Bill Moomaw. Moomaw has been an "informal advisor" to the town and been involved in dozens of issues since he came here in the mid-sixties.

In one case, he advised the town when it was working to comply with Federal Clean Water laws. Currently he is involved in plans to clean up Cole Spring Road. "People with a particular expertise are called upon by the town," said Moomaw.

Asked if "expert advice" was always well taken, Moomaw admitted that his "views are not always appreciated . . . sometimes faculty can be troublesome meddlers." Town Manager Howard Redfern said that the town has had "nothing but good relations" with Williams faculty. "It is fortunate," he said, "that they are willing to contribute . . . they're ready and willing."

More contemplative

Moomaw became so involved in town affairs because he realized "issues that affect me more on a day to day basis are local ones—not what goes on in Washington. The individual has more of an opportunity to affect these issues on the local level . . . there's a satisfaction in being involved in these decisions," he said.

He explained that there isn't more faculty involvement because "a lot of faculty are not activists; they're more contemplative. In an 'academic' community there is a tendency to focus on national and international issues." Petersen attributed lower faculty involvement to the fact that "they don't want to play a disproportionate role" in the community. "Most faculty don't want to get involved because they don't want to disturb."

Concerning his relations with townspeople on various committees, Moomaw said he did not have any problems: "people didn't think of me as someone from the College." Petersen, however, did note that on occasion townspeople do exercise some caution towards faculty involved in town affairs. "Other board members are more aware than I am of my affiliation with Williams," he said. He attributed this to a "transiency" of a faculty position, an almost "dangerous independence."

"The College has always kept its doors open."

Service Council: 'understanding people'

by Christian K. Howlett

For nearly one out of every ten students, life at Williams includes volunteer work with one of the programs in the Lehman Service Council. Comprised of 200 students, the council is the largest campus organization. Volunteers work with members of the community, from pre-school children to elderly shut-ins, in a variety of ways.

The main focus of all Lehman Service Council programs is developing individual relationships with very different people, helping them and learning in the process. All of the leaders of the council stressed the outside perspective working with these people gives them in contrast to the somewhat closed world of college where work may seem all-important.

The council includes ten different service programs. The amount of time volunteers put in, "really varies according to your schedule and how much time you have personally," said Council chairman Debbie Joselow '84. The council prescribes a minimum of three hours a week, which most students do in one afternoon or evening.

Almost half of the students involved in the Lehman Service Council work in the Big Brother/Big Sister program, the most popular and well-known of the council's activities.

Movies, football, skating

Students are matched with elementary or junior high school kids who have been recommended by their parents or teachers. Often the children have working parents, emotional or discipline problems, or for any other reason just need someone to talk to and spend time with.

The program is unstructured in that, after the initial

"Most of us will never have to suffer the way these people do."

matching, the students are basically on their own. They visit their little brothers or sisters as often as possible and do various things with them, such as going to movies, football games, ice skating, etc. Students often bring their kids to dinner at the college. Periodically, the entire group will meet for parties, such as the Halloween party held last week.

Another group in the council works with young people at the Berkshire Farm for Boys, a residential treatment center for teen-aged boys who have been labeled juvenile delinquents or are simply in need of supervision.

At the other end of the spectrum, several students travel weekly to the nearby Sweetbrook Nursing Home to visit lonely senior citizens. The students spend afternoons talking with residents and wheeling them around; one student is helping several learn to paint. In addition, the students help organize and run parties for about 40 residents. "They love the attention," Sweetbrook activities coordinator Abbie Hatton said. "They love to see young people, they always say."

Another program which deals with senior citizens has been nicknamed "adopt-a-grandparent." Students visit elderly shut-ins and help them with everyday things such as shopping and yard work. Students often develop a very close, one-to-one rapport with the senior citizens they visit.

Other activities Lehman Service Council volunteers participate in include hydrotherapy at the North Adams YMCA in which students work in the swimming pool with children who have birth defects; the Williamstown Youth Center, formerly the Boys' Club, where students act as coaches, supervisors and buddies; and the Williamstown Day Care Center at the Congregational Church.

A better chance

Students who are especially career-oriented often work as volunteers in the emergency room at the North Adams Regional Hospital, at the Berkshire Farm For Boys or at the ABC (A Better Chance) house on Hoxsey Street. ABC is a national organization which takes promising inner-city children and gives them a chance in better environments and schools. A number of kids attending Mount Greylock Regional High School live at the ABC house and Williams students work there as tutors.

One program within the council which requires an extensive training program is the Help Line, a 24-hour crisis counseling hotline. Students who have completed the several week training program find themselves dealing with everything from intended suicides to drug abuse, aging, loneliness, etc.

Joselow expressed her experience in volunteer work this way: "Most of us in our lives will never have to suffer the way these people do. It sounds kind of corny to say, but I really believe most of the world's evils come from people not understanding each other. If you develop that understanding now, maybe you'll take it with you when you leave this place and infuse it into everything you do."

College, town: a 'beautiful' relationship— 'More than meets the eye'—

So, is this rural college kingdom really paradise? Well, perhaps not literally, but as small college atmospheres go, it's pretty close. One might point to incidents of vandalism or occasional complaints about noise, but beyond that even the resourceful reporter is hard-pressed to dig up friction, scandal and the like. Town-College relations seem rarely, if ever, under duress. Town Manager Howard Redfern, said plainly, "I can't think of any real problems."

"Of course, there are certain people who are against everything," said Billy Paradise, owner of the Williams Newsroom on Spring Street, "but I don't think you could find a better college town."

No snobbery

Paradise grew up in Williamstown. He went to high school here in town. "I grew up with the students," he said. "I molded my life after them. I dress like they do, or like they used to. I really enjoy it. It's never been a snobbish place."

"I went away for awhile, but I came back. I brought my kids here. It's a good place," Paradise was offered the chance to attend Williams, but he opted not to go to college.

No one denies that Williams overwhelms the town. The college is Williamstown's livelihood. But very few of the common "town/gown" tensions are present here. Williams people and townspeople offer several reasons for this.

Howard Redfern explained, "if we do have problems, the College handles it very professionally. We work together. There is not a single issue we haven't resolved."

"Company town"

Norman Petersen, professor of religion and chairman of the Mount Greylock Regional School Board, pointed to "a mutual sensitivity between town and College to the danger of Williamstown being a 'company town.'" Arguments in town, he said, "don't take place over Town-College lines.

"While the College does have a vested interest in 'the Village Beautiful' in order to attract new faculty to Williamstown," Petersen said, "the College has never, to my knowledge, tried to control what the town does."

"The College has always kept its doors open," he added, referring to the Faculty Club, athletic facilities, Hopkins Forest, and the golf course. Townspeople also benefit from the College's many entertainment, sporting and cultural events, noted Lauren Stevens, editor of the Williamstown Advocate and formerly a dean at Williams.

Many cited the physical integration of the College and the town as a reason for good relations. "It's hard to tell where the College's campus stops and the town begins," Stevens said. "The College and town mingle. There could be battle lines drawn otherwise."

Noise control

Another reason for the good relations is the understanding the college and town have attained on discipline and noise control problems.

"We've never had an unreasonable complaint," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. The town government has never formally complained to him about noise. According to Redfern, it hasn't had to; the problem always seems to be resolved within the College by Security, he said.

"There's a definite understanding between the College and town administrations," Redfern explained. Town Police will respond if Security asks it to, but usually Security doesn't have to go back a second time. Most of the credit for the College's cooperation goes to the students, Redfern stated. "10 or 15 Security personnel can't police 2000 students," he observed. "They're generally very responsible."

Knowing the law

The town also notifies the College whenever a student is arrested. Stevens noted that

The familiar sign at the intersection of Route 2 and Spring Street, boasting Williamstown's major attractions: "Post Office, Free Parking."

incidents like the Kings liquor store break-in are very rare. Redfern, asked whether it's true that Williamstown police selectively enforce the law, favoring Williams students, responded "I wouldn't say that; we just try to be reasonable. The town doesn't try to harass Williams students. But we don't have a choice in responding to complaints."

Redfern speculated that many Williams students are unfamiliar with Massachusetts law because they are from out-of-state, and need to be aware of the penalties for certain offenses. For example, there are mandatory jail sentences for the first offense of driving while intoxicated and for possession of a handgun without a permit.

Stevens doesn't think townspeople resent students for not being more involved in the town affairs. He says townspeople are proud of Williamstown and are eager to meet students and get them involved in the community. But he admitted there's also some resentment of "well-heeled college kids."

session of a handgun without a permit.

"Well-heeled college kids"

According to Redfern there is a higher level of college participation in town affairs in Williamstown than in other college towns. "I don't know how many townspeople know of student involvement in the community. . . they might say they're not involved at all," he said.

Jenks called the measure, which marks the first time this law has been applied in Berkshire County, "one of the biggest town successes of the last three or four years."

properties," said Williamstown Advocate editor Lauren Stevens. Taxes and property values here are low compared to big city areas, and combined with good municipal service and the College, there's a lot offered to prospective buyers, he said.

Other tracts of property have maintained their size through being sold to private schools, such as the Highcroft and Pine Cobble Schools. Stevens said that schools are a type of "clean industry" well-suited to Williamstown because they do not change its "essential nature."

Farm preservation

The town is trying to maintain its physical appearance and traditional vistas by preventing large developers from buying up farmland. The Stone Hill property was saved from such a fate last year when it was sold to a Williams alumnus who has agreed to keep it as is.

And the Langor property, the land sprawling on either sides of and in between Routes 7 and 43 down by Steele's Corner, which Stevens described as "the gateway to Williamstown," has been established permanently as farmland under the Massachusetts Farm Preservation Act. The state pays a farmer the difference between his land's value as farmland and what it would sell to a developer. The land's deed is then established as for farming only; the land can be sold, but at reduced, farmland-rates, and only to another farmer.

Jenks called the measure, which marks the first time this law has been applied in Berkshire County, "one of the biggest town successes of the last three or four years."

Ephs vs. Jeffs: a wild rivalry

All Williams graduates leave the Purple Valley with two things: a diploma and an undying hatred of Amherst. It was loathe at first sight because of the peculiar nature of Amherst's beginnings, and the rivalry has taken on epic characteristics that distinguish it from other lesser animosities.

Williams first met the Defectors of 1821 on the playing field in 1859 in the first intercollegiate baseball game ever played. After 4 hours and 26 innings, Amherst walked away with a 73-32 victory amid allegations that the Amherst pitcher was a blacksmith who had been hired for the game.

The Ephmen tried football in 1884 and topped Amherst 15 to 2. The next year they whipped Amherst 57-0. Ever since, football has been the prime point of contention between the two schools.

License for damage

Not content to leave the rivalry on the football field, Williams and Amherst students soon took the annual match-up as a license to inflict as much damage as possible on one another.

Williams men focused on Sabrina, the "Lady of Bronze." The governor of Massachusetts donated this statue of a river goddess to Amherst in 1857, and Amherst men were immediately attracted to her.

"She sits, half-turning on a bronze pedestal, one limb tucked under the other, resting on one arm, the other extending amiably, her face beautiful . . ." raved official Sabrina biographer Max Shoop. In short, she was one of the few women who wouldn't run from Amherst men.

Tossed into a well

She received many coats of paint from Williams students, and occasionally made her way to the Purple Valley. After the Amherst Class of 1883 tossed her into a well to celebrate a victory over Williams in baseball, she was condemned by the president of Amherst. Saved by valiant Amherst students, she spent the next few decades in seclusion. Her most notable public appearance occurred in the summer of 1888, which she spent in the Connecticut River.

In the 1920's or so she returned to her rightful position on the Amherst campus. So powerful was her allure that the Amherst teams were called the Sabrinas (at least by Williams).

Ska beaten in experiment

by Brett McDonnell

England seems to produce a new musical trend every six or seven weeks. A few years ago, ska was the in thing. Probably the best album to come out of this revival of Jamaican pre-reggae music was "I Just Can't Stop It" by the English Beat.

The Beat have recently released their third album, "Special Beat Service." This disc, though, wanders far from the ska sound. Can you imagine a reggae song with banjo? How about the combination of ska and accordion? Viola? Mandolin?

One brilliant moment

They're all here on "Special Beat Service." This album has one brilliant moment—"Save It For Later." Tugging melody, a jangly guitar, corny violins, a sneaky viola line and an intermittent punching sax combine to make this a moving and memorable number.

There are many pleasant moments on "Special Beat Service." Pleasant, indeed, describes the whole album, which is why Williams students ought to like it so much. "I Confess" has some good vocal work. "Ackee 1 2 3" is fun, but the lyrics! "Someone just smiled for no special reason/It looks like the smile's come back into season/It's so easy"?!? Give me a break.

Passable political statement
These guys used to write intelligent songs—they were even political. "Sugar and Stress" has to pass for the grand political statement on this album—"This world is upside down, the rights and wrong don't get much wronger/Mistakes found in the past turn into rules protecting power." That's OK as far as it goes, but The Clash it ain't. I appreciate The Beat's decision to experiment, but I think it may have backfired on them. Not only are the lyrics weak, but much of the music is laid-back and not particularly danceable. For a party band, that spells disaster.

Good, slick, catchy pop

Don't get me wrong. I like this album. Even the most cynical among us can be caught by good, slick, catchy pop, which is what "Special Beat Service" boils down to. Still, I advise the ska neophyte to start with "I Just Can't Stop It." Even better, if you want the best of late-stage ska, get the "Ghost Town" EP by The Specials—a haunting and compelling title song. The Beat are still a good band, and they're excellent in concert, but they haven't lived up to their original promise. By all odds, they are now ready to make it big on FM radio and the Williams College campus.

Players lack balance

by Greg Capaldini

The Chester String Quartet appeared last Tuesday at Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, marking the first concert in the Young Artists Series. The Quartet is part of the resident faculty at the University of Indiana at South Bend, and its members are quite young.

The major offering on the program was an ambitious choice, Ravel's Quartet in F (1903). This work is a test of musicianship for even the best of ensembles. Though Ravel uses Classical Era form and textures, his music sounds somewhat free, pretending to make itself up as it proceeds. As in Mozart, intense but graceful stylization is the controlling device.

The real accomplishment of the evening was the taut and energetic reading of Bartok's Quartet #3 (1927). This work juxtaposes abstract and traditional (folk-line, really) elements, and throws in a smorgasbord of modern bowing and pizzicato (plucking) effects. Bartok's redeeming quality, in the eyes of new-music-haters, is the kinetic, dance-like quality of his fast sections. This quality was attractively emphasized by the players.

Too much romance
Mozart's early Quartet in C, K.157, which began the program, came out over-romanticized. Long phrases, un-called-for nuances, and a consistent focus on individual melody lines resulted in a distinctly un-Mozartean product. When 18th-century music gets too smooth and creamy, it sags like a wet graham cracker.

Throughout the evening, balance seemed to be a problem, especially with the inexplicably unresonant cello. We found out later that the instrument in question was in disrepair due to the various climates it experienced on a recent tour. This probably put the group at a disadvantage at this performance, but such experience early in one's career can be useful later on.

Pass/Fail option discussed

House representatives reported a split in opinion among students regarding the advisability of providing a Pass/Fail option for some Williams courses at last Tuesday's College Council Meeting.

Prospect Rep. Jonathan Labaree '85 claimed some students supported a P/F option, but only for two or three courses out of the 32 required for a Williams degree. Others claimed that students would never work as hard if "C" work was equivalent to "A" work in the registrar's eyes. A suggestion was also made that Williams follow the lead of schools such as Swarthmore and MIT by having the first semester of freshman year be totally Pass/Fail. Both proposals will be studied further.

In other business, several council members suggested "Social Interaction" as a possible topic for a campus-wide seminar this January. CC President Stuart Robinson '83 also reported on a possible exchange with the student government of RPI to get an indication of how other campuses are run. Finally, he urged Council members to be more prompt since this meeting was delayed by forty minutes for lack of a quorum.

It means that someone is forced to accept less, and it's turned out to be languages . . . We just have to try to make the best of it," said Chick.

New access center

Chairman of the Russian Department Michael Katz had a different view, noting that Weston is "sentimental, but with the center of campus shifting to Sawyer and Stetson over the last few years, benefits can come from the move. We will be closer to our colleagues and to the students. Also, the center is being redesigned to our specifications by an architect." Katz is one of only four language professors who still maintain their offices in Weston.

Referring to the News and Alumni offices which will move to Weston, Reed said, "I think if they had their druthers they would stay where they are, but I think they recognize the advantages of their new location." Reed visualized a "new access center" now that the Alumni, News, and Admissions offices and the Alumni Center are all located in the same area of the campus.

four SMU shots to guarantee the victory.

In action earlier in the week, Williams enjoyed a breather against Siena, winning by a 6-0 count. Sutton scored twice and Doug McKenney '85, Marty White '83, Jeff McEvoy '86, and pesky supersub Austin Lehr '83 added single tallies. The Ephs dominated the game, outshooting Siena 24-9. Freshmen Erik Knutzen and Chris Clarey combined for the shutout. Russo gave Murphy (charley horse) and Rhodes (pneumonia) the day off to recover from injuries.

The Cardinals outshot the Ephs by an 18-7 margin. Limping Williams goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 racked up 11 saves for the win.

Beyond overtime at SMU

The gritty performance by the Ephs followed on the heels of a win in the opening round of the ECAC tournament on Friday. Played at Southeastern Massachusetts University, Williams emerged with a 2-1 victory in a grueling contest which was decided on penalty kicks.

SMU opened the scoring when Mike Long knocked home a ball only 7:28 into the match. The Ephs came back to tie, however, as Jeff Sutton '83 registered (many thanks to Tom Lynch '83) his third goal of the week and tenth of the season at 20:31. The two teams exhausted the remainder of regulation and two ten-minute overtimes without further scoring to set up a dramatic finish.

Seniors Rob Kusel, Kris Strohbehn, and Sutton all got their penalty kicks past SMU keeper Fred Robinovitz, while Murphy saved three of the first

THE LOOB

Last-second pass brings Homecoming victory

by Steven H. Epstein

Providing what Coach Bob Odell described as "a pure miracle," the Williams football team rose from the dead Saturday to defeat the Wesleyan Cardinals 27-24.

A four-play drive in the final 23 seconds of the game culminated in a B.J. Connolly to Marc Hummon 33-yard touchdown pass to snatch victory from the beaks of the stunned Cardinals. Said Odell, "I've never won a game like that in 35 years of coaching. To say I was thrilled would be an understatement."

The victory, before a large Homecoming crowd, sets up a showdown next week at Amherst for the Little Three title.

The Ephs seemed destined to lose, after leading by two touchdowns throughout much of the game. A second half rally saw Wesleyan go to the airwaves, as junior quarterback Dan Ross led the Cards to 17 unanswered second half points to place the Cardinals in the lead on the strength of a field goal which followed an interception with just under 4:00 to go.

Do the impossible

Trailing for the first time in the contest 24-21, the Ephs had just 23 seconds left to do the impossible. After an incomplete pass from his own 18 yard line, quarterback B. J. Connolly (7-12-201, 2 TDs) recovered his own fumble and was speared by a Wesleyan defender. The ensuing penalty gave the Ephs a first down on their own 33. They had 67 yards to go and only 0:12 in which to do it.

Showing far more confidence than the throngs who were filing out of Weston Field, Connolly led the team toward paydirt on two plays, picking up his Christmas present a bit early. With good protection from his line the poised junior QB found "all-everything" Marc Hummon (5 receptions, 150 yards, 2 TDs, threw one pass, and played some defense as well) for a 34-yard completion. Hummon split the seams between five Cardinal defenders and gave the Ephs a final shot from the Wesleyan 33 with just four ticks left on the clock.

The miracle play

The final play was nothing short of incredible. Connolly faded to pass and was rushed heavily by a Wesleyan lineman. Inches from a game-ending sack, Connolly, off-balance, evaded his opponent with help from lineman Bernie Krause, who either picked Connolly up to his feet or set an NBA-style pick which allowed Connolly to get free and throw. An instant later, Hummon was open at the 7-yard line. He tucked the ball home and won the race into the end zone by inches, leaving a stunned Cardinal contingent wondering if the most powerful force of all might be a Williams alum.

Hummon commented after the game that it was his biggest thrill as an athlete. "It was a great way to end it," he said after being removed from the pile of humanity (players and fans) who covered him after the victory. Asked if he was confident that the Ephs could pull it out he said, "I really thought we had a shot, even with so little time left. I said the Lord's Prayer as we broke the huddle and then I just tried to get open."

For his spectacular play, Hummon received the "Golden Helmet Award" from the New England Sportswriters Association at a Boston luncheon today.

Chandler's reaction

Coach Renzi Lamb called the victory, "The kind of moment in sports that Cardinal defenders grab hold of Junior Sean Crotty. Wesleyan, however, could not hold on to the game, as the Ephs stormed back, 27-24. (Farley) comes along every 10 or 15 years." President John Chandler was as ecstatic as any Ephs football fan after the game ended. "It was very pleasing not only to see the players win the game," said Chandler, "but to see the outpouring of affection from both students and alumni after the game ended."

The Ephs got on the board twice early in the first period, manhandling Wesleyan offensively and defensively. The Ephs scored on their second and third possessions of the game, thanks largely to the rushing skills of Ted Thomas (115 yards, 18 carries, all in the first half) and the offensive line, who created holes big enough for even this reporter to run through.

The first score came on an out pass from Connolly to Hummon, which the day's hero broke for a 44-yard gain and his first TD of the day. On their next possession it took five plays for the Ephs to march 63 yards, all on the ground. Sean Crotty scored on a 17-yard run to make it 14-0 at halftime.

The first miracle pass

After a Wesleyan score made it 14-7, Connolly completed the first of two miracle TD passes on the day. In the grasp of a Wesleyan lineman, Connolly found tight end Mark Pine for a 60-yard completion which brought the margin back to two touchdowns. The Ephs' lead seemed insurmountable with just over 22 minutes to play.

Wesleyan, however, opened up its passing attack and gained back an advantage over the Ephs with less than a minute to go, setting up the final heroics.

Lord Jeffs next week

by John Clayton and Chris Harned

Coming into the homestretch of the fall season, the football, soccer, and rugby teams have chances to win Little Three Titles, while the cross-country teams travel to Boston for the New England Division III Championships.

The gridders, coming off their emotional last-second victory over Wesleyan, are in search of their eleventh Little Three Championship in the last twelve years.

But getting that championship won't be easy. The Lord Jeffs are 6-1 this year, their only loss a 16-14 defeat by Middlebury.

The Lord Jeffs are led by quarterback Brian Curran and fullback Mark Vendetti. Curran's status is questionable—he received a hyperextended elbow last weekend in their 14-0 victory over Trinity.

The Ephs will look to fullback Ted Thomas to establish a ground game and complement that with Connolly's aerial show. "I look for a great game," said Coach Bob Odell. "We'll make the fur fly."

The soccer team will be in a grudge match as Amherst defeated them for the ECAC title. They are finally resting after a busy weekend of games.

Men's cross-country coach Peter Farwell said he is looking for "the best meet of the season. We should have all seven of our top runners healthy."

The women's team also hopes to put the icing on the Little Three championship cake with a good showing at the Championships.

Soccer wins two, not Amherst

by Dave Woodworth and Dan Keating

Flirting with glory but finishing with grief, the men's soccer team completed a flurry of games Sunday with a 2-1 sudden-death overtime loss to Amherst in the championship game of the East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) tournament. The game was the third in three days for the Ephs. Williams dispatched Southeastern Massachusetts University 2-1 in Friday's opening round of the ECAC tourney and overcame Wesleyan 1-0 Saturday in the first leg of the Little Three.

Williams (10-4-1) will get another chance at Amherst (10-1-1) this Saturday when the Ephs complete their regular season at Amherst in a game that will decide the Little Three title. The two-game two-championship series provides Williams with an opportunity to avenge Sunday's loss.

The Lord Jeffs went ahead 1-0 only 2:56 into the game when constant offensive pressure resulted in a goal by Rob Ostburg. Amherst continued to control the game through the first ten minutes, but failed to register any further score.

Sophomore goalie Ken Rhodes was commended by Coach Mike Russo for keeping the Ephs in the contest. Rhodes' performance came on the heels of a bout with pneumonia which kept him out of all action for a week and a half.

Ephs tie it up

Williams evened the score late in the second half with a goal from Doug McKenney '85. The goal came off a free kick by Rob Kusel '83 which McKenney headed into the near-post corner. The score came at 7:41. Williams controlled the tempo through most of the second half, but stingy defense prevailed, leaving the score 1-1 at the end of regulation time.

Amherst gained the momentum early in the overtime period and ended the game in less than four minutes. The winning goal came on a ball that Williams failed to clear from the penalty area despite opportunities to do so. John Steele scored the goal unassisted. Russo felt that both teams played particularly well and that either team could have won.

The Wesleyan match was bitter and hard-fought throughout, with several Wesleyan men receiving yellow cards for dangerous play or misconduct, and a number of players on both sides being injured as a result of overaggressive play.

The only goal of the match came at 76:20 when Dan Aramini '84 drilled a direct kick

RPI rugby eaten alive

by Bert Salisbury

On a gusty and cold Cole Field the rugby club faced R.P.I. last Saturday and was victorious in both matches; A-side 16-7 and B-side 15-0.

In the first match, the A-side scrum dominated and provided a lot of ball for the line to run with. Joe Carey '84 put the first try over from a maul set up by Jim Steggall '83 and Bill Donovan '83. Eric Russell '84 then shone through and scored two more.

Captain Dave Park '83 had a great game at fullback both kicking and running with the line. Dixon Pike '83 punished the R.P.I. defense all game and set up the second Joe Carey try with a long run. During the second Joe Carey try with a long run. During the second half, Williams was put more on the defensive, which allowed R.P.I. to score 7 points.

B-side wins too

B-side fared as well with a 15-0 shutout. With the Williams defense never letting up, the line proceeded to score. Larry Hebb '83 put down the first try from a nice Jim Bell '84 pop kick. Bill Best '83 was then able to connect for a field goal and three more points.

John Dagnello '85 had an intense game and never gave the R.P.I. scrum-half a chance. Mark Evans '85 showed his running ability in a great game and a try of his aim. The scrum also had a great day. John May '84 scored a try on a 20 meter romp disregarding the clinging R.P.I. ruggers, and Rich Weber '83 also played well with runs that were unprecedented.

Transfer inclusion must wait

Frosh get first pick

Freshman inclusion will take priority over inter-house transfers following unanimous Committee on Undergraduate Life approval of its transfer policy last Tuesday.

"Freshmen should have number one priority in anything if we are aiming to have them in (one house) for three years," asserted Heldt Coggeshall '84, Student Housing Committee Co-Chairman.

Under the new policy, inter-house transfer applicants will be pulled from their current houses, leaving those rooms open for freshman inclusion. After all freshmen are included, inter-house transfers will be reincluded in the remaining rooms. Dean Cris Roosenraad said he hopes to have the new plan in effect for this spring's inclusion.

Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta noted that the new system is not a major departure from last year's inclusion process. For the 1982 inclusion, transfers were included before freshmen but a number of rooms were reserved for freshmen before any inclusion began.

Roosenraad allayed the concern of some CUL members that certain houses would face "a crush of freshmen," as CUL member Jonathan Light '83 described it. Since 35 percent of each house's presidents must come from the freshman class, these minimum limits would prevent an "enormous swarm" to a specific house, Roosenraad explained.

"In reality I suspect that there's not going to be much of a difference," said Roosenraad regarding the new inclusion plan, "because people usually don't transfer out of popular houses—there won't be that many spaces."

Both Kenyatta and Roosenraad emphasized that the 35 percent house minimum for freshman inclusion is only "a target figure" that will not be rigidly adhered to. "The quotas varied depending on the house," observed Kenyatta. "Strict quotas cannot be set."

Just prior to the CUL vote, several committee members asked if the CUL was acting hastily, to which Professor Henry Art replied, "I don't think we're rushing. We've been at (the transfer issue) for a year and a half."

Roosenraad reported that attendance and revenue at the Log are down from last year's totals. For the first two months of the academic year, attendance is off by 19 percent, from 16,000 last year to only 13,000 this year. Log revenues per customer are down nine percent, from $1.20 per person per night to $1.09. Roosenraad said that the Log Committee regarded the revenue figure an indication that people do not attend the Log with the intent to become intoxicated.

The Log Committee also unanimously opposed installing a breath alcohol analyzer in the Log. The committee was pleased that students do not drink heavily at the campus pub, but they feared that the analyzer "might be taken as a challenge," explained Roosenraad.

In other action last Tuesday, the CUL unanimously passed a Student Housing Committee report, which defined the responsibilities of house officers. Under the new guidelines, the house vice-president will serve as house social chairman. Housing Committee Co-Chairman John Carlson '83 explained that each house will still be free to determine the structure of its social committee. He described the rest of the guidelines as "largely a clarification."

Faculty split over space shuffle

Administrative decisions approved by the Trustees in October will cause some parts of the campus to be arranged quite differently as of next year, and many students have discovered that things some took for granted, such as the use of Weston as a language center, were never guaranteed.

Among the upcoming changes, the relocation of the departments of French, Spanish, German and Russian to the former Roper Center in the lower portion of Stetson has caused the most unhappiness.

General language faculty feeling, in the words of Susan Dunn, chairman of the French department, is that "the new space will not meet all of our needs; however we have no choice but to make the best of a situation with which we are not particularly happy."

Less classroom space will be reserved for language teaching after the change, according to College Treasurer William Reed, who is orchestrating the move. Present intent for the space in Roper, according to Dorothea Hanson, Weston Language Center coordinator, is to remodel it into a language lab; a large all-purpose space for "relaxing, clubbing, meetings—maybe even afternoon tea;" an office for herself and one for Secretary Judith Madden; and two classrooms, one of which is to be seminar-sized.

Fancy equipment

The existing kitchen is to have a stove added to it, which will make it "about comparable" to the one in Weston, according to Hanson. None of these plans is final, Hanson stressed, since the architect remodeling Roper, Jesus and Weston, John Jordan of Jaffrey, New Hampshire, is still in the process of holding meetings with the language faculty to finalize plans.

"There are almost 20 faculty members," said Hanson, "so it's hard to get a consensus."

Since the language laboratory

Hollywood glitter hits Dodd

There won't be a hot tub, and there won't be Bo Derek. But three years after A Change of Seasons came to town, Williams will again be a movie set.

Public television station WGBH in Boston and the British Broadcasting Corporation will film several scenes in and around Dodd House next week-end for their adaptation of Philip Roth's novel The Ghost Writer.

Williams will become a women's college in 1949, with Dodd as a dorm and Goodrich House as the college post office. The film crew will shoot scenes in the Dodd dining hall and in a double room now occupied by Phil Walsh '85 and Michael Greely '85. There will also be a scene outside Goodrich.

General Foreman of Buildings and Grounds Ralph Iacussa described the impact of the filming as "low-key." "It will have very little effect," agreed Ellen Berek of the News Office, who is handling arrangements. The only College adjustments will be the clearing of a parking lot next to Goodrich for one day, and a temporary hook-up of filming equipment into the College power supply.

Greely and Walsh gave permission for their room to be used. They will stay in friends' rooms while all their belongings are removed and replaced with period furnishings. The room will be restored to its 1982 condition after filming is completed.

Twelve female students will appear in the movie as "non-speaking artists." They were selected by Chairman of the Theatre Department Jean-Bernard Bucky and by Berek on the strength of hair styles appropriate for the film.

Libby Horne '86 works at the News Office, which led to her selection by Berek. "This is a first for me," she said, "and it's also some extra money." Horne will be paid $150 for one morning and one afternoon of filming.

Roth himself suggested Williamstown as a possible set, said Berek. He is familiar with the Berkshires, and the main character of the novel lives in Stockbridge.

"Dodd immediately came to mind," said Berek. "I took (the WGBH people) around to see if we had a small, cozy, fairly old-

Most in four years

Frosh warnings rise

Freshmen received the highest number of academic warnings in four years, according to figures released by the Registrar.

A total of 127 of 498 freshmen were warned, or 25.5 percent of the Class of '86. This is a higher percentage of students warned than any class now on campus received as freshmen. The Class of '85, with nine more students, received 13 fewer warnings than this year's freshmen. The junior class had the best performance, with only 22.3 percent of its students warned.

Most students (102) only received one warning, but 21 received two and four freshmen were warned of poor performance in three of their classes.

Of these 156 warnings, a whopping 105 came from Division III departments, as opposed to 36 in Division II and only 15 in Division I. Mathematics was again the leader with 49 out of 289 freshman registrants receiving warnings. But Chemistry, with 22 out of 91 warned, had the highest percentage of any department.

The largest of eight departments issuing no warnings was German with 38 registrants. The largest department, English with 358 freshmen enrolled, warned six students.

Not institutional

To the editor:

In response to Stuart Weinstein's article entitled "Anti-Semitism reigns on Williams College campus":

While I agree that there are many problems confronting Jews at Williams, I strongly oppose the assertion that these problems are made manifest by certain structural conditions which result in a "systematic" anti-Semitism on our campus. The shortage of funding for the Jewish Association and the lack of an official Jewish Studies program do not reflect, as Mr. Weinstein claims, a questionable administrative commitment to Jewish life at Williams, but rather a limited supply of financial resources which must be allocated among the many groups that compete for college funds. As a fellow Jew, I too feel that there should be an active Jewish presence at Williams facilitated by a strong Jewish Association and a Jewish Studies program, but the college's present inability to provide for such improvements should not be misconstrued as indicative of an institutional anti-Semitism.

However, the facts remain that a significantly higher percentage of prospective Jewish students reject Williams than do their Gentile peers, and that Jewish students often feel uncomfortable in the Williams environment. Most Jewish students come from homes and communities that maintain a high level of Jewish cultural identity. The overwhelmingly Gentile environment at Williams generates an atmosphere which in many ways is very different from that in which we grew up. Hopefully the administration will be able to provide for a more viable Jewish community in the near future, but a continued responsibility rests with all of us to foster an increased awareness and understanding of the particular situation faced by Jews at Williams.

Eds. Note: Weinstein did not select the title for his article; the Record bears responsibility for headlines.

Insidious

To the editor:

No, anti-Semitism does not reign on the Williams College campus. It is much too insidious for that. Nevertheless, some of us see it here.

Swastikas on signs and walls—that's anti-Semitism. Admissions policies which seek to limit rather than encourage Jews—that's anti-Semitism. Non-Jewish students asking Jewish students if they personally feel guilty about Begin's actions (that puts a quick end to any rational discussion, folks)—and that's anti-Semitism. Individuals admitting they are concerned about racism and misogyny but never really thought seriously about anti-Semitism—yes, that's anti-Semitism. Jewish students not wanting to admit they are Jewish and not joining in Jewish activities for fear of what non-Jewish friends will say—that's anti-Semitism, too.

Jews may look happily assimilated, but our culture and self-identity is dying because we are afraid to be caught in stereotypes and a history of oppression and murder. Admittedly, Jewishness is ignored here: the issue appears uninteresting. However, if one is uninterested in a people's being actively oppressed, one is both inhumane and foolish. The matter is too large to be addressed fully here, but there will be more discussion to come on Judaism, Jewishness, and anti-Semitism.

If any of the above-made points were not obvious to you, that means you probably have more to learn about the matter. If you do not think there is any problem of anti-Semitism here, then you are ignorant and should become aware of the following. Some Jewish students are beginning to activate themselves: meeting (over forty students) with Phil Smith to discuss admissions policy on Jews; attending a Feminist Alliance meeting on "Self-Rejection: Anti-Semitism and Jewish Feminism;" showing support for each other in our search for our own identities as individuals with a Jewishness.

I, a Jewish Feminist (truly not a nice thing to admit around here), am ready for a comfortable and conducive atmosphere in which to explore my total individuality. Indeed, the struggle continues.

Beth Byron '85

Surprised

To the editor:

I was not so much angered as surprised to read Stuart Weinstein's editorial ("Anti-Semitism reigns on Williams College campus") in the Nov. 9 issue. The article was concerned entirely with the issue of anti-Semitism, yet at no point does Mr. Weinstein give a clear picture of what he means by "anti-Semitism." "Anti-Semitism" is a loaded term; it evokes images of one of the most shameful aspects of Western civilization. As such it should be used very carefully.

Instead, Mr. Weinstein exploits the impact of the term and exploits the moral capital built up by Jews over the centuries of the Diaspora to justify present Israeli expansionism when he mentions it in connection with the debate over Lebanon. He employs a technique used by Professor Nathan Katz in the recent Lebanon panel discussion: merely utter the word "anti-Semitism" and opponents of the Begin foreign policy will immediately halt their arguments and fall all over each other exclaiming support for the rights of the Jewish people. Any serious debate about Israeli imperialism can thereby be turned into a discussion of anti-Semitism, thus skirting the issue at hand.

That tactic has worked in the past but it did not work for Professor Katz and it certainly does not work for Mr. Weinstein. One can only hope that this signals the approach of a day when Israel will be viewed by the same standards as are all other nations.

Appalled

by Mark White

When the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition points out that Williams College owns $20 million worth of stock in firms profiting from Apartheid, $2 million of which is invested in IBM, a firm which directly contributes to the repressive police action against non-whites in South Africa, we are accused of condemning the College for participating in racist ideology and murder.

We are ignored when we point out the importance of the Trustees' arguments that the Sullivan Principles are an important step toward black equality in South Africa. No one listens to us when we bring to light the fact that less than one percent of the black working force is affected by the Sullivan Principles.

Although the Trustees adhere to the Sullivan Principles as a criterion for judging firms which do business in South Africa, the College still owns $1.2 million worth of stock in firms which have yet to sign the Principles, and another 11 companies the College invests in do not follow the guidelines set forth by Reverend Sullivan. When we suggest that there may be some contradictions within the College investment policies, we are labeled as knee-jerk, anti-capitalist reactionaries.

Oppression begins at home

Seeking change in College investment policy "radical and subversive"

This week the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition is conducting a door-to-door petition drive to garner support for divestment.

by Laura Hoptman

For the past three years I have been a member of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition. The situation in South Africa presents to me perhaps the only clear cut, ecumenical, bi-partisan issue that one can read about in the pages of The New York Times. The minority regime in South Africa, its present policies and past history of infringement of basic human rights smacks at its best of the ideologies present in pre-civil rights America; at its worst, it is reminiscent of Nazi Germany. To oppose the College's financial involvement in this country seems to me to be quite an arguable position.

The Anti-Apartheid Coalition itself is an organization with more of an emphasis on moral as opposed to political issues, an organization well-grounded in fact in addition to opinion. Moreover, the Anti-Apartheid Coalition follows a policy of working with the administration, meeting regularly with the President and the Trustees of Williams to discuss the feasibility of a program of divestiture of the College's holdings in corporations that do business in South Africa. Education of the College community and rational discussion of the issues have, in my experience, been the main activities of WAAC.

After three years of working with WAAC, I have come to the realization that this selfsame organization is thought radical and subversive by many of my peers, the administration of the College and the Trustees.

At every demonstration, at every impassioned meeting with the President and the Trustees I have found myself repeating one phrase over and over: I do not hate Williams College. I do not hate Williams, I hate the system of Apartheid. It is wrong. It is morally abhorrent. This position is universally accepted and inarguable, except to a certain few. I also hate the fact that this institution, the institution that has educated me about politics, economics and morals, has the power to voice its strong disapproval of the situation in South Africa but has never used it. This is purely my opinion one which did not dissuade me from coming to Williams as a freshman, but one that prompted me to join W.A.A.C. It has been the goal of the Anti-Apartheid Coalition since its inception to persuade the students, faculty, administration and Trustees to use that voice. It is not a subversive organization; on the contrary, it is an organization that means to promote the College as a moral institution through the act of divestiture of the College's holdings in South Africa.

Antoine Watteau drawing

I have seen the look of distaste and disapproval, of outright anger or fear in the faces of those students accosted by a petition or pamphlet-waving anti-apartheid member. I have also seen the carefully prepared information sheets piled high in trashbins, and movies with attendance rates in single digits, and I have wondered if this community is simply afraid. The plea of "I don't have enough information to judge" is valid but only to an extent. When abundant sources of information are time and time again ignored, it only makes it apparent that activist involvement here at Williams is somehow socially suspicious, academically unwise.

This piece is not a plea for understanding, nor is it an apology or justification for activism at Williams College. Rather it is a call to expand our ideas outside as well as inside the classroom. All of us at Williams have come here for the same reasons. We have come here to have intellectual discourse, not to argue. We have come here to expand our minds demically unwise. Education about issues outside the academic course offerings is viewed as an unnecessary intrusion, especially if the issue is controversial, unpleasant and seemingly unrelated to our lives here at Williams. The issue of Apartheid is particularly unpleasant, as it touches the lives of every member of this College community not only through the pages of the national newspapers and through history classes, but through our stock portfolio. Whether or not divestment is an effective means of protest remains to many a debatable point, but the fact that the College owns stocks in corporations that do business in South Africa is not debatable.

Finally, WAAC members are also members of and investors in this intellectual community. We do not seek to destabilize, but nor do we seek to remain passive acceptors of our education, or the institution that stands behind our education. Rather, our goal is to contribute our knowledge and opinions in an effort to continually improve the system which we criticize.

For all the time that I have spent trying to change the College's policy of investment in South Africa, I have never for one moment felt like an enemy of Williams. To have felt so would have been absurd. I would have been fighting myself.

through exposure to different issues and opinions, not to remain closed to those viewpoints that differ from our own. Above all, we have come here to learn, not to run away from learning. Apartheid, in particular, is an issue about which there is a lot to learn. The Anti-Apartheid Coalition, if we wish to use it, is an important resource for this information.

Finally, WAAC members are also members of and investors in this intellectual community. We do not seek to destabilize, but nor do we seek to remain passive acceptors of our education, or the institution that stands behind our education. Rather, our goal is to contribute our knowledge and opinions in an effort to continually improve the system which we criticize.

After six years, victories remain bittersweet

by Mark White

Finally, when we 'ask' the College to divest of all stocks in firms doing business in South Africa, we are accused of practicing "cheap-grace"; that is, we want to "feel good" morally at the expense of all those students who will supposedly be forced to pay another $500 in tuition. To counter such an accusation we have brought to the College's attention studies which conclude that portfolios can benefit from such divestment. Still, the College community ignores us.

Only once since WAAC's inception six years ago has the community listened. In a remarkable show of commitment and perseverance in 1980, WAAC, through candlelight vigils, protests and a hunger strike, mobilized a quarter of the student population for a short time to support its position that the College should divest its stock in Newmont Mining because of Newmont's unfair labor practices, stop making short-term deposits in banks extending loans to South Africa, and send a student to an IBM shareholder's meeting asking that firm to stop its business with South Africa.

Nine months after its initial promise to divest of Newmont stock the College followed through on its promise, and WAAC claimed victory as it should have, for without its commitment nothing would have been accomplished.

Yet, as one WAAC member termed it two years ago, the victory was "bittersweet," since the College did not sell the stock in Newmont Mining because of to human degradation under apartheid, but rather because of that company's "intransigence and disregard for the rights of its shareholder." Further, the activism of the student population was short-lived; of the 500 who signed the petition, only a handful continued to question the College's role in South Africa, and WAAC was once again left alone to shoulder that burden. As a result, not only are our policies regarding banks unchanged, today we are further away from divestment than ever before.

Why did the Williams Community decide to continue its criticism of the College's investment policies? After six years of leafletting and letter writing, questioning and demanding, anti-apartheid fairs and movies, South African poets and political activists, why does WAAC only have one "bittersweet victory" under its belt?

I was recently criticized for being a member of WAAC on the grounds that the organization is largely ineffectual, thus implying that the answers to the above questions can be found within the ranks of WAAC. The reason for the group's ineffectiveness, though, does not lie within WAAC, but rather within the Williams College community itself.

College investments continue to help uphold Apartheid not because of the incompetence or insincerity of WAAC's membership, but because those who question the authority of Williams College are perceived by others as being inappreciative of the education Williams has bestowed upon them. It is not "nice" to question authority, and Williams students are by definition "nice."

In addition, members of WAAC are criticized for making the College the enemy, the foe that must be defeated. Nobody wants to make the College the enemy, and in the end WAAC has the majority of the College community as an obstacle in its path to divestment.

It is unfortunate that WAAC is criticized for being "anti-Williams," "reactionary," and the like, for such criticism fails to realize the essential characteristics of WAAC's "rebellion": the determination of WAAC members to question the authority of the College's investment policies is because our studies, not usually our role models, have taught us that the only way to hold on to our beliefs and ethics is not to merely understand and accept them, but more importantly to reinforce them through everyday practice. To do less would be to admit the inadequacy of our Williams education.

Judaic Studies only partial solution Let's hear it for Apathy

by Maryam Eliah

I would like to contest Mr. Weinstein's article "Anti-Semitism Reigns on Williams College Campus" in the November 9 issue of the Record. There are many points of his piece with which I disagree, however I am sure these points were seen by others and rebutted elsewhere. Therefore, I would like to focus on the educational aspect of the problem and suggest the establishment of a Middle Eastern area studies major (covering Judaic Studies) as a solution to the lack of knowledge of the culture, politics and history of this crucial area.

After all, is that region not rightfully titled "the cradle of civilization"?!?

Clearly, in any community, it is the role of the minority to adapt to a system placed for and by the majority. The College could not possibly serve only Kosher food to satisfy Jews and Muslims. However, I must admit that there is a general lack of knowledge (better put as ignorance) about other cultures (and religions) especially of the African continent and the Middle East. I judge this to be due not to hostility and prejudice, but rather to the self-centeredness prevailing in this country as is further illustrated by the lack of interest in foreign languages and cultures.

Primarily, consider the fact that initiating Judaic Studies as a major might be taken as discriminatory by other minorities who would equally like to concentrate on Muslim, Buddhist, or Baha'i studies. In addition, Judaic culture and tradition cannot be studied outside of its historical and political context. Therefore, I strongly believe that by providing Judaic Studies under the umbrella of Mid-Eastern Area Studies would not only succeed in providing further study to students presently interested in Judaism, but would also attract students fascinated by the enigma of the Middle East and furnish them with necessary background knowledge of the area. This would primarily entail separating the present "Africa and the Middle East" area study justly into the two diverse areas that it presents (as the combination is a mere escape of the addition of other necessary courses).

Presently three well-qualified scholars, Professors Berk, Darrow and Katz, are teaching courses concerning Judaic history and religion. However, with the exception of a few courses in political science and religion (and one art course), there are no other substantial courses relating to the Middle East. I was appalled and dismayed not to find a single Middle-Eastern history course (with the exception of History 223, "History of the Jewish People in the Modern fore should increase the number of qualified foreign and Jewish applicants who perceive the option of furthering their education of Middle-Eastern cultures as a positive factor at Williams.

According to the statistics from the Admissions Office, last year 52 foreign students were accepted, of whom 25 enrolled. Only 18 of these were non-U.S. citizens and only two out of these 18 were from the Middle East (out of 497 freshmen)!

It is obvious that this is not due to any sort of prejudice, but rather to lack of recruitment devices overseas. If Williams is concerned with the intellectual and background diversity of its student body, it is imperative to promote recruitment measures in countries other than the United States, and again, the presence of the Mid-East major would serve as an element for encouraging foreigners to apply.

In conclusion, I am not in any way trying to extenuate the problem, but I think the crux of this difficulty is the mere existence of any elements of anti-Semitism and not conditions such as lack of funding to the Jewish Association or the lack of Judaic Studies at Williams. In fact, I think if these two elements were solved as Mr. Weinstein suggested, it might isolate Jewish students as they would find a commodious community to take shelter and ignore any possible anti-Semitism.

... it is about time that more attention was focused on the region as a whole.

This problem has to be dealt with openly and holistically. It should be approached in a manner inhospitable to all and intellectually attractive to the majority of students. I strongly urge the initiation of a separate Middle Eastern Area Studies with Judaic Studies as a subgroup to provide and encourage the awareness of the culture, history, politics and religion of that particular area of the world. This will be equally favorable to non-Jewish students and I believe will succeed in uprooting any surface anti-Semitism that presently exists.

ble academic institutions in which Jews make up 30 percent or more of the student body.

Jewish students at Williams have certainly not found themselves disadvantaged through lack of esteem from their classmates. Last year's College Council president was Jewish, as is the General Manager of WCFM. Both of these positions are elected by large numbers of the student body, presumably most of whom are not Jewish. It would be hard to imagine that a truly anti-Semitic campus atmosphere would allow for such successes by Jewish students.

It is true that Jews are a small minority at Williams. However, Williams is largely reflective of the country that we as Jewish Americans will live in during the rest of our lives. We must push to continue our individuality and to gain respect from the non-Jews with which we co-exist.

I ask all my fellow Jews on this campus to be aware of subtle anti-Semitic practices if they occur and to alert the powers that be. Both the Dean's Office and Food Services have been extremely responsive to me when even the slightest objections to potentially anti-Semitic policies have been raised. The administration does care, and we owe it to them not to accuse them unfairly. A claim of anti-Semitism is a serious one. Let's not use it unless we've got a heck of a strong case. Steve Epstein '83

lation as not only a "non-issue," but the biggest "non-issue." The incidents of harassment on this campus serve to highlight the fact that even our sheltered environment is subject to the pervasive problems of society.

How can the Republicans, as represented by Mr. Blatt, overlook the problems and hardships of women in this country and still profess to be a viable political party answering its constituency's needs? It is no wonder that women disapprove of Reagan more than men do. I sincerely hope that this trend continues to show the displeasure women feel in being treated by the party in power as second-class citizens with nonexistent problems.

Be cautious

To the editor:

I write not to attack Stuart Weinstein's op-ed piece entitled "Anti-Semitism reigns on Williams College campus," but to give my own personal opinion as a Jewish student who has closely observed relations between Jews and non-Jews on this campus over the past four years.

As president of the Jewish Association, Stuart surely has access to the opinions of many more campus Jews than myself, and possibly he has been made aware of cases of subtle anti-Semitism that go on regularly here. However, to say anti-Semitism "reigns" (as the Record headline does, and possibly Stuart does not) is a volatile charge which should not be made lightly.

In four years as a somewhat visible member of the Williams College community, I have never felt myself subjected to any type of anti-Semitism whatsoever.

Even in the wake of anti-Israeli sentiment following the massacres in Beirut, I feel the Williams students who have risen in objection have carefully and intelligently differentiated between their anti-Israeli and any possible anti-Semitic attitudes.

Stuart is right in asserting that Jewish students don't come to Williams in great numbers. However, I would argue that this is not Williams's fault, nor its obligation to correct so long as the Jewish population of Williams does not fall below national population standards. The Jewish population of the U.S. is estimated at three percent. Williams, even by conservative estimates, does better than this. Jewish students who feel that this does not permit them enough interaction with Jews can certainly find other compara-

Let's hear it for Apathy

by Mark Dursztman

Those who take particular satisfaction in diagnosing the infirmities of our ailing culture have lately had a field day with America's youth, and in particular, today's college student. "This is," they readily offer, "the age of student apathy." While I agree with this observation, I object to the spirit in which it is commonly viewed. We have bemoaned student apathy long enough. It is time that we recognized that student apathy is a virtue, and can be good clean fun.

The benefits of apathy are manifold. I like to think that apathy has the potential to unite all mankind, and perhaps certain parts of New Jersey as well. From Islam to Christianity, from Brooks Brothers to Brooklyn, one day we may all learn to shrug our shoulders meekly in the face of even the most topical questions. In addition, there are many incidental rewards for the faithfully apathetic. If silence is golden, then a carefully cultivated indifference should be worth at least a new BMW. Finally, you often hear people say, "It's too easy and convenient to be apathetic." This is quite true; in fact, convenience is one of the most attractive things about apathy. Let us, however, examine the other side of the issue. How inconvenient it is to be involved in an activist group! Meetings are often long and boring and always seem to be scheduled at the worst possible times. Intra-group conflicts are a daily frustration. Whining and nagging alone have been known to delay certain social reforms for years.

Like many virtues, in today's society, apathy has fallen on hard times. What is to blame for this? Confronted with rising inflation, interest rates and unemployment, a volatile Middle East and escalating hostilities toward the Soviet Union, many have actually begun to voice their dissent. In some cases, erasing a lifetime of studied indifference. Admittedly, this is a rather disturbing turn of events, but putting about this accomplishes very little. Instead, I direct your attentions and efforts toward remedying the situation.

Apathy is ultimately based in the individual; therefore, its revival must begin on a personal level. I realize that many have difficulty recapturing the insouciance of the past, so I offer the following exercise to start you on your way. Practice the rejoinders to the following topical questions. Soon, you'll be handling even the most dangerous queries like a pro:

- 1) Q: "How about that Mideast situation?"
A: "Hey, bummer, huh?"
- 2) Q: "Can you believe this economy of ours?"
A: "Yeah. Get psyched."
- 3) Q: "What do you think about abortion?"
A: "Hey, go for it."

(NOTE: You have inadvertently stated an opinion on abortion here. Try to avoid this by choosing your words more judiciously.)

If apathy is to become a seminal force in our society again, personal commitments of time and energy are essential. Thus, I plan to market a set of provocative, pro-apathetic bumper stickers. Possibilities include:

- 1) "America: So What?"
- 2) "Support Tax Reform—Unless of Course You Don't Feel Like It"
- 3) "Guns Don't Kill . . . Do They?"

In addition to this, I have been trying to organize a group dedicated to the advancement of apathy. However, curiously enough, to this point, interest has been lagging. (That is a start, I guess.)

In choosing to be apathetic, you rid yourself of all moral dilemmas. Only then can you cease to care about politics, economics, world hunger, your grades . . . well, maybe not your grades. We all must draw the line somewhere, I suppose.

Trash fuels profits

by Nancy Gleason & Geoffrey Baker

Someday your room may be heated by empty Michelob bottles and Dorito bags if Williams follows the technological lead of its neighbor 20 miles to the South.

Two weeks ago, members of the Student Energy Conservation Committee toured an "alternative energies" facility in Pittsfield that converts refuse into steam energy. According to Vicon Resource Recovery spokeswoman Beth Voll, Vicon burns city garbage to alleviate a Pittsfield landfill shortage problem and to generate steam for a local paper company.

Ms. Voll explained that the impetus for the construction of Vicon began in 1974 when Pittsfield officials realized that community trash would soon outstrip the city landfill. After exploring several proposals, the city decided to float a $6.2 million revenue bond to provide capital for an unproven and venture-risky project. The project was to burn, at 1700° F, 240 tons of residential and business garbage a day, extending the life of the landfill from two to twenty years.

In addition, the project was to sell steam to Crane Paper Company, a steady customer that manufactures U.S. treasury paper. Exhaust emissions from the project would pass through an electrostatic scrubber smokestack, emerging into the environment well within government air pollution guidelines.

After two years of operation, the plant has been an enormous success. Operating revenues come from two sources, namely, Crane Paper Company steam fees and garbage tipping fees, and amount to $200,000 annually. Crane Company is also benefitting by saving roughly $300,000 in heating oil costs through Vicon "garbage" steam.

Everybody seems to benefit from this project; town residents save on their garbage fees, town officials are relieved from the odious task of finding a new landfill site, Crane Paper saves money on its oil bill, Vicon provides jobs for the community, and this country reduces energy consumption, handing over fewer bucks to the petrosheiks.

Within the next 10 years, total energy systems may be developed and implemented on a sufficiently wide basis to become an important part of the U.S. energy system. Total energy systems, like Vicon, hold significant promise for an increase in total system efficiency by being located near the ultimate consumer, which lowers distribution costs and attendant energy losses.

How about at Williams? Can the College convert the heating plant into a cogeneration system, passing this savings onto the students by reducing their board and room fees? Energy for thought.

"It's certainly possible at any time," commented Physical Plant Director Peter Weianetz. "The question is whether it's feasible from an economic standpoint."

A Night at the Opera

On Saturday night, according to the advertisements, some famous people will be exalted, murdered, married, attacked, amused and oppressed, all at the hands (or voices) of the 100-member Williams Choral Society.

"Opera Night" features excerpts from 19th century works by von Weber, Verdi, Puccini and Wagner. Conductor Kenneth Roberts explained that "these texts deal with the condition of man." The chorus of homeless Scottish refugees in Verdi's Macbeth, for example, may apply to all people out of favor in their homeland even though Verdi wrote it with the Italian political situation in mind.

The Choral Society, composed mainly of students with a sprinkling of townspeople, rehearsed at least two nights a

Milk Wood done magnificently

by Marc Mazzone

Dylan Thomas called Under Milk Wood a "play for voices," and such an assessment does justice to the rich, earthy texture of his language. It is a deep, lyrical language, meshed under the picturesque tableau of a day in the life of a small Welsh coastal town. I say life because, even in the recurring allusions to death, Thomas seems always full of the joy of living. Life oozes from the play, thick, palpable, sometimes melancholy, but always refreshing.

It is just this vibrant, full-bodied sound that the mainstage production is so successful in bringing out, not only of the words but also of the wordless noise of life itself. The play opens to the hushed whisper of the sea breeze and the distant waves breaking on the shore. Soon the townfolk awake to the sonorous voice of the townhall bell, balanced by the light tinkling of the bell that summons the children to school.

Sound of tobacco juice

The Reverend Eli Jenkins, gazing down from Llaregub Hill at his beloved town heaves a deep, contented sigh of thanks to the Lord. The sound of sailors spitting tobacco juice, of Organ Morgan practicing Bach in the chapel, of a breath, a kiss, surrounds the audience with a real, tangible air. Like Captain Cat, "the retired, blind sea captain," we can experience Milk Wood through our ears.

Sixty-three characters

Yet at the same time, the production is a tremendous visual spectacle as well. With a cast of twelve, on stage continually, portraying a total of sixty-three characters, the difficulties in coordinating movement are evident. Director Jill Nassivera circumvents these difficulties with stunning felicity. While in one or two places too much movement tends to obscure dialogue, the blocking is, all in all, elegant. Wherever the attention of the audience is directed for the moment, there is always something else going on; and this background motion, which can so easily detract from the main action, serves rather to complement it.

This visual spectacle comes to a head in the scene where Lord Cut-Glass, played by Gordon Compton '85, contem-

Alumna has designs

by Ronald Issen

The scenery of both The Misanthrope and Under Milk Wood comprise a welcome change for a woman who makes her living designing such things as mechanical wolves. Polly Wood-Holland '75, a scenic artist with Eoin Sprott Studios in New York, was invited by theater professor Bernard Bucky to design the two sets over the summer.

For the past three years, Wood-Holland has constructed special props for a number of movies and stage shows, but she is no newcomer to the art of stage design. After graduating from Williams, she went to work for noted Broadway set designer Tony Walton. She was involved with the sets for 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, I Love My Wife and Annie during this time.

At present she designs and manufactures mechanical devices and dummies used on most movies. The movie Wolfen features her most extensive work, including one beast that snarled, drooled, moved its eyes and bit with 500 pounds of pressure.

continuing the red and white motif, with bits of black and beige as well. Only Alceste is dressed in monochrome black, emphasizing his alienation from the rest of the characters.

Punked-out guests
The design and direction work together well throughout the play, and come together best in a terrifically staged party scene which looks very much like a

Expert direction

This one scene is only a slight flaw in an otherwise superb production. The play's conclusion is made especially provocative with an expert directorial touch. Alceste delivers a preachy world-renouncing speech ("Meanwhile, betrayed and wronged in everything, I'll flee this bitter world where vice is king...") center stage to the a terrific trio of decadent, shal-low suitors. It is hard to decide which of the three is the most insufferable.

Perdita Flinn, playing Cell-mene's catty, sex-starved, barb-tossing friend, performs the part very well—though she must be looking forward to being given a chance to try some other types of roles.

This is a great group of unlike-able types, distasteful enough for any century. Present to redeem mankind a little are Nicholas Fluehr and Mary Schwarzer, fine in their roles as the play's two virtuous characters.

Marvelous translation

Finally, mention must be made of the marvelous Richard Wilbur translation which adds so much to the production. Wilbur captures the essence of Moliere's poetic drama through endlessly clever and vigorously contemporary rhyming couplets. When we hear such gems as Alceste (Dean Grodzins) speaking of his unrequited love: "She hates me thoroughly, and I'm so vexed/I mean to hang myself on Tuesday next," we realize how much would be lost in a prose translation.

Peter Massey is quite good in the title role, nicely balancing the righteous disdain and the sanctimoniousness of his character. The rest of the cast make the most out of the play's assortment of hypocrites, leeches and fops, so that Alceste's negative view of mankind seems in many ways well-justified.

Leading the pack is Sheila Walsh, absolutely convincing as Alceste's insincere, promiscuous lover Cellmene. From the moment she appears onstage, we know that his attempts "to cleanse her spirit in my love's pure flame" will fall completely.

Draft sparks debate

by Ned Ladd

Reverend Barry Lynn, president of Draft Action, accused the current Administration of "selective prosecution" and said draft enforcement has become a farce, during a panel discussion on the draft Friday night. Professor David Booth presided over a discussion between Lynn and Richard Hertzog '60, a Washington lawyer.

Lynn, whose organization counsels draft resisters, called draft registration "a bogus contribution in any real sense to the national security" of the United States. He stated that the Selective Service system in its present form is inefficient and that it should be abandoned for a more effective system. He continued to lambast the Selective Service by saying that it establishes "a military mindset which permits war as a solution to world problems."

Hertzog countered Lynn's allegations by stating that the military can be used in many ways, some of which don't involve war. He spoke of the use of military force as a "deterrent" and as an instrument in foreign policy. In our society, "violence is necessary," said Hertzog, referring to the basic protective service which, for example, police provide.

Draft lists are inaccurate

Hertzog explored the issue of draft registration from a philosophical viewpoint while Lynn concentrated on the practical and political aspects. Lynn stated that rather than six to eight weeks proponents claim, draft registration would save "at most, two weeks" in the event of a national emergency. He pointed to a Selective Service report to the President as evidence of his claims. He said that the present system could only deliver 65 percent of draft age males because lists are inaccurate and because many people have moved without notifying the Selective Service. He maintained that lists this inaccurate would lead to "successful class-action lawsuits" by draftees because they had not been randomly chosen.

Enforcement a farce

Enforcement of draft registration has become a farce, according to Lynn. He called the thirteen or fourteen trials that have taken or are taking place "political show trials" and the defendants "victims of vindictive selective prosecution." He stated that defendants have been singled out because they chose to exercise their First Amendment rights by vocally protesting draft registration. In addition, he said that "the government has circumvented the law" by denying government aid to those who don't register.

Lynn advocated another Selective Service plan, under which registration would not begin until war had been declared. Although this would require that the Selective Service be more prepared for the event of a war, peacetime budgetary costs would be lower. In addition, "accelerated post-mobilization registration" would be just as effective even though there would be a slight delay, because "volunteers would fill training camps to capacity in the first few weeks of any mobilization."

Lynn closed by saying that an individual could refuse to register on several grounds. Religious and moral objections are fully valid, according to Lynn, but those who have no such beliefs may also object on the ground that "draft registration is bad public policy."

Hertzog, in his remarks, shied away from the public policy issues and refuted Lynn's argument on philosophical grounds, stating that a government is built upon the "primacy of loyalty." He said that a Williams student should consider the repercussions of any decision he makes regarding registration.

Hertzog explained that draft registration was not an endorsement of war because "three (Congressional) democratic decisions must precede any combat for a draftee." Faith in a democratic system, he contended, requires that a citizen register.

Build postal prowess

by Martin Hildebrand

A recent article in the Record had four suggestions on how to get more mail. Nonetheless, there may be some of you who are looking for more ways to get more mail. Here are some suggestions.

1. Use mail-order picture developing. Have you ever taken a picture before? This is a perfect opportunity to start. There are some very photogenic areas on campus. If you get some good pictures, you might get prints to send to other people. Who knows? You might get some Real Mail in response.
2. Overdraw your checking account. That will give you just the kind of mail you need, especially if you get it Monday morning.
3. Write an original letter to your Congressman. If he cares about his constituents, he will respond. This method of getting mail is also a valuable part of the democratic process.
4. Subscribe to the Wall Street Journal or the Christian Science Monitor. This way assures you of mail virtually every weekday and also keeps you from being too badly out of the news.
5. Write letters to everyone in your high school yearbook. A few might find time to respond.
6. Sponsor a contest. Announce to your friends that you will randomly pick a letter and award the writer $10. That money may get you a lot of mail.
7. Become a member of many college organizations. Even if you do little for them, you will get more junk mail.
8. Write to yourself. Keep the letters to form a diary, if you wish.
9. Write to your favorite high school teachers. They will be glad to hear from you, and they generally respond. English teachers write especially good letters.
10. Tell the FBI you haven't paid your income tax, didn't register for the draft, smuggle illegal aliens, etc.

plates his 66 clocks. Each member of the cast takes on the persona of a clock, some in conjunction, others alone, and as the aging eccentric examines them one by one with an admixture of inquisitiveness and wonderment, they tick and rink and bong and cuckoo in a glorious panorama of sight and sound that urges the audience to burst into spontaneous applause.

Earthy, woody

Bruce Goodrich's costumes, rich tans and greens and reds, heighten the visual effect; and the set, designed by Polly Wood-Holland '75, is a masterpiece of thick wooden risers and platforms, which seems to capture the very essence of Thomas' thick, throaty diction. Asked to define the character of his poetry, we would probably say, "Earthy, woody." The set works well to embody this character.

The cast is certainly magnificent. They bring to the production a youthful exuberance and vitality without which the play could never function. Particularly memorable is Cameron Smith '86, who narrates the play as the First Voice and Captain Cat. His baritone voice seems eminently suitable for Thomas' poetry. At times deep and nasal, at others full and husky, and at still others warbling and lyrical, it is so expressive, with so many different textures and qualities that we might be persuaded to believe that Thomas wrote the play for him.

Altogether seductive

Martha Hughes '86 is altogether seductive as the dead Rosie Probert, out of all of Captain Cat's women, the only one he ever loved. The scene in which she visits the old seacaptain in a dream is done with great sensitivity and insight.

Burns with life

The rest of the cast, Clark Balm, Ethan Berman, Gordon Compton, Ana Deboo, Meredith McGill, Daniel Morris, Peggy O'Toole, and Marc Wolf, is simply delightful. Under Milk Wood burns with the life through which it was written.

Flutist featured

Quartet sleek yet soulless

by Becky MacDougall

The Saturday evening concert at the Clark Art Institute by flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer and the Portland String Quartet was a mixture of disappointments and pleasant surprises.

The unusual program, which included pieces in a time-span from Bach to Walter Piston, is to be commended for its originality. However, it also made clear the strengths and weaknesses of the performers, both separately and as a group.

Two little quintets

The program opened with two little quintets for flute and strings by Boccherini. Although there is nothing musically outstanding about these pieces, they were pleasant and easy to listen to. Flute and strings blended well here, although as the flute part often doubled that of the first violin, it did not allow Dwyer the independence to demonstrate the full range of her talent.

One would expect that this opportunity would come next, in the unaccompanied Bach flute sonata. But instead, her performance made clear the difference between a basically orchestral flutist and one who has been a soloist all her life.

In the slow movements, Dwyer's tone was clear and beautiful. But in faster passages her tone faltered. While Dwyer has a flawless technique, and the notes themselves were all there, her tone became very airy, resulting in a sloppy sound in the very rapid and demanding passages of the Bach.

Nice surprise

But the next piece, Piston's "Quintet for String Quartet and Flute," was best suited for the ensemble as a whole, and altogether the nicest surprise of the evening. A sleek twentieth-century piece that at times sounded variously influenced by Ives and by jazz elements, the group gave it an appropriately polished performance. If the Piston was the nicest surprise of the evening, the Schubert quartet that closed the program was the biggest disappointment. A string quartet that will program "Death and the Maiden" is as daring as an orchestra that will play Beethoven's Fifth; both are war-horses of the literature.

Indulged cliches

Unfortunately, the Portland String Quartet indulged in almost every cliché in the book. While their technique was perfect, and they have an undeniably beautiful sound, their performance was almost too calculated.

The glossiness that sullied the Piston sounded all wrong here. Every nuance, all the changes in dynamics, were exactly right; and yet even the loudest parts weren't exciting, but just loud.

The performance lacked some vital excitement. Is this Romantic music? It was both one of the most elegant and one of the most boring performances I've ever heard.

Solidarity head fears future

by Jim Peak

Solidarity still exists despite being driven underground in Poland, said Martina Szalanska in Driscoll Thursday afternoon.

Szalanska, a former head of Student Solidarity at the University of Warsaw, credited the 1980 workers' uprising with initiating a new attitude in Poland. She observed that until Solidarity had formed, the Polish people possessed "the spirit of slaves." Occasionally, the workers would briefly revolt against high food prices and the like, but their actions were random and half-hearted, and easily crushed by the authorities. Intellectuals also continually grumbled over the unfairness of the system, but they too were unable to effect change, said Szalanska.

Solidarity changed all that, noted Szalanska, pointing to the union of the workers with the intellectuals as the major difference.

The combination worked so well that within weeks the Polish government was forced to make concessions to the union resulting in what Szalanska termed "a completely new atmosphere . . . a feeling of freedom and truth in the air."

Szalanska said that this permissive stage was incapable of lasting since "a totalitarian system cannot tolerate a free and independent faction in the system." The result was the imposition of martial law in Poland last December. Solidarity leader Lech Walesa was imprisoned along with thousands of other dissidents, and the organization went underground. Szalanska admitted the present difficulties for Solidarity: "It is as if the entire Democratic Party had to go underground in the U.S.," yet the Poles are still resisting, and have set up a resistance movement similar in many ways to the one which opposed the Nazis in World War II, she said.

No political doctrine

Covert printing presses are currently in use, said Szalanska, printing hundreds of leaflets monthly, more to assure Poles of Solidarity's continued existence than to spread any political doctrine. She told a story about a Solidarity worker handing out sheets of paper in a Warsaw square: "A soldier, seeing that something was being handed out, quickly set off to investigate (merely being in possession of a leaflet is subject to a three-year prison term), but upon picking up one of the sheets, he was amazed to see that it was blank. Finally he asked an old lady why nothing was printed on the leaflets. She answered, "They don't have to print anything on it. We know what should be there."

Solidarity activist Martina Szalanska discussed the future of Poland in both a lecture and a panel discussion Thursday. (Farley)

Szalanska's own situation is precarious. She came to the U.S. during the period when Solidarity was obtaining concessions from the government, and visas, which had long been almost non-existent for most people, were suddenly widely available. But while she was still in America, martial law was imposed back home. As a known Solidarity leader, she fears being thrown in jail if she goes back. Instead she works for Solidarity's American office in New York City, hoping for a chance to return safely to Poland.

Szalanska said that the situation in her homeland is getting worse. "Fear is becoming all encompassing. People are afraid to go on strike for fear of losing their jobs . . . and our eastern neighbors are always in the background," she said. The apparent release of Walesa is good news to Szalanska but she fears that he will never regain his former power, and will only become "the most watched man in the world."

Poland panel splits

Stark disagreement dominated the panel discussion "Poland: What Can and Should We Do?" The panelists sharply differed over the roles of the United States, the Catholic Church and Solidarity in Poland.

The Thursday evening panel included Martina Szalanska, a former local chairperson of Student Solidarity; William Wagner of the history department; Political Scientists MacAlister Brown and Robert Stiglicz; and Danny Blatt '85 of the Garfield Republican Club. Each panelist delivered opening remarks, and a question period followed.

Economic sanctions were at the center of the dispute over the role of the United States. Szalanska, a native of Poland who came to the United States about a year ago, made a plea for economic sanctions against the entire Communist bloc and not just Poland. She asserted that Poles are in favor of the sanctions, adding "We may suffer, but we will survive if we know that sanctions will hurt the government."

Wagner took a different view of possible United States action, saying "Short of war with the USSR, I do not think that anything will significantly affect the situation." Blatt took the position that while technological sanctions would be an appropriate measure, agricultural sanctions would hurt the people of the U.S. and Poland more than the Polish government. Stiglicz argued that the United States has no role in the situation, saying that on the stage of Poland, "America is not a legitimate actor."

While all of the panelists appeared to sympathize with Solidarity, its role for the future was seen from a number of very different viewpoints. "Solidarity is doing more harm than good," asserted Stiglicz. On the other hand, Szalanska characterized Solidarity as a democratic movement in need of U.S. help.

Wagner advanced the view that even if Solidarity should win its battle, internal divisions would destroy its effectiveness. He noted the traditional split between the workers, the intelligentsia and the peasants.

Stiglicz outlined his view that the Catholic Church and the Communist Party will work together to restore the social order in Poland. He asserted that the rise of Solidarity and the increased political importance of the Church have been attempts to fill a social vacuum caused by what he perceived as the illegitimacy of the Polish government. Stiglicz foresaw a "marriage of convenience between the Church and the Party." However, he added that this view is more a hope than a prediction.

Szalanska differed with Stiglicz over the role of the Church, saying that the only possible political role for the Church is as a mediator. Wagner also objected to Stiglicz's view, in part because he saw a danger that the Church would lose its legitimacy by working with the government.

Blatt supported United States action to aid the Polish people and repeatedly asserted that "American capitalism has kept the Soviet regime in power." He drew a parallel between the situation in Poland and the American Revolution, citing the Polish government as illegitimate.

Brown commented, "The United States should define its interests and it is clear that Poland is not a vital interest." He added that the United States should have attainable goals and must accept the fact that Poland is dominated by the USSR.

Black women progress

by Lucy Lytle

"For all intents and purposes, even the most outstanding black women are invisible not only to the average student but to the average teacher of history," charged Dr. Betty Collier-Thomas in her lecture "Black Women and Their Role in American History" Tuesday night in Driscoll Lounge.

Collier-Thomas, a representative of the National Archives for Black Women's History and the Mary McLeod slaves, noting that despite the oppression and uncertainty of their lives, these women maintained a strong sense of religion and the importance of family life. She went on to trace the development of the role of black women from the antebellum period through the twentieth century.

"Antebellum free blacks, like whites, had very definite ideas about the place and role of women in society," maintained Collier-Thomas, adding that "Free black women were more likely to be employed than white women. They worked throughout the North and South at menial, servile occupations... as cooks, laundresses, housekeepers, and peddlers."

Women thought inferior and weak

Despite their entrance into the workforce, "it was thought that women were inferior and weak, unable to make decisions, and most useful in fundraising activities... [thus] by the 1890's they represented the backbone of community charity," explained Collier-Thomas.

She discussed the rising sense of sorority which accompanied the advent of the black women's club movement at the turn of the century. "Through the club movement, black women were mobilized to protest racial segregation and discrimination and the brutalization of black people," said Collier-Thomas.

"Black women have made outstanding contributions through group efforts and through individual achievements. The list is long and distinguished. They have excelled in every area of human endeavor... [yet] there are so many of them that have achieved at a national and international level that we don't even know of," said Collier-Thomas.

Collier-Thomas spoke of the hardships endured by female will be the largest item, its size will determine what can be done with the remaining space in the former Roper Center, Hanson said. The size of lab needed remains a major point of discussion, she noted.

Hanson feels that the existence of classrooms in the new language area will be necessary to get a flow of "academic traffic," without which she said there cannot be any sense of a real "language center." The College also plans to use an art classroom in Stetson for language teaching, and a basement room in Griffin. The Griffin room and one of the newly remodeled classrooms would be fitted out for slide projectors and stereo and cassette players to aid in language teaching. "There'll be some fancy audio-visual equipment," Reed said.

"It's been fun"

Members of the art department, who have been using Roper for an academic year and a half until their move to the new art building either in January or in May, felt positive about their location, in spite of a sign on the entrance door reading: "Welcome—You've Found the Art Department."

Art Department Secretary Sybil Ann Sherman said that the workability of the obscure location "is up to the people who move in." She said that the location in Stetson was an advantage, and that many professors who never went to the art department when it was in Lawrence have stopped by since it moved to Stetson.

"It's been fun," Sherman said. Adjustment to the location was tempered by the fact that art department members knew their situation was not permanent, Sherman remarked. Also, the slideroom is a major point of attraction for both students and faculty that the language lab can never be. Many language courses are literature courses and never involve the laboratory. Noted Hanson, "Some members of the administration think the lab is the heart of languages, that a beautiful lab will make a beautiful language center, but actually I think of a lab as a necessary evil, and not the center of the language area."

Coaches to Rice

Said Dunn, "It is an unfortunate moment for this change, because interest in foreign languages is at last increasing at Williams. Enrollments in all classes are good, especially in some of the beginning language courses. There is great interest in Italian: 175 people signed up for Italian during Winter Study, and there is room for only 20. There will be a French House on campus next year, and more and more students are spending their junior year in Europe. Under these circumstances, language and humanities in general should be receiving more and not less support."

Other participants in the space shuffle are much happier with their lot. Alumni, Development and News Office workers felt that the Weston location would solve space problems, although two Alumni workers said they would miss Jesup Hall.

College Treasurer William Reed said that offices of the football coaches would move from Jesup to Rice House, presently a co-op. The 1914 Library will probably remain where it is, he said, while the student publications will move to the ground floor of Hardy House.

Computer Center Director Lawrence Wright's only complaint about the computers' move from Bronfman to Jesup is that it will not occur for at least another year and a half—the length of time it will take to renovate Jesup.

Computers in your living room?

"It should have happened last year," he said. Wright added that the stairs and lobby in Jesup will be first to go, since they take up "a third of the building." The auditorium will also be used in some way or perhaps wholly taken out. Space will be made for the 13 fulltime computer center employees, for work space for students, and for new terminals.

There will be a great debate as to what equipment will be bought, although clearly another computer will have to be added in order to increase the number of terminals, Wright said. Eventually, he noted, the administrative and academic computers and the microcomputers now in Weston will be housed in Jesup.

Wright said that computers will not require any other large spaces in the future besides Jesup, since further expansion will mean distribution. Beginners need help, he said, which requires assistants and a computer center, but eventually extra rooms can be set up around campus as satellite centers. The ultimate goal, Wright said, is to have jacks for computers in every living room.

Cap and Bells Technical Director Julie Schmutz '84 said that the loss of the Jesup Hall auditorium "may not have that much of an effect" on Cap and Bells' productions, although she said that the group "won't have that space to rely on." She also mentioned that some of the group's equipment is designed for Jesup. As guidelines for the new studio theatre have not been laid out yet, Schmutz said, "Hopefully, although it's not official, we'll get to use it for some of our shows."

fashioned room." Dodd fit the bill, and had the additional advantage of being well-suited for exterior shots with minimal moving of equipment.

The College will not be paid for the use of its buildings. "We try to cooperate with educational television," said Berek. Williams will receive a credit line for its help.

Paulette Smit, in the role of "Amy," will appear in the Williams scenes. Claire Bloom, Sam Wanamaker, and Mark Linn Baker will also be featured in the screenplay by Roth and British director Tristram Powell.

The movie will be shown in Britain in May of 1983, and on PBS in this country in October.

Hummon praised

by John Clayton
with Robert Terecek

Junior split end Marc Hummon got more recognition for his play against Wesleyan last week than just "Bud Athlete of the Week."

Stories were written about Hummon in the New York Times and Boston Globe; the Eastern College Athletic Conference selected his game-winning catch as the ECAC play of the week, and the New England Presswriters Association gave him their "Golden Helmet Award."

The Times story, appearing in last Thursday's "Scouting" section and titled "The Biggest Man On Campus at 5-8" spoke of "Mark Hummon, a political science major, piano player, and split end from Maryland."

"Unlikely looking hero"

The Globe fared better with Hummon's name, although they had trouble with halfback Sean Crotty. The Globe story appeared in Ernie Roberts' column last Wednesday, leading off: "The most dramatic football finish of 1982 occurred last Saturday and involved its most unlikely looking football hero."

Night at the Opera—

week since September. In addition to learning the music, the singers must also learn the language of the piece. The operas will be sung in Italian, French and German. Roberts noted, "We try to do things in the original language. (Translating into English) is like replacing good oils with watercolors."

No more "boola-boola"

The Choral Society began about 15 years ago when Roberts merged the College Glee Club and the Chapel Choir. Weekly chapel services had been discontinued and smaller groups took over the "boola-boola stuff" of the Glee Club. Roberts tries to schedule a variety of experiences for the choir, keeping a list of what is done each year. The society presents one major concert a semester, a Christmas program and a Parents' Weekend presentation.

As conductor, Roberts must also work with soloists and an orchestra if necessary. For Opera Night, a 72-member orchestra from the Albany and Berkshire Symphonies, soprano Mary Beth Pell and baritone Terrence Dwyer will share the stage. In addition, Dance Society members will perform during two of the numbers.

Since many musicians and soloists must travel substantial distances, one of Roberts' main concerns is that they arrive safely for rehearsals and concerts. "I fear snow more than anything else," he explained. "Power failures would be another major problem."

Avoiding catastrophe He added that the Society has been lucky in avoiding such catastrophe-like situations. Last year a snowstorm occurred the night before a major concert, but "people got here anyway. It was a little scary," Roberts recalled.

Roberts estimates that 1400 students have sung with the Society since it began. The

Roberts says that Hummon "resembles more a piano player-songwriter (which he is) than an elusive, opportunistic split end (which he also is)."

Real heavy stuff

The Times also accented Hummon's music. "He's gifted in music," the Times quotes Head Coach Bob Odell as saying. "He plays real heavy stuff on the piano."

All these accolades, of course, are for Hummon's role in the gridders' spectacular comeback over Wesleyan last Saturday. With the ball on the 33 yard line and only 11 seconds left, QB B. J. Connolly, '84, completed two passes to Hummon for a total of 67 yards, with Hummon diving into the endzone for the winning score with no time left.

"Shaun fainted"

The Globe's Roberts asked Hummon how he felt about the play: "Kind of scary for a moment," he (Hummon) admitted. "I couldn't get off the ground because my whole team piled on me and then the crowd rushed out of the stands on top of them. In fact, halfback Shaun (sic) Crotty was right next to me under the pile and he fainted."

FUMBLE—and Amherst recovers. This typified the day for the Williams gridders in their 52-26 defeat by Amherst Saturday. (Farley)

Harriers finish sixth Field hockey standouts honored

by Mark Averitt

The men's cross-country team, although they were completely healthy for the first time all year, could do not better than sixth in the Division III New England in Boston Saturday.

Bright spots for the Ephmen were John Nelson 26th at 25:53 and Bo Parker (who has been bothered by leg injuries all season) recovering to take 28th at 25:54.

The race was also the Qualifier for the NCAA's, but no Williams runner qualified for further competition.

Coach Peter Farwell had expected that his team might surpass its previous high finish of fifth in this meet, but pointed to the weather as a factor:

"It was a rainy day; a bad day to run," Farwell said. "Some guys run well in the mud, but for some reason our guys don't. The competition was awfully tough—it had to be when Nelson runs so well and comes in 26th."

Brandeis, as expected, won the meet, with Colby in second and Bates in third.

"You've got to remember," said Farwell, "we just missed coming in fourth. MIT and Southeastern Mass. just edged us out by a few points. There was a tight pack in the 25 through 40 spots, and if (Dan) Riley or Ian (Brzezinski) could have outkicked a couple of people..."

Williams' major accomplishment of the season was their successful defense of the Little Three Championship. This is the thirteenth consecutive year that Williams has outrun Wesleyan and Amherst to win it.

With five of their top six runners coming back next year (Riley is the exception) Farwell expects an even stronger club in the future.

Junior Dorothy Briggs, sophomore Emily Sneath, and freshman Carrie Cento have been selected to be on the Northeastern Intercollegiate Athletic Conference (NIAC) All-Star field hockey team.

The three Williams players competed in an open tryout from the twenty colleges that are members of NIAC; eleven players were selected.

This is Briggs' third year on the NIAC team. Although normally a defensive player, she is playing attack for the All-Stars. Sneath was also an All-Star last year.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Turnovers, 52-26

by Chris Harned

The football team lost to two traditional rivals Saturday: Amherst and turnovers.

Williams fumbled on the first play of the game, and the Lord Jeffs scored five plays later to take a quick 7-0 edge. Two additional first period turnovers led to Amherst scores, and the Ephs were down 24-0 at the end of the period.

"Everything that could go against us, did," lamented Head Coach Bob Odell. "We were snake-bit."

The second quarter showed much of the same. Amherst drove 63 yards to take a 31-0 edge early in the period. Williams then gave Amherst the ball twice inside the Williams 20 and saw those turnovers become quick Amherst scores.

Can't get started

In the first half the Ephs were unable to establish any type of offensive movement. "Perhaps the thing that hurt us the most was not taking the wind to start the game," explained Odell, "We were unable to set up; going into the wind and on soggy turf." Eph kick-off returners Sean Crotty and Jeff Congdon could only watch as wind carried Amherst kicks into the endzone.

Trailing 45-0, Williams came out throwing after the half. Junior Quarterback B. J. Connolly engineered a quick 80-yard drive to open the half and register the first Eph points. Connolly hit split end Marc Hummon with a 31 yard pass and then fired to halfback Sean Crotty for 49 yards and the score.

Connolly, who completed 17 of 34 passes on the day for 356 yards and 4 touchdowns, opened the fourth period with an 80-yard pass to Hummon and then connected with tight end Paul Coleman on a 5-yard scoring strike.

Solid second half

Williams registered two more final period scores on Connolly passes of 16 and 10 yards to split end John McCarthy. McCarthy, plagued by injuries for much of the season, caught 4 passes on the day for 41 yards.

"We played a solid second half," said Odell. "During half-time, I told them to go out and play ball; to make the score respectable. They sure didn't quit," reflected Odell.

Connolly had one of his biggest passing games of the year, but it wasn't enough. The turnover had once again taken its toll.

Marc Hummon led the Williams pass-catching contingent with 8 grabs for 231 yards, his high for the year.

For the second year in a row, the Little Three title will reside in Amherst, but, with virtually the entire offensive unit returning, the Ephs will stand to alter that trend next year.

Season like a yo-yo

"The season was like a yo-yo, the highs and lows seemed to come on top of each other," reflected Odell. "We've showed the signs of an excellent offensive team; Ted (Thomas) and Sean (Crotty), and the ends (Hummon, Pine, McCarthy, Coleman) were impressive—we were at times outstanding, but had a tendency to self-destruct. As I've said many times, the opponents didn't stop us, we stopped ourselves."

The Ephs finished at 4-4. "It was a funny season, we rose to new heights, but..." said Odell, "sometimes, you've just got to tip your hat and look toward next season."

Women second in New England

by Liz Strelitz

Amidst pouring rain, cold, wind, and deep puddles, the women's cross-country team emerged as second place finishers in the Division Three New England meet held at Franklin Park in Boston this past weekend.

Losing only to Southeastern Massachusetts, Williams defeated the remaining 24 teams in attendance including third-place Bates and fourth-place Middlebury. Both these teams had defeated Williams in the first meet of the season held at Middlebury.

Individual finishers

The Williams runners finished strong amidst a field of 125 competitors. Co-captain Susan Bragdon '83 was the first Williams finisher, placing 13th with a time of 18:55. Bragdon was just 42 seconds behind first-place finisher Eloise Evans of Salve Regina.

Sue Flynn '85 followed closely behind, taking 14th place with a time of 19:07. Mary Keller '86 time of 19:48 took 29th place—an impressive finish in light of injuries that plagued her the first half of the season.

Liz Moore '85 placed 23rd with a time of 20:00. Chinyere Uwah '85 and Lynn Vendinello '84 finished 41st and 44th with times of 20:16 and 20:22, respectively. Williams' seventh runner, Teresa Casey '86, finished in 79th place with a time of 21:22.

Positive feelings

Although none of the Williams women will be advancing to the Division Three Nationals (the stringent qualifying rules allow only the top eight finishers to attend), both Coach Bud Fisher and Co-captain Bragdon expressed positive feelings about the team's performance.

Bragdon felt that all of the Williams runners had run strong races, especially in view of the weather. The runners were able to combat the elements somewhat by wearing purple tights to keep warm during the three mile race.

Fisher felt the second-place victory was especially satisfying considering the fact that sickness and injury had plagued many of the runners throughout the season.

Strong potential

While two of Williams' stronger runners, co-captain Kerry Malone '84 and Margaret Lynch '84, were not able to run in the meet this weekend because of injuries, they will be back next season. With eight of the top nine runners returning next year, Fisher feels the team has the potential for another strong season.

Amherst nips booters again

by Dave Woodworth

The men's varsity soccer team closed out its season with a 2-1 loss to Amherst on Saturday.

The loss was the second of the week to the Lord Jeffs, who had beaten Williams in the ECAC finals last Sunday, and left the Little Three title in Amherst for the fourth consecutive year.

The match was played under miserable conditions, as an all-night rain had left the Amherst field a virtual mudslide. Footing was treacherous for both sides, and an especially sinister puddle near midfield brought rolling balls to a dead stop on several occasions, to the amusement of players and fans alike.

The first goal of the match came at 8:39, as Stephens of Amherst put a ball off the crossbar and into the net. The Jeffs went up 2-0 at the 18:13 mark as Steele booted home a ball that was loose in front of the goal.

Mark Koenig '83 brought the Ephs close when he hit a rocket just beneath the crossbar at 30:31. The play was made possible by Jeff McEvoy '86 and John Campbell '84, who set Koenig up for his shot with two well-executed passes.

Second-half chances

The Ephs pressured the Jeff goal hard at the end of the half, as Dave Nasser '83 hit the post with one shot and Jeff Sutton '83 just missed on a direct kick. The pressure continued at the outset of the second half, but Williams was able to put few of its shots on the net due to the abysmal footing, and thus could not get the equalizer.

Amherst survived the attack, and even managed to mount a few counter-offensives. However, these were faced with the even tougher task of scoring on the Williams defense, led by goalkeeper Ken Rhodes '85 and sweeper Mike Sullivan '84. This, combined with the mud, kept the score at 2-1 until the final.

Second in Little Three

The loss left the Ephs seasonal record at 10-5-1, a considerable turnaround from the 3-8-1 and 3-8-3 marks of the preceding two seasons. With a 1-1 record in Little Three competition, Williams finished second to Amherst, which had previously tied with Wesleyan.

The team will lose nine players to graduation. Captain Aytac Apaydin and Kris Strohbehn were starting backs; Rob Kusel, Marty White, Mark Koenig and Eric Smith were midfielders; and leading scorer Jeff Sutton, Dave Nasser and the injured Willy Stern were forwards.

"We're losing a lot of people, but we'll have a good nucleus next year," Coach Mike Russo said. "Our goalkeeping, especially, should be excellent." Rhodes and Ted Murphy, who had five shutouts this year, are both sophomores.

Rugby finishes undefeated

by Bert Salisbury

The rugby club travelled to Amherst Saturday and on a cold and rainy day of rugby ended up with a 3-3 A-side tie, a 9-6 B-side loss and a 19-3 C-side win.

Though the short, wide pitch was merely rain sodden when the first match started, during the game it turned into a field of mud, which tended to make play more even between the two sides. The A-side scrum was able to outplay and win the ball from their opposing scrum, but the conditions created difficulties for the line.

Vince Durnan '83 was instrumental in the line-outs, doing a great job of outjumping his much taller opponent.

The first score of the game came from an Eric Russell '84 penalty kick, which put the Williams side ahead. But then in the waning moments of the game the Amherst side scored on a drop kick, and the final whistle blew to signify the tie.

B side just misses

B-side encountered the same troubles on the short, muddy field and although Bill Best '83 was able to convert 2 penalty kicks, the side lost 9-6. Duffy Graham '83 and Mike Hellmann '83 did very well on the line, both breaking runs and stopping their opponents. Larry Hebb '83 was kept busy at fullback but did a good job handling the many Amherst kicks.

The scrum showed intense play near the goal line but could not score a try. Jeff Calkins '85 did a good job in the scrum before leaving the game with an injury.

C-side came out for revenge, and their intensity proved fruitful. Playing with a foreign freshman recruit, the Williams ruggers ran over their Amherst opponents. John Skavlem '84 put over a try set up from a run by Mark Evans '85. Jeff Sher '86 also had a try, displaying his winger abilities on a long run through the stunned Amherst defense. Ken Deveaux '85 and Dean Morris '84 added much power to the line both on offense and defense.

The sidelines were crowded with Williams spectators to cheer on the side while the Amherst support was obviously lacking.

Amherst wimps out

After the game, though the Amherst ruggers were hard to track down, they once again showed their inbred hospitality by offering no party. As usual, the day at Amherst did nothing to alleviate the traditional "rivalry".

The WRFC Fall season is now over, and it has proved to be one of the best seasons in the history of the club. Most notable among this season's accomplishments was the winning of the Berkshire Tournament. The WRFC finished the season with an undefeated record 8-0-2.

Frosh constitution causes uproar

by Jeffrey H. Brainard

A proposal to formally define in a constitution the rules for electing Freshman Council officers as well as their duties and responsibilities has raised controversy within the Freshman Council and procedural opposition within the College Council.

The Freshman Council consists of representatives from each freshman entry and plans

Freshman Council President Mammen Mammen claims that only Council members have sufficient knowledge about their peers to elect Frosh leaders. (Scheibe) social events for freshmen throughout the year. Denys Slater '86, a council member and author of the proposal, said he felt the lack of formal guidelines for its officers—president, treasurer and secretary—has created "too flippant an atmosphere" within the council.

"A constitution would be something they could come back to every year," he said. "It would set some reference for the officers. Admittedly, there's a certain amount of bull in the proposal, but I wouldn't have written it if I didn't think it would be useful."

Dean of Freshmen Cris Roosenraad and College Council president Stuart Robinson both said that in the past freshmen officers have been adequately appraised of their duties without the help of a constitution.

The proposal would also open up council elections to the entire freshman class. Traditionally the council has elected temporary officers from its own ranks at its first meeting in September. They serve until November, when permanent officers, also council members, are elected by the council for the rest of the year. This supposedly gives council members time to meet their peers and determine who is best qualified to be the permanent president.

Speech proposed

"I think it's absurd that the freshman class doesn't elect its officers... I've talked to a lot of people who didn't even realize this," Slater said. "The president doesn't have legislative power, but he does affect the social life of the freshmen for the whole year."

But according to Mammen Mammen, the president elected by the council last September, he is not a class president, only the elected president of a campus organization, which happens to be the Freshman Council.

Also, Mammen feels "It is too early in their Williams careers for the whole class to be able to make a judgment on who should be the president... the people who have been going to the meetings are in the best position to know which candidate expresses his views and is most cooperative."

Slater doesn't agree, saying "I don't think by sitting in a meeting you know more about someone than if that candidate made a five-minute speech to the whole freshman class," which is one of the proposals in Slater's constitution.

Year-long project ventures to Egypt

by Sara R. Gross

Williams-In-Cairo, a new study abroad program, huris students from the relative peace of the Purple Valley into the excitement of a nolsy, crowded, dirty Thrd World capital.

Raymond Baker, who has spent five out of the past 15 years in Cairo, and goes to Egypt regularly, is acting director of the program. He outlined the advantages of going to "an overgrown Thrd World city" like Cairo for a year at the program's introductory meeting.

Baker's initial comment was that he can't think of any place in the world that is more different from Williamstown than Cairo. "Coming from Williams," believes Baker, "one is looking for contrast." Baker cautioned interested students that "if you're going to do this, you have to go with the willingness to adjust in all ways."

Baker described Cairo as a "welcome society." Yet the student who goes to Egypt will feel the sharp cultural differences of an older society. "You'll know that you're in a different culture," added Baker. He emphasized to the students that "by definition, you are clearly a foreigner." There are not many foreigners in Cairo, and Baker sees this as part of the Cairo experience.

Baker noted that the Cairo program is unique because it will be based at the American University, a resource not found in other Thrd World countries. "This allows the experience to take place while not interrupting studies," he pointed out. The program offers university courses and an independent but supervised project to be done by students remaining in Cairo for the recommended full year.

Commitment to Gaudino learning

At the center of the program is a commitment to Gaudino experiential learning. Baker explained that "students participate in regular AUC classes and extra-curricular activities with Egyptian students, and they have the opportunity to live in dormitories with Middle Eastern and other foreign students."

Baker stresses that "program participants must therefore have a strong interest in an intercultural learning experience." He advocates that the student be prepared to deal with "the Egyptian as the expert" of his culture and his environment.

The Williams students interested in the program all implied that they expected to learn about themselves and their background. Elizabeth

College Council

Money slashed from budgets

Caught between a Student Activities Tax that has not changed in three years, a flood of new organizations, and inflation, the College Council was unable to meet all the student organizations' budget requests. The gap between requests and available funds was approximately $25,000. After providing for a sustaining fund of $6045 and a College Council allowance of $2500, total recommendations totalled $125,192.

Most Finance Committee recommendations were approved with little or no discussion (for exact allocations, see accompanying table). The Council voted to send the following recommendations back to the Finance Committee; these will be decided next week. Council reconvened on Thursday to consider the remaining allocations, but less than a dozen people attended the meeting, thus precluding any voting.

In publications, Editors-in-Chief Steve Spears and Rich Henderson asked for an increase in the Record's funding to cover a $770 printing debt from last year. They asked for an additional $210 to bring the 1982-83 allocation equal to the 1981-82 Record budget. They cited the historical inadequacy of the Record's allocations.

Speaking as Block W coordinator, Council President Stuart Robinson '83 argued that "Block W is more than just records and pictures" and that Finance "didn't give the thing a fair chance." Both recommendations were returned to the Finance Committee.

At the activist and awareness organizations, only the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition's recommendation was returned. Geoff Mamlet '83, speaking as WAAC's Treasurer, said the group needed more money in order to purchase a videotape of poet Dennis Brutus's presentation last year.

Following an appeal from Jon Tigar '84, Student Activities Board Business Manager, the Council turned back the Finance recommendation for the SAB Coffeehouse. Tigar hoped for an increase in the Coffeehouse allocation. The recommendations for the Mission Art Gallery and Recycling were also returned.

More $ $ $ $ $

The last time the Student Activities Tax was increased, Williams' tuition was $6,900 a year. In the three years since, tuition has risen to $10,731, inflation has stayed in double-digit figures, and many worthwhile campus organizations have sprung up to compete for scarce SAT funds. While the Administration socked us with huge tuition hikes, it "bravely" held the line on the SAT.

Our SAT bears a tremendous burden. With few diversions in Williamstown, and few sources of off-campus funding, the money collected by the SAT becomes all-important to Williams extra-curricular life. The College Council should not have to make drastic budget cuts in scores of sports, clubs, and service organizations. Without sufficient funding for our activities, we have nowhere to turn.

The trustees and Administration should approve an increase in the SAT of at least $10 for next year. If students are going to have to pay more for Williams, a few of those extra dollars should go directly to student activities.

LETTERS

Double Standard

To the editor:

I join John Springer, in his letter to the editor in the Nov. 16 issue, in hoping for the "day when Israel will be viewed by the same standards as are all other nations." Indeed, there is a double standard by which Israel is judged.

A curious and pernicious exercise in selective consciousness ensures that Israel will be singled out and condemned by the world community. With a lack of sense of history, balance, and equity, Israel is subjected to almost constant criticism in the world press and among world governments. It is time that we consider why it is that the world applied one standard to Israel and another standard to all other nations. Tragically, since the moral conscience of the world is silent, Israel will remain a pariah as long as it is denied the rights and privileges of all nations, particularly the most essential right, the right to survive.

The hypocrisy and inconsistency of the world is evident by its embrace of the Palestinian Liberation Organization and its leader Yasir Arafat, and its refusal to acknowledge and condemn the brutal acts of other nations. First, the world must acknowledge the PLO's destructive, terrorist character. Unrestrained PLO activities ignited the Jordanian Civil War in 1970. PLO disruption within southern Lebanon was a primary cause of the Lebanese Civil War. The PLO has committed numerous terrorist acts against civilians, including: the 1970 bombing of a Swissair jet, resulting in 47 dead; the 1972 massacre of Lod Airport in which 26 died; the murder of 11 Israeli Olympians in Munich in 1973; the murder of 24 children gunned down at Ma'alot, Israel in 1974; the massacre of 36 persons in a bus attack near Tel Aviv in March, 1978; the murder of 2 children and 2 adults in Nahariya in April, 1979. Second, the world must confront the terror and brutality of other nations. Where was the public outrage and world condemnation for those responsible for the 100,000 civilians killed in Lebanon's Civil War, for the 30,000-50,000 civilians killed or maimed by Syrian troops since 1976 including the deaths of 10,000 in Hama in March, 1982? Why did the world remain silent when 3,000 Kurds were killed in Sanandaj and 600 in Banah, Iran in 1980? Why doesn't the world protest and condemn those responsible for the killing of civilians in El Salvador and the persecution and murder of members of the Baha'i Faith in Iran?

When the world is willing to confront the reality of PLO terrorism and its unbending commitment to the destruction of Israel, and when the world ceases to be deaf and blind to the atrocities of other nations, then perhaps that will signify progress toward the equal and fair judgment of all nations of the world.

Integrated Jews

To the editor:

As a Jew I was irritated by the unnecessarily provocative tone and language of Stuart Weinstein's recent article. However, I do agree with his point that this College needs more Jewish studies courses. In respect to this I would like to respond to Maryam Elahi's article of November 16.

Paying for pornography

by Elena Bertozzi

On October 27th and 28th members of the Feminist Alliance handed out leaflets to moviegoers as they entered Images Theater. The movie being shown was The Story of O, the classic story of male sadism and female masochism. The leaflets asked people to consider that by purchasing a ticket they are supporting an industry that glorifies and propagating violence against women, and what the existence and popularity of these films indicates about our culture's perception of human sexuality.

The Feminist Alliance is not advocating prudery or censorship; as the leaflet read: "We have no objection to films that portray sexual acts in which both partners are willing participants and neither are demeaned nor insulted by the act." WFA wishes to educate the public about the social implications of pornography and its potentially damaging effects outside of the theater.

The question of whether or not the viewing of violent pornography (particularly films that depict women as desiring or enjoying such violence) increases men's tendency to rape and batter women is a debatable one. However, the WFA strongly believes that it can be a causal factor in actual violence against women and that it creates a generally more permissive attitude for the acceptance of such violence. (from the leaflet)

Images Theater continues to show films depicting violent pornography because Williams students, faculty and staff (in addition to townspeople) attend them. This month they have increased the number of X rated films to three, at least two of which are violently pornographic. If, as individuals and as a community, we refuse to support the film industry and the theaters that portray sexual violence as pleasurable, it is a statement of rejection of the values and attitudes that they represent.

Machines usurp books

by David Desmond

"I don't think we'll want to be reading Yeats from a dot-matrix computer," asserts Phyllis Cutler, the new College Librarian. "I don't see the demise of the book." One day, however, the library's internal records will be paperless.

Cutler sees this development already in practice. "More and more, government and scientific materials are being printed only in machine-readable form," she explains. The library is currently undergoing a program to automate its functions. In less than 10 years, circulation, acquisition and cataloging will be automated in one system.

Automation over print

Cutler finds advantages in the machine-readable bibliographic index over the printed form. One can discover where two subjects intersect—for example, the effect of a disease on a particular animal or the impact of art on social behavior. Sources that one couldn't find on one's own will be retrievable, she predicts.

The moment an article is published it is indexed, eliminating the lag encountered in the Reader's Guide and other indexes. The card catalogue will be obsolete. Terminals will be found everywhere on campus because eventually every building will be connected to the main frame in the library. Cutler expects that "You won't have to come to the library to find out about a certain book."

New Librarian Phyllis Cutler on the job. (Lane)

Closer library links

Once the library's records are automated, Cutler foresees closer ties with the five-college area. Librarians can locate a needed book at any library with automated records immediately and order it through inter-library loan. Currently, the loan system relies to some degree on guesswork. Cutler adds that scholars from all over the country will someday use Williams resources.

Phyllis Cutler is well-equipped to direct the automation process. Before coming to Williams she was assistant university librarian at

Books have binding interest

If your concept of the Middle Ages stops at knights, pestilence and bloody Holy Wars, the current display of late medieval books at Chapin Library in Stetson will give you a broader view of Western culture at that time.

The exhibit includes 35 books and manuscripts produced during the 14th and 15th centuries in Northern Europe. The books range in subject from law to world and national chronicles to devotion and learning. Many represent the first fruits of the invention of the printing press, most notably Johannes Baibus' Catholicism, an encyclopaedia probably printed by Gutenberg himself in 1460.

Classic comics

A hand-colored blockbook illustrating St. John's Apocalypse is described as one of the first "classic comics." Also on display are first editions of Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologiae and Thomas a Kempis' Imitation of Christ, as well as several bibles.

Five illuminated Books of Hours are grouped together so that similarities and differences in decoration and style may be compared. The first account of travel to the Middle East contains the first use of fold-out maps.

Librarian Robert Volz says, "The show demonstrates why the Chapin Library is considered one of New England's chief centers for the preservation and appreciation of documents of our Western culture."

Most of the books are in Latin so you can't read them very well, but the illustrations are comprehensible. Handwritten notes in the margins of several volumes add a touch appreciated by students.

Also at Chapin is a smaller display of poster designs by C. B. Falls, most from his work for the Division of Pictorial Publicity during World War I. Both exhibits will run through the end of December.

Camera eyes poor

by Laura Sellgsohn

The streets of Manhattan provide the background for senior John Small's photographic exhibit at the Mission Park Art Gallery. The display consists of about thirty compassionate, revealing and serious photographs of some of New York's "street people."

Small explained that the exhibit is "meant to be educational. Like any educational experience, it's open to evaluation and interpretation. Basically, I'm trying to bring to Williams a perspective that we don't often see here."

He noted the contrast between the display's audience and the subjects of the photographs. "I'm hoping that Williams students come away with a sense of familiarity and—I don't know if I should say responsibility—at least some knowledge of this kind of social situation," he remarked, observing that a number of students will someday be in a position to help. Small hopes that his exhibition will help to make them sensitive to the "street people" when they reach those positions.

Smali's subject is one with which he has grown up and to which he has been sensitive since well before his father asked him to figure out a Minolta camera in 1975. He explained, "I grew up very close to this—a lot of these people (lived) in my neighborhood. In the richest country on earth, we have street people. It's bizarre."

Small stresses the importance of candid shots. "The photographic quality is enhanced by the spontaneity, the fact that the photos aren't staged." He is careful not to caricature the people he photographs. He sometimes sacrifices promising photos of people whose "peace has been violated too much already . . . you have to have some conscience."

People have to think Reaction to the exhibit, Small reports, is "all positive on the photographs." He added, however, that "I haven't gotten so much reaction on the subject." He reasoned that "people have to think about it—it's very complicated to think about. I want the viewers to interpret, not me to interpret."

Dance stretches ahead

by Kimerer LaMothe

Dance at Williams is in motion. To complement regular dance classes in ballet, modern, jazz, tap and dancersize, the Dance Society will sponsor student performances, schedule master classes, offer a Winter Study dance course and begin a search for a new dance director.

After twelve years as originator and director of the college dance program, Joy Dewey resigned at the end of last year. She nurtured the program from 6 to 25 classes per week and from 60 to 300 participants a quarter. Dewey was also instrumental in starting the dance concert series, encouraging master classes and supporting large, student-choreographed works.

The society is looking for a permanent replacement for her. Meanwhile, Judi Drodz is the Acting Director for the remainder of the year.

Performers travel

The Performing Dance Troupe opened the dance year at the Sweet Brook Nursing Home last month. Led by Marianne O'Connor '83, the eleven students involved choreographed and performed original numbers. They are planning other trips to nursing homes, elementary schools, prisons and hospitals.

Dance Society members also joined with the Choral Society last week to accompany sections of the opera "William Tell." Future performances will include a Winter Study project coordinated and choreographed by O'Connor and the annual Spring Dance concert.

In Other Ivory Towers

Amherst College

Amherst's Homecoming victory over Williams surprised Lord Jeff alumni that they got roaring drunk and destroyed their alma mater, according to a Student editorial titled "Alumni: Grow Up or Stay Home," which was featured in the style section of the Washington Post last week.

"Recalling the worst of their college days, many alumni were back to romp in what they seemed to think was their private playground," the Student claimed. "Drinking irresponsibly, all too many did damage to college dorms and fraternities with puerile delight."

The Student also reported incidents of sexual harassment; in particular, an all-female singing group scheduled to perform at an alumni function was heckled off the stage by alumni singing "lewd" songs.

"It was wild," said Student editorial board chief Brad Campbell. "I woke up Sunday and had to leave my dorm through a broken glass door." He speculated that the alumni were not used to women and that many resented coeducation, which took place in 1976.

Understandably, the Amherst administration was not too happy to hear complaints about the alumni who recently donated $24.3 million in a five-year fund drive. President Julian Gibbs accepted no phone calls, although a man answered his phone and responded, "Write what you want... Go ahead and write just what the students say," according to the Post.

Middlebury College

A group of Jamaican apple-pickers found their schoolbus parked on the lawn of a Middlebury fraternity, reports the Campus.

The Jamaican migrant workers, employed by a nearby apple orchard, drove into Middlebury for their night off. When they returned to their bus, it was missing.

An orchard foreman finally found it on the lawn of Chi Psi fraternity. Suspecting the residents were involved, foreman Rodney Brinkman went inside hoping to find the keys to the vehicle.

One resident recalled, "The apple-picker foremen were giving kids a hard time and making idle threats as to what was going to happen if the keys didn't show up."

Brinkman never found the keys, so he had to hotwire the bus to get the workers home.

Haverford College

What does a college council charged with assembling two-thirds of an apathetic student body do to insure a good turnout? "We're going to do a few things this year, like get the people to come in sweats and sneakers... and have a paper-airplane throwing contest to kick off (the assembly)," explained Haverford's council president Roy Wasserman. Although no one entered the airplane contest, 544 people showed up to produce a quorum.

Uniformity considered in house elections

by Jack Mayher

The Committee on Undergraduate Life discussed further means of tightening their new transfer policy at last Tuesday's meeting.

CUL proposals included limiting transfer groups to single students or pairs, and granting only one transfer per student per career. Not allowing transfers to list their own house as a possible choice was also proposed, in order to eliminate a perceived "safety valve."

The proposals are designed to further discourage transfers solely for improved physical surroundings. They will be discussed at greater length at the next meeting.

In other business, the CUL discussed a Housing Committee report on house officers that proposed standardizing election procedures and terms of office. Proposals include: one-semester terms for presidents, spring semester elections to be held before the first day of fall reading period, presidential elections for the fall term before spring reading period, and elections of other house officers the first week of the fall semester.

"Under this system, there is one officer in charge right away in the fall, but juniors who are away can still run and vote for the other officers," read the Housing Committee proposal.

The Housing Committee also proposed liberal rules on voting. Outgoing seniors can vote because of their knowledge of the house and its members. Incoming sophomores and transfers will also have a say in who will lead them the next year. The CUL will vote on the report next week.

Adventure

Dear '85 pointed out that "sometime in life, I will go to France or England, but Cairo is not a place that you just hop off to on a holiday vacation." Like the other students, Dear sees Cairo as a challenge: "Everything is so accessible to Americans. It's so easy for me now that everything has been fed to me." She hopes to learn about the American culture and "you can't help but learn about yourself as an American in another situation."

Culture shock

Peter Anthony '85, after visiting Cairo this past summer, with his family, explained that through the program the student will be integrated into Egyptian culture. He described the culture shock for an American as enormous: the experience is "kind of like going to Mars."

Steve Farley '85 said he is going to Cairo because he finds something special in being confronted by a completely different situation. He views the Gaudino program as "throwing yourself into a different environment to see how it relates to your own." While in Cairo, Farley wants to be in the midst of the city, and to feel as an Egyptian feels. He stresses that "I won't be in the library; I'll be working close with the people."

For Baker, the program has several aims. The Gaudino experiential dimension makes the program's independent project important. Participants will have the opportunity to get out of the university and do a supervised research project. Baker said that students can "work in a village or with the urban poor, and go where foreigners don't usually get to go." Baker's second aim is broader; the program provides students with the opportunity to go to a non-Western environment.

Baker said that the program is for students who really want the experience of dealing with and being in another culture. It is not just for those interested in Egyptian studies.

Dance stretches—

Last week also featured the first master class of the year when Buzz Miller of the "American Dance Machine" led two jazz and tap classes. Master classes are taught by visiting professional dancers and are open to all students.

Resident ballet

Charles Moulton will introduce his style of modern dance and creative games in February. During Winter Study the Berkshire Ballet will tentatively be in residence for four or five days to teach a choreographed piece for the Spring Dance Concert.

A special Winter Study course in African dance, music, history and anthropology will be taught by Sandy Burton and Jalal Sherif. The two will also offer dance classes open to everyone in African dance technique.

Frosh constitution—

The Committee on Undergraduate Life decided that to make these proposals binding on future freshman classes, the entire student body, not just the College or Freshman Councils, would have to approve them in a referendum, which would probably not occur until next February's general College Council elections. But Slater wanted the election rules changes for this month's Freshmen Council presidential election.

Annoyed, insulted

Some members of the Freshman Council were "annoyed" that Slater took his proposal to the College Council before showing it to them, Mammen said, and thought that the Freshman Council as a whole should have been able to make suggestions before the proposal was submitted.

"They were insulted that their names weren't on it," Slater responded. He said Mammen had cancelled meetings where he would have presented his proposal. Mammen denied this, claiming that Slater's proposal was submitted to the College Council before the November 11 Freshman Council meeting, the first opportunity it would have had after Homecoming to discuss the proposal.

Because the proposed constitution will not affect this year's Freshman Council Presidential elections, and because of the uproar he has precipitated, Slater has withdrawn the proposal, although he may offer it again later.

He denied that the decision to withdraw the proposal implied that he had only submitted it in the first place as a means to getting elected himself. He said he does not want to be president, and that his interest in the proposal "was for the principle of it."

Books mechanized—

Brandels in charge of the science library. At Brandels she was involved in the same type of automation program (conversion to machine-readable records) during the past five years.

The new librarian heralds automation with one significant qualification: "I never want the library to become so automated that person-to-person contact is lost."

Theft detection?

She also worries about losing books. Although Cutler says there are no plans for an electronic theft detection system in Sawyer, she thinks the idea is "worth considering." She has no up-to-date book loss figures, but believes the loss does not have to be statistically high to be considered a problem. Besides the monetary loss, books and periodicals aren't easy to replace. Their absence from the shelves affects both faculty and student research.

The scattered science libraries are a major source of losses. Cutler describes the current libraries as "uncontrolled reading rooms with no reference service."

She states that "in any community, it is the role of the minority to adapt to a system placed for and by the majority." This is false. It is not the duty or "role" of the minority to adapt to the "system" to any extent greater than that necessary to insure the continuation of that system. Rather, it is the proper function of this system of ours to protect the minorities' freedom of individuality. I suggest that Ms. Elahi's worry that the issue of Jewish studies be handled "in a manner inhospitable to all" at the very least reflects a grave misunderstanding of our American system.

At the campus level, it is not at all special privileges for a minority that I advocate. If sufficient interest is shown for any particular field of study then the administration should consider the addition of courses in that field. Offending another minority is thus not an issue because all have the right of petition.

If Ms. Elahi finds the prospect of expanded Jewish studies an act of hostility then I question her intellectual openness and absence of cultural self-centeredness. If she's not interested in Jewish studies then she doesn't have to enroll in them. I'm not arguing for or against Jewish studies as a separate department or sub-department. But surely, expanding Jewish studies, in whatever form, is not hostile or offensive to any liberal-minded person. At the same time other needs, equally valid, must be met. One interest is not exclusive of another; we agree on that.

I find particularly offensive her statement that a Jewish studies major "might isolate Jewish students as they would find a commodious community to take shelter and ignore any possible anti-Semitism." She condemns a commodious (comfortable, serviceable) Jewish community? Really? If anti-Semitism is around, and it is, then the best thing for Jews is the tangible support of our fellow Jews. Surely we Jews at Williams (and for the most part America at large) are not an overly introverted community. To the contrary, we are a very well integrated community, better assimilated than many. Sometimes our assimilation is too successful (in more ways than one) for the liking of a few. A damned-if-you-do, damned-if-you-don't mentality is common in the minds of Jews and non-Jews alike. Jews are often forced to choose in many subtle ways between their Jewish heritage and American assimilation. It is a choice that, for the most part, we should not have to make; for the modern Jew they can coexist, generally without conflict.

America's melting pot should not produce a bland homogeneity; contrarily, diversity is our common strength. I support all minorities (and we are all minorities) explorations into their cultures and history. Ms. Elahi would say she concurs. But Ms. Elahi speaks from a misunderstanding of the significance of plurality and I suspect from a cultural bias that she condemns in others.

Let's get our priorities straight.

David Levy '85

P.S. Please, let's not make this the campus issue of 1982-83!

Appalled

To the editor:
I would like to comment on Maryam Elahi's article "Judaic Studies only partial solution" in the November 16th issue of the Record.

I do not believe that a Middle Eastern area studies concentration is the proper place for Judaic studies. While Judaism was born in the Middle East and developed much of its laws and traditions in that area, and has now experienced a return to the land, there has been an immense wealth of Jewish culture that was a product of the Diaspora. To place all Judaic Studies under the umbrella of the Middle East would necessarily disavow the significance of European and Asian Jewry, as well as the later contributions to Judaism from the West.

When Judaism is a culture as well as a religion (an opinion that most modern Jews hold), then providing a Judaic Studies major can be no more discriminatory than "Forgive me— an Afro-American Studies major. And yes, in this perspective, Judaic studies "cannot be studied outside of its historical... context," but surely, one does not need the justification of Arab-Israeli conflict to study Judaism, as Ms. Elahi implies!

I am appalled that the Religion Department has not seen fit to offer Jewish studies taught by someone trained in the field. With all due respect, Prof. Petersen is a New-Testament scholar (he teaches The Jewish Bible/Old Testament; and Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad—two courses cross-referenced for students interested in Jewish studies) and Prof. Katz is an Eastern Religions scholar (he has been asked to "fill in" with some "Jewish" courses—Contemporary Jewish Thought; and Anti-Semitism, Misogyny, and Racism—also both cross-referenced for Jewish Studies). But why are there no single courses about the Jewish religion that require a semester's time of study? Most other major and not-so-major religions are taught this way. And may I here clarify that Prof. Berk, whom Ms. Elahi mentioned twice in her article, is not a Williams professor; in fact, he will not even be on the Williams Campus until next fall, and then only for a semester, teaching a course that, I feel, should have been instituted as a part of the History Department curriculum years ago.

Several times I have heard the sentiment "Why offer Jewish courses if the Jews don't take them?" This query angers me. Should Russian Cultural History be offered only if students of Russian descent are willing to enroll in the course? Or the Female Body of Imagination (Eng. 377) be open only to female students? What kind of education would we then be offering? I propose that a serious, in-depth Judaic Studies program is deserving of Williams—and any other educational institution with which we like to compare ourselves—in and of itself. Ignorance breeds misunderstanding or dislike of the unknown, and that perpetuates bigotry. Without a serious Judaic Studies program, there can be no real solution to Anti-Semitism as it is felt by the Jewish population at Williams.

I would like to conclude that, although I disagree that Judaic Studies should be included within a Middle Eastern area studies major, I do agree with Ms. Elahi that "more attention (should be) focused on the region as a whole" and that a Middle Eastern major has potential for success here. But please don't push Judaism in with it.

Water polo drowns competition

by Ken Irvine

The men's water-polo team has completed its most successful season ever, culminating in a second-place finish at the Division II Eastern championships.

The Ephmen, led by senior tri-captains Brendan Kiernan, Jeff Mook and Mark Weeks, also won the Division II New England championships for the first time. Williams entered their first Eastern Championships seeded fourth out of the eight teams invited. At the Easterns, Williams faced its stiffest competition of the year, but rose to the challenge in three tough games.

Early victories

In the first game, Williams prevailed over St. Francis College of Brooklyn, the host team, by a score of 12-10. The Ephmen then faced the defending champions, top-seeded Kenyon. In a close game, Williams upset rival Kenyon 10-7.

This victory put Williams in the final against Army. Army is actually a Division I school, but they were allowed to compete because of their poor season in Division I.

Last-second loss

The game was a close one that could have gone either way—with two minutes left the score was tied at ten. However, Army quickly scored three times to defeat the Ephs 13-10.

A key factor in Williams' loss was their numerous personal fouls—they had 15 to the Cadets' three. Mook and Rob Bowman '83 each had six goals in the tournament; other top scorers were Will Andrew '86 with five goals and Jeff Mills '84 and Weeks with four apiece. Mook, Bowman, Andrew and Kiernan were all selected to the All-Eastern second team.

New England Champs

In the New Englands, which were held at M.I.T., Williams overpowered opponents Trinity, Boston University, and Iona; faltering only in the second game when they allowed B.U. to come within one goal, defeating them 11-10. In the final game, however, Williams played good solid water-polo, trouncing top-seeded Iona 20-13.

Mook was named the Most Valuable Player of the tournament. Mook, Weeks and Kiernan also made the All-New England team; Mills and Andrew made the second team.

Win next year

A tough, tight defense, backed up by goalie Kiernan, has been a key factor in the Ephs' victories throughout the season.

The team will be graduating four starters—Bowman, Kiernan, Mook, and Weeks—and while they will be missed (at least in the water), the Ephmen's depth should enable them to put together another excellent team next year, when they plan to win the Easterns.

Coach Curt Tong might be giving the basketball team Spanish lessons in Lasell Gym in preparation for the team's trip to Cuba over Winter Study.

Hoopsters go to Cuba

by John Clayton

Varsity basketball players are looking forward to more than the opening of the season next week—the team will be travelling to Cuba to play three games over the New Year.

The trip will be part of a special group "99" for the players, led by Political Science Professor Carlos Egan.

The team, optimistic coming off a 12-10 season last year, will probably be without star center Steve O'Day for the entire season, due to a busted ankle.

Burden of leadership

Without O'Day, the burden of leadership will fall heavily on fellow captain Scott Oleson. "With Steve gone," said Coach Curt Tong, "we'll have to rely a lot more on Scooter (Oleson). He will have to score more, rebound more, and we will rely on him defensively."

O'Day, however, is not the only hobbled hoopster. Junior Art Pidorianno, the team's big-scoring guard, has had only two full practices all fall due to knee problems.

"Artie has had problems all fall," said Tong, "and we just have to give him time to get over the injury. He should be ready for Hamilton (the Ephmen's first game, away on December first), although he will not be fully effective."

Cuba trip

The team will leave for Cuba on December 27, returning January 7 for a game the next day. They will play three exhibition games against Cuban teams while there.

No scrimmages

The team will know little about game situations until the Hamilton game because they have no scrimmages this year. The New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) only allows 24 games per season. With 21 regular season games and three in Cuba, the Ephs have no room left for scrimmages.

Tong is returning from a one-year sabbatical in Japan, taking over the team coached by Athletic Director Bob Peck last year. This year, Peck will be an assistant coach along with Erv Chambliss, who will coach the junior varsity team.

Williams went 12-10 last year, tying with Wesleyan for second in the Little Three. However, their season included some big games, including back-to-back victories over Clark and Tufts when those teams were ranked tops in New England.

The team lost two starters—captains Al Lewis and Jeff Fasulo—from that team, as Oleson, O'Day and Pidorianno are the returning starters.

Who'll play where?

With O'Day gone, Tong will probably switch Oleson to center (at 6'4", Oleson played some center his sophomore year). That leaves two forward spots to be filled. Leading candidates for these positions are seniors Andy Goodwin and John Ormsbee, juniors John McNicholas and Dave Krupski, and sophomore Tim Rives.

With Pidorianno at shooting guard, junior Ed Schmidt and sophomore Pete Griffith should battle for the starting point guard position. Both are extremely quick and talented; Schmidt has more experience while Griffith has explosive natural talent.

Two freshmen are playing varsity this year—forward Mike Meadows and guard Tim Walsh. "We know they're talented enough to be practicing with us," said Tong. "We don't know how they'll do in game situations, and won't until the season starts."

Hobbled skaters ice alums

by Dave Woodworth

The men's varsity hockey team closed out its preseason with an overwhelming 15-3 romp over the alumni squad at Lansing-Chapman rink on Saturday.

The contest was not quite as lopsided as the score would indicate, since the varsity got most of its goals in bunches near the end of the periods, when the not-as-well-conditioned grads were worn down.

In action earlier this week, the Ephs split a scrimmage with Dartmouth, winning the first half by a 7-5 margin and dropping the second, 6-0. Dartmouth combined its varsity and JV teams for the scrimmage. Brian Rutledge '85 had three goals and frosh Joe Sciacca added two in pacing Williams to the first-half triumph. Goalie Dan Flinn '84 made 38 saves in an impressive performance.

The scrimmage took its toll, however, as the Eph skaters ended up looking like a M*A*S*H unit. Greg Pachus '84 and Peter Dombrowski '85 were sidelined by severe charleyhorses and sophomore Mike Uretsky suffered a badly strained shoulder.

Injuries lead to loss

Coach Bill McCormick felt that these injuries contributed to the second-half loss. "I don't like to make excuses," said McCormick, "but the injuries certainly didn't help us."

He hoped to have a completely healthy group for the season opener against R.I.T. in the Williams Invitational next weekend, but these hopes were dashed when Sciacca dislocated his shoulder in practice this week.

The Ephs will still be deep, as 14 lettermen return from last year's team, led by senior co-captains Bob Brownell and Sam Flood. There will be some new faces as well, as six freshmen will see varsity action.

New uniforms

Williams will also have a new look in terms of uniforms, going to the "sweatpants" style popularized by the Philadelphia Flyers instead of the more traditional knee-length shorts.

Reaction to the new uniforms on the part of the players was varied. "I really like them," said Jeff Potter '85. "The pads don't slip around so much, so there's less chance of getting injured." However, other players voiced disapproval, saying they looked funny.

McCormick optimistic

McCormick was optimistic about his team's prospects for the season. "The first part will be tough, as non-NESCAC schools like R.I.T. have a two-week head start on us in terms of both practice and games. It will place a burden on us, but we're aware of it and hopefully can work hard enough to overcome it. Once we get a few games under our belts, we should be all right."

Booters break records

Despite losing their last two games to Amherst, the soccer team had a remarkable record-breaking season.

With a record of 10-5-1, the team broke the all-time Williams record for wins in a season.

Senior Jeff Sutton, the team's leading scorer with eight goals and six assists, tied the record for points in a season with 14.

Goolie Ted Murphy, who started eleven of the team's sixteen games before a severe charley horse forced him out of the Amherst contests, just missed the record for shutouts. Murphy had five; the record is six.

Figures indicate average numbers of bacterial colonies discovered in tests of at least four utensils. State law requires counts of less than 100 colonies per utensil. Where two figures are given, the first is for the Oct. 9 test, the second for the Oct. 16 test. The two Greylock lines were tested separately only on Oct. 16.

"No hazard"

Dining halls fail

Four out of five campus dining halls failed sanitary tests on October 9 and 16, according to Williamstown Health Department reports. Tests for contamination revealed that some utensils contained 600 times the maximum number of bacterial colonies allowed by state law.

Greatest contamination was found at Driscoll and Greylock dining halls, while Mission Park passed and Dodd House had several minor infractions, according to the October 9 report. Both the north and south lines of Baxter, tested October 16, failed as well.

According to Health Department Commissioner Michael Muzyka, samples were taken from each kitchen and analyzed in the Health Department's lab. Results indicate an average bacterial count from at least four samples for each utensil.

In response to these reports, Food Service Director James Hodgkins stated, "I don't think people should be alarmed. This is in no way a health hazard." He went on to say that the bacteria were "not harmful."

Muzyka agreed, saying that although the results indicated disease could be transferred easily, "we haven't had any epidemics and the situation is now under control."

The primary cause of the contamination, according to Muzyka, was that dishwasher temperatures were not "exceedingly high." He explained that a "sanitizing temperature" of at least 180 degrees Fahrenheit is necessary to insure cleanliness. The College Food Service, he noted, had just changed to a new heating system and conversion may have caused temporary difficulties.

Hodgkins explained that all problems with sanitary control have been corrected. He pointed to a faulty gauge as the cause of problems at Driscoll, and stated that at all dining halls, "The margin of safety is great." He went on to say, "Inspections are a help to us" because they help "maintain safety."

A new inspection has just recently taken place, according to Muzyka, and results have not yet been tabulated.

Men's world found boring

by Christian K. Howlett

Radical feminist/theologian Mary Daly called upon women to break free from what she called the male-dominated "sado-society" and to find the courage to "name the enemy"—men—through a sense of collective moral outrage at the atrocities which she said have been committed against women.

Daly, an associate professor at Boston College and author of Gyn/Ecology, addressed a standing-room-only crowd in Thompson Chapel Thursday night. Although her words were aimed specifically at women, especially those familiar with her writings, the crowd was a fairly even mix of men and women. Daly, however, refused to answer any questions from men, as is her custom.

We are living in "a period of extreme danger for women," Daly warned. "Women are imprisoned in the 'touchable' caste," and are touched by rape, battering, gynecology, sexual abuse, seductive romance, religion, and "all the 'ologies' of patriarchy."

Four get tenure, three denied

Last week's tenure decisions by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions resulted in four positive and three negative recommendations. The CAP will officially announce its decisions in January, when the trustees cast the deciding vote. The trustees usually approve CAP recommendations automatically.

Recommended for tenure were Kim Bruce of the Mathematics department, Edward Epping of the Art department, assistant Sociology professor G. Robert Jackall and Markes Johnson of the Geology department.

Not tenured were assistant Political Science professor David Colby, Patrick Stewart of the Art department and Robertson Williams of the Economics department. There were no women among this year's candidates.

Tenure status was apportioned primarily to faculty in those departments with fewer tenured members. The art department has five tenured faculty, but only one of these teaches studio art, as does Epping. Stewart teaches art history. Other newly tenured faculty's departments all had four or fewer tenured professors; departments with a greater number added no new members.

No comment
Most of the candidates had no comment. Williams, however, bluntly said of the decision concerning his own career, "I don't like it." Williams said the College's emphasis on three criteria—teaching, research and community activities—was "wrong," noting that he had "spent more time on teaching than research, which is appropriate to a place like Williams." The economist said his research in housing, welfare, and health was "not up to their [the College's] standards."

Williams also said that the school places emphasis on all three criteria—"It's not enough to be extraordinary in one." As a result, he felt, "you get some professors who are not extraordinary anywhere."

New OCC head to broaden options

by Lucy Lytle

A two month nation-wide search for a new director for the Office of Career Counseling ended this week when Fatma Kassamali was appointed to the position. Kassamali, whose aim is "to meet the needs of a wider range and variety of students" by promoting non-traditional programs as well as those which recruit for business, was selected by a student-faculty committee appointed by President of the College John Chandler.

Judith Allen, Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations, chaired the committee, which considered over two hundred applications before making its final decision. Allen described Kassamali as "uniquely qualified for the position in terms of knowing Williams College and the college community as well as the Office of Career Counseling and its operations." Kassamali was the assistant director of the OCC prior to Barbara-Jan Wilson's departure last October, at which point she was named acting director until a permanent director could be found.

Kassamali hopes to use her new position "to promote the philosophy of a liberal arts education. Students should enjoy a liberal arts college to the fullest without feeling any anxiety about their future careers." Accordingly, career counseling will concentrate primarily on juniors and seniors while freshmen and sophomores will receive advice on internships and summer job opportunities.

In an effort to increase the number of opportunities available to students, Kassamali intends to invite to Williams various representatives of programs that "are not 'traditional' careers for Williams students—such as organic farming, graphic artistry, movie editing, and advertising."

OCC ready for anything

The importance of a career counseling service, particularly at a liberal arts college like Williams, was stressed both by Kassamali and search committee members. Allen spoke of the "enormous contribution" of the OCC, adding that it takes on a greater significance "as students become more concerned about their futures in these difficult economic times and they feel pressure from their parents to think about what they will be doing after college."

Kassamali stressed that the major function of the OCC "is to counsel students and prepare them to pursue endeavors of interest. The job placement part is only one of the components of the OCC." She cited the Extern Shadow Program, "counselors who are well-equipped to counsel at any level," a "resource library that has anything and everything that we can think of for career orientation," and strong alumni support and participation as particular strengths of the career counseling program at Williams.

Editors resign in disgrace

Record editors Steve Spears and Rich Henderson resigned their positions last Sunday in a desperate attempt to redeem the Record's honor over the fall "term paper ad" scandal. Managing editor Bob Buckner followed their example, claiming that "There is no way we can redeem ourselves, but perhaps we can save the newspaper."

Just kidding.

Since this was the annual transition week anyway, the three editors were prepared to announce the promotions of juniors Dan Keating and Jon Tigar to Co-Editors-in-Chief. Junior Sara Ferris and sophomore Michael Govan will become managing editors when the promotions take effect in January.

Keating started at the Record during his freshman year, working as a sports writer and layout assistant. He became Assistant Sports Editor the following semester. Most recently Keating served as Op-Ed editor.

Tigar began his freshman year writing for the Record news department. In his second semester he became assistant news editor. Tigar worked for one semester as Outlook editor before assuming the job of co-news editor at the beginning of this year.

"Dan has a wide range of talents and wonderful rapport with the staff," said Henderson. "And he's bigger than us," added Spears.

"Jon is a fine journalist with a good sense for community relations," said Spears. "But basically we hope that he'll have the staff dancing to weird noise and wearing feather earrings by the spring," explained Henderson.

Managing editor Ferris also began with the Record in her freshman year, working her

Looking for trouble—the wrong place

by Daniel F. Titter '54

Recently a classmate of mine, whose son recently graduated from Williams, and not incidentally is Jewish, as am I, passed along a copy of Stuart Weinstein's disturbing "J'accuse" on anti-semitism at Williams. Because I have been both Jewish and a member of the Williams community, past and present, a few seasons longer than Mr. Weinstein, I thought my views might offer him and your readers a measure of perspective. ITEM: I am reminded of the bland White House incumbent of my era at Williams, one D.D. Eisenhower, whose plous hope was that prejudice would only be cured in the hearts and minds of . . . you name 'em. I submit to Mr. Weinstein that anti-semitism has been pandemic for more years than he and I have been on this globe, and that no cosmetic appointment from above of a spiritual advisor will alter the face of bigotry within individuals who are its practitioners.

ITEM: Jews have distinguished themselves at Williams and beyond throughout this century and before, and the earliest name that comes to mind without research is that of the revered Herbert Lehman (Williams '99) who ornamented American public life both as Governor of and Senator from New York. I can immediately think of three major Williams facilities donated by and named for Jews. At no time did they or their friends suggest that their love for the College was weakened by some imagined or real anti-semitism present there.

ITEM: The organization which Mr. Weinstein heads did not exist during my four years at Williams, though well over fifty of my classmates were identifiably Jews. The hated fraternity system, which did not include any Jewish houses, managed to include Jewish students at nearly all its units, which does no particular honor to the system, but rather to the general Williams community. Perhaps speaking most pointedly to the sense of belonging that began at Williams and has continued over the years is the fact that among the classes I have known best (1950-1957) Jews have consistently held class offices in disproportionate numbers to their population as

Williams graduates, or even non-graduates, not excluding membership on the Board of Trustees and, in particular, indulging one of the most popular Alumni Fund Chairmen in Williams history. Most of the people of whom I speak did not have the benefit of a Williams College Jewish Association, a kosher kitchen, a resident chaplain or a major in Judaic Studies, nor did it enter their minds that such addenda to the educational foundation of one of America's great institutions was a sine qua non to their existence as Williams students or as Jews.

We are informed that any failure to comply with the Weinstein laundry list of remedies . . . will subject Williams to the dustbin of history.

ITEM: I have not consulted with Phil Smith on the admissions issue that Mr. Weinstein raises. I am happy that he does not allege any sort of quota system, since I have been trying to dissipate that fiction among ignorant friends and non-friends for years. If a Jewish secondary student applies to Williams, is admitted, but chooses to go elsewhere, is this an indictment of Williams, or a symptom of his (or her) malaise in not having known what he (or she) wanted in the first place? That one out of five figure, incidentally, is one that I, frankly, do not accept, unless Mr. Weinstein has access to figures that are not normally available to the public.

ITEM: The admissions imbroglio raises another question that is much more germane to the Weinstein thesis. What kind of school did he envision when he applied? The catalogue and other literature are available to anyone who makes inquiry. Williams has been and remains a small liberal arts college, not an educational supermarket with courses available to suit every taste in disciplines. Engineering and business administration majors are not available. A host of other subjects are not available, such as Arabic, physical education administration and communications. These gaps in the catalogue do not lessen the impact of Williams on American education; they merely say that Williams is a particular kind of quality institution, limited in resources and goals. I recently spent three years in one of four New York universities that offer Judaic Studies. Is it the duty of Williams to duplicate their catalogues? And at what cost?

ITEM: I am at a loss to understand the contention of Mr. Weinstein that Williams cannot be considered to be committed to the communal needs of its Jewish students unless or until it has specifically budgeted for sundry items that he considers essential. I venture to guess that not every Jewish student is experiencing a diaspora within a diaspora by the absence of a rabbi from the College payroll, from the lack of a Judaic Studies department, or from the failure to meet specific dietary needs. The latter, by the way, is a condition Mr. Weinstein may find duplicated in about 99% of the colleges and universities of the world; what led him to expect Williams to be in the vanguard in fulfilling this need of a minority?

ITEM: I discern a refreshing change from the agenda of Mr. Weinstein from some previous ideas brought to the College. These, at least, do not come in the form of non-negotiable demands. What seems to me dismaying is a failure to appreciate that in an imperfect world, where even idealism has a price tag, Williams performs a mission that is badly needed and splendidly fulfilled. To condemn the College in rhetoric that sheds all heat and no light for what it has not attempted and could not hope to fulfill may serve inflammatory journalistic ends, but it creates an issue that is meritless in fact.

The President of Williams, whose theological background is more complete than that of his opposite numbers elsewhere, must be relieved to learn that Mr. Weinstein doesn't place the blame entirely at his doorstep. He is merely informed that any failure to comply with the Weinstein laundry list of remedies to what he perceives as anti-semitism will subject Williams to the dustbin of history. As Torquemada put it: we don't demand that you renounce Judaism and abandon your way of life, merely that failure to convert to Christianity will condemn you to the pyre. I wonder if Mr. Weinstein has, in his philosophy courses or elsewhere, encountered what the late George Santayana had to say about history.

Williams, it may surprise Mr. Weinstein to learn, made full disclosure to me of its merits and defects, and I chose to attend. I have rejoiced in that choice for many years. It was not forced upon me, nor was it, I take it, upon Mr. Weinstein, whose discomfort appears to me to be of his own making.

Nazi images in feminism

by Brett McDonnell

The recent speech by the ultra-feminist Mary Daly should disturb all lovers of the open society. In her speech, and in the reaction of many people to her speech, I see frightening similarities to Nazism. The analogy is not perfect, certainly, but it is there.

This is a serious charge. It should not be made idly. The slur "fascist" is used much too often today. Comparisons to the Holocaust are also made too often, as seen on both sides in the Lebanon controversy. This has the effect of trivializing one of the two greatest horrors in history. The reader should thus exercise great care in judging my thesis and note the reservations I make.

That said, the similarities remain. The fanaticism of Daly resembles Hitler. To one who is not a believer already, she even seems funny. "Phalocracy," "penocracy," and "God the Stud" are phrases suited for a Monty Python sketch on feminism, not serious political analysis. Hitler too seems absurd to the outsider.

Daly is trying to develop a unifying spirit among women, a spirit which unites them in praising womanhood to high heaven (sorry, forgot about God the Stud) and condemning men as heinous villains. Dare I call this spirit a Volkgeist?

Daly's hatred of men seemed so extreme, so neurotic, that I must compare it to Nazi hatred of the Jews. At one point Daly discussed her criteria for whether men deserved to live. It seemed clear to me that she thought most men did not meet those criteria. Saying a group does not deserve to live does not yet mean saying they should be killed, but it is a necessary first step. I hope I have misinterpreted Ms. Daly, but I fear that I have not. I should point out that the dislike of men is at least somewhat better grounded in reality than the "Protocols of Zion," but it would be infinitely better to attack the system of male domination, rather than condemning virtually all men as inhuman.

One element of the Nazi movement emphasized by Hannah Arendt in The Origins of Totalitarianism is the concentric circles of believers gathered around Hitler. There was an inner core of party higher ups, several levels of belief within the party, and then fellow traveler groups outside the party which served to draw in large segments of the society which would never have accepted the naked fanaticism of Hitler's views. This system both broadened the base of support for the Nazis and isolated the true believers from the real world.

Doesn't this resemble the modern feminist movement? This is what frightens me about the reaction to Daly. I have talked to and heard of many people who thought that Daly was too extreme, but the basic thrust of her argument was sound. Don't these people serve the same function of softening up a vile doctrine for mass consumption? Luckily, I doubt the feminists are anywhere near as well or closely organized as the Nazis and their fellow travelers.

I doubt Daly or her ilk will ever seize power (thank that Stud!). She is attacking a larger and more powerful group than Hitler and economic circumstances are not nearly as bad in this country as in Weimar, Germany. Furthermore, Daly as a speaker does not even begin to approach the demagogic power of Hitler. Still, remember that the Nazis seemed small, silly, and unimportant in 1925.

As I have pointed out, the comparison between Daly's feminism and Nazism is not exact. Daly's lack of widespread organization and a calculated plan for seizing power being the most significant difference. Still, both promulgate a doctrine of hate which singles out one segment of humanity as inhuman. In the past I have supported feminism, but if feminists do stand up and say "We reject this woman's hate" then I must reconsider my position. Smart feminists have always known that the present system hurts men as well as women, and that women's liberation is really human liberation. I hope Mary Daly, with her hate-mongering and polarization, does not make us lose sight of that.

Dutchman excels at task

by Ric Johnson

The production of Dutchman put on by Cap & Bells last Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday was a good and uncomfortable experience. This was a deliberate and successful approach to the play. Dutchman takes place on a subway train and revolves around the conversations and posturings about racism and classism occurring between a conservatively dressed young black man and a mysterious and ultimately threatening white woman.

Greylock subway

The setting for the work as a whole was clever and effective. The basement of Greylock, which was converted into a subway station, was an excellent spot for the production. Appropriately stark and dreary, the addition of a newsstand, trash, advertisements, graffiti, and a street musician encouraged the belief that one was part of an 'environment', not merely in a theater.

Margie Duffield's excellent direction gave this performance both versatility and subtlety. The production opened with a film, by Nancy Simon, of a New York subway station. In this medium the two protagonists are first introduced.

She kills him

After the film introduction, Clay (the black man) and Lula (the white woman) have their encounter. They meet, spar verbally, and grapple on the train. In the course of their interaction, she indicates that she knows him before he tells her of himself. He is a type, she says. His blistering reply is that she knows nothing of him, nothing of blackness. Finally, after bursts of violence and preaching, she kills him.

The play talks about racism and indicates that whites have no right to presume to understand how black people cope with this fact in their lives. This was brought out very well by the confrontations between Clay and his predominately white audience. In this way, the audience, which was clearly part of the set (as the crowd in a subway train), was also implicated as part of the racist community which had produced both Clay and Lula. Karin Miller gave a convincing performance as the racist but alluring woman who goads Justin Johnson, as Clay, into his verbal explosion.

Weak creative base

The only real source of the minor problems lies in Baraka's play itself. It is clearly a vehicle for his ideas about racism. While this gives the work a solid intellectual and political base, it weakens it as a creative effort. Most of the few flaws in this unusually good production derive from weaknesses inherent in the play material.

The acting was good, but the parts did not include great range. However, Karin Miller and Justin Johnson explored their roles well and gave energetic interpretations of them. What made this production particularly good was the direction.

Margie Duffield showed both sensitivity to the material and creativity in its presentation. The set was interesting, and the films were a clever accent to the play. The acting was successfully confrontational (with the audience), and the pacing was good. It was a well-conceived and interestingly presented show.

Outing Club director Jim Briggs '60 has big plans for the popular student organization this year.

Most popular club still growing

by Martin Hildebrand

The Williams Outing Club is the biggest student organization on campus, but few students know the full range of its activities. Recently, the Record interviewed Outing Club director Jim Briggs '60 and president Blake Martin '84 to get an idea of what exactly the club is doing this year.

We want to ask you a few questions about how the Outing Club has changed from last year to this year.

Briggs: One real change is that I've taken over from Ralph Townsend, who was here since 1950 and has got to be one of the world's greatest, people, funnest guys, and is a wonderful, wonderful person. We all miss him.

This year, I have planned some new things that reflect my interests and the interests I think the students have. In particular, with the Sunday hikes and simple, Friday afternoon hikes, and with beginning Physical Education classes is to involve students who are not necessarily hikers or canoeists or campers before they came to Williams.

What are the winter activities of the Outing Club?

Briggs: In the winter, particularly during Winter Study, we are extremely active. We run P.E. courses in downhill and cross-country skiing. Downhill skiing is our biggest taker. Last year, we probably had 400 skiers in downhill skiing. The thing that's unusual about this program is that we instruct students who become instructors of the other students. We also do the downhill and cross-country skiing in the third quarter.

Jazz bands blast Berkshires

by Mark Averitt

How do you describe a good evening of top-notch jazz? The concert given on Saturday evening by the Williams Jazz Ensemble and the Berkshire Big Band was brassy and sassy, jumping and pumping, full-blast, fast, and unabashed, tippy-turvy, saucy, nervy, bossy, swinging, ringing, quivering and quavering, spicy, feisty, jiving and be-bopping.

The crowd of about 150 people which milled in and out of Chapin throughout the concert snapped their fingers, danced in their seats and smiled. I heard one person say to another, "Long live jazz!"

Loud and proud

The audience clapped for the soloists, clapped for the Duke and Count Basie and Dizzy Gillespie and Buddy Rich, and mostly clapped for two groups which had brought that Big Band sound back to Williamstown. The Williams Jazz Ensemble, an eighteen-member group directed by Dan Gutwein, opened the evening of music with a bang. They played groovy, happy tunes as well as slower, lugubrious music, alternating the loud and proud with the soft and sappy.

Phil Tucher '86 blew a mean horn during the trumpet solos, and Martha Platt '83 rocked the rafters with her versatile saxophone. The duet that these two blared together was perhaps the peak moment of a show that featured one rhythmic thrill after another.

Marc Mazzone '84 ran the gamut of trombone tones, and Peter Anthony '85 was a magician on the keyboard. Anthony is the student leader of the group which practices twice a week in order to perform one concert and one party appearance per semester. Not every member of the group is a Williams student—one trombonist hails from Pittsfield, where he also works.

Versatile Band

The Berkshire Big Band is a local professional group directed by Steve Murray. Gutwein, a brilliant musician, displayed his handiness in a band by blowing a soprano sax, a tenor sax, and a flute for the Berkshire group and playing every number with verve and feeling.

Like the Jazz Ensemble, the Berkshire Big Band treated its listeners to an encore and left the stage with wild applause ringing in their ears. Their melodies waxed brazenly and waned into the soothing sounds of the drum and the bass guitar. This group featured an outstanding female vocalist who thrilled the audience with an arrangement of "The More I See You," done by John Talarico, probably the outstanding musician in the Berkshire area.

If you missed the concert, you missed, as Gutwein pointed out, "a rare treat for the Berkshire valley—two hours of jazz." However, you can catch the Jazz Ensemble in action this Wednesday at a party in Tyler house. They'll have you shaking and baking all over the dance floor. Long live jazz!

Trivia strikes again

The computer age has come to Trivia. On Tuesday night, those of you who stay up to flaunt your knowledge (or just to have a good time) will hear the current scores within one or two songs after the turn of the hour.

Local 12 has over 150 questions, excluding the bonuses, to accompany the computer scoring, according to Jeff McIntosh '84. "We have some really inspired questions," explained McIntosh, "And those that aren't really inspired have fun answers."

Questions are taken from the realms of movies, television, sports, comics, advertising, Williamsiana and miscellaneous. Points are given both for answering questions correctly and identifying the song played after each question. In addition, hourly bonuses offer high-scoring opportunities.

Big ones light

McIntosh predicts the music will mostly be taken from the 1960's, with some '70s and "maybe a 1950's tune or two." He anticipates that three or four big teams will fight it out in the late hours for the title.

The second and third place teams from last year, Spanish Inquisition and Paul Lynde to Block, have merged into a yet-unnamed team. Rob Kent '84 is confident about his team's chances. "We're going for it," he remarked. "Our chances are good, because we don't have any perceptible weaknesses."

Popular club goes on—

This winter we are also going to have some cross-country ski trips, which will be camping trips. We will have the Outing Club cabin open on Saturdays, heated with our wood-burning stove as best we can, for those who want to cross-country ski in the Hopkins Forest and on our new Shepherd's Well Trail which the trail crews cut this fall. It's a brand new trail, cut by the Outing Club, with one of the most gorgeous views I've ever seen.

How do you feel about being situated right next to the mobs in Baxter at lunch-time?

Briggs: That's a good question. The Outing Club has space in various spots all over the college for storage and all kinds of things.

On one hand, I don't like that. I like to be more centrally located to get all our stuff together. We can't do that here (in Baxter). On the other hand, we are very accessible here to all students, and because it is the biggest club on campus, students need to have it available.

For an inside student's view of the Club, the Record then talked to Blake Martin.

I hear the Outing Club this year is a very popular group. About how many people have joined it?

Martin: So far this year, we have over 250 members and usually end somewhere around 500. We usually pick up a lot of people over the winter for the ski program.

Have you noticed an increase in interest for the Outing Club?

Martin: Yes, especially this year. It seems like we're off to a better start—A lot more publicity this year for some of the things we are doing and a lot more things for people who have not had much experience in the outdoors.

About how many people do you think will get involved during Winter Study?

Martin: I'd say about a third of the campus will do something for the Outing Club, either renting equipment, taking the ski busses, or doing something for Winter Carnival.

What's being planned?

Martin: I guess I got put in charge of that. This is really neat. We're really excited about it.

There are 8 home dates for the sports teams, the ski races will hold out at Brodie Mountain, and the cross-country ski races. Teams from all over New England come. We sponsor that, run the gate-keepers, do all the timing, award the prizes, show the teams their lodging, and organize the whole thing.

The most fun is that this year we are going to have a citizen's race in cross-country skiing on Cole Field. It's probably going to be a five kilometer race, which is 3.2 miles. Faculty, students, and townspeople, if they want to, are going to enter, and we're going to award prizes for first finishes.

We're also going to try to organize a round-robin broom-ball tournament. Broom-ball is played down on the rink indoors with brooms and balls. It's just like hockey, but you don't wear skates and just do it in your shoes. It's a lot of fun sliding around all over the place. We try to do that with the houses. Then we're going to have the winner of the house tournament play the faculty. Before I was here, that used to be done, but it has not been done in a while.

We hope to get the Student Activities Board plan an all-college dance. We hope also to have a big concert. At Poker Flats, they have tray-races, tug-of-war, banana-eating contests. It's a crazy time and a lot of fun.

Of course, we have the snow sculpture contest. We're trying to get ideas for that now. Every house participates in the snow sculpture contest, and there's a prize awarded.

We hope to attract a lot of people from other schools. We are going to mail out mailings and invite people to spend the weekend.

Do you have any other thoughts?

Martin: I think the Outing Club is on the way up. It's really expanded this year, and I think that this freshman class and the sophomore class are really big. The WOOLF trips have been really big. People going on the WOOLF trips in the fall have added a spark of enthusiasm. Coach Briggs is fantastic. He's such a go-getter. He's always excited about things for us.

This winter we are also going to have some cross-country ski trips, which will be camping trips. We will have the Outing Club cabin open on Saturdays, heated with our wood-burning stove as best we can, for those who want to cross-country ski in the Hopkins Forest and on our new Shepherd's Well Trail which the trail crews cut this fall. It's a brand new trail, cut by the Outing Club, with one of the most gorgeous views I've ever seen.

How do you feel about being situated right next to the mobs in Baxter at lunch-time?

Briggs: That's a good question. The Outing Club has space in various spots all over the college for storage and all kinds of things.

On one hand, I don't like that. I like to be more centrally located to get all our stuff together. We can't do that here (in Baxter). On the other hand, we are very accessible here to all students, and because it is the biggest club on campus, students need to have it available.

For an inside student's view of the Club, the Record then talked to Blake Martin.

I hear the Outing Club this year is a very popular group. About how many people have joined it?

Martin: So far this year, we have over 250 members and usually end somewhere around 500. We usually pick up a lot of people over the winter for the ski program.

Have you noticed an increase in interest for the Outing Club?

Martin: Yes, especially this year. It seems like we're off to a better start—A lot more publicity this year for some of the things we are doing and a lot more things for people who have not had much experience in the outdoors.

About how many people do you think will get involved during Winter Study?

Martin: I'd say about a third of the campus will do something for the Outing Club, either renting equipment, taking the ski busses, or doing something for Winter Carnival.

What's being planned?
Martin: I guess I got put in charge of that. This is really neat. We're really excited about it.

There are 8 home dates for the sports teams, the ski races we hold out at Brodie Mountain, and the cross-country ski races. Teams from all over New England come. We sponsor that, run the gate-keepers, do all the timing, award the prizes, show the teams their lodging, and organize the whole thing.

The most fun is that this year we are going to have a citizen's race in cross-country skiing on Cole Field. It's probably going to be a five kilometer race, which is 3.2 miles. Faculty, students, and townspeople, if they want to, are going to enter, and we're going to award prizes for first finishes.

We're also going to try to organize a round-robin broom-ball tournament. Broom-ball is played down on the rink indoors with brooms and balls. It is just like hockey, but you don't wear skates and just do it in your shoes. It's a lot of fun sliding around all over the place. We try to do that with the houses. Then we're going to have the winner of the house tournament play the faculty. Before I was here, that used to be done, but it has not been done in a while.

We hope to get the Student Activities Board plan an all-college dance. We hope also to have a big concert. At Poker Flats, they have tray-races, tug-of-war, banana-eating contests. It's a crazy time and a lot of fun.

Of course, we have the snow sculpture contest. We're trying to get ideas for that now. Every house participates in the snow sculpture contest, and there's a prize awarded.

We hope to attract a lot of people from other schools. We are going to mail out mailings and invite people to spend the weekend.

Do you have any other thoughts?

Martin: I think the Outing Club is on the way up. It's really expanded this year, and I think that this freshman class and the sophomore class are really big. The WOOLF trips have been really big. People going on the WOOLF trips in the fall have added a spark of enthusiasm. Coach Briggs is fantastic. He's such a go-getter. He's always excited about things for us.

Transfers and inclusions refined

by Jack Mayher

The Committee on Undergraduate Life placed several new constraints on students wishing to transfer to a different house, at their meeting last Tuesday.

The CUL voted to limit the size of transfer groups to either singles or pairs. They also allowed only two transfer chances to every student during his Williams career, a compromise over the previously proposed one chance.

To limit the "safety factor" in the transfer system they decided that, on the transfer form, students could put their own house only on the bottom half of the choice list. According to one CUL member, this would "eliminate transfers exclusively for physical plant," which stem from the philosophy that "the grass is always greener on the other side." The CUL had considered disallowing inclusion of a student's original house on the transfer form, but realized that a student may be dissatisfied with his living situation, and still think that others would be worse.

In action concerning freshman inclusion, the Committee decided to lift the special status that Mission Park once had, which allowed inclusion groups of seven. Groups will now be limited to four people for any of the five housing groups. The CUL also voted down a proposal to let larger groups apply to all the housing units.

The CUL also passed the Housing Committee's plan for making house elections more uniform. The new procedures will take effect this spring.

Boring men—

"Women are eminently touchable. This is not a system of class, which is easy to change, . . . It is a caste system," she said.

According to Daly, the "sado-society" we live in is legitimated by "sado-spirituality" and characterized by phallic lust, in which deity is worshipped as "God-the-Flasher, God-the-Stud," etc.

Women desire pain and domination

An "aesthetic pseudo-purity of lust . . . has characterized Western spirituality and led to deprivations and frustrations of all kinds," Daly said. The pain and aggression of male frustration has been turned against women and projected onto them, so that men feel, sometimes subconsciously, that women desire pain and domination. Daly cited rape, battery, Oriental foot-binding and African genital mutilation as examples.

The "horizontal violence" which is committed against women is not merely physical, she continued, but also psychological. Patriarchal society has imposed upon women false passions, "twisted and warped versions of (the) real passions" such as rage, fear, hope, love, hatred and daring.

Daly referred to these man-made pseudo-passions as "plastic passions" or "potted passions" which drain and paralyze and "result in more and more disconnectedness within ourselves. These feelings stop a woman dead," and extinguish her all-important moral outrage, she said. The pseudo-passions include anxiety, depression, guilt, boredom, hostility, a nebulous desire for fulfillment, and bitterness.

"One of the most enraging things is reducing rage to bitterness," Daly said. "People say, 'Oh, isn't she bitter,' reducing my passion to a lemon—as if there weren't an infinity of wrongs to be enraged at!"

Society is boring

Daly urged women to throw off these false passions and come into contact with pure lust, "which is living as if one belonged to this earth," and with all the elements.

The idea of lust is double-edged, Daly maintained. While male lust is characterized by unmitigated violence designed to break women, lust also means vigor and fertility, like that of plants or the earth itself. "It also names the way up, the vigor . . . which launches wild women on journeys beyond the lecherous state," she said.

"The problem with all this," Daly added, "is that it is very hard to live such wild lust in a society that is essentially boring. It is infinitely boring to be blocked from the move toward one's innate being."

According to Daly, then, what women need to do is rediscover their original lust and their connection with all the elements, and if this requires the radical separatist policy Daly herself follows, so be it.

way through news writer, assistant news editor, and news editor posts. Most recently she served as features/arts editor. "Sara will do a fine job if she would just stop listening to Ozzy Osbourne," observed Spears.

Govan has made his presence felt primarily in the design of the Record. He joined the staff last year, starting for the layout department. During the last semester he worked with Jeff Brainard '84, launching the Williams Life section. "He was one of my freshman when I was a junior advisor last year," noted Henderson. "The fact that he was instrumental in my finding a girlfriend from his class has nothing to do with the promotion."

Junior Jeffrey H. Brainard will assume the post of news editor on the new staff. Brainard, the Editors-in-Chief, and the managing editors will comprise the 1983 editorial board.

Current news editor Philip Busch and Outlook editor Katya Hokanson will leave the Record for study abroad. Sophomore John Clayton will continue as Record sports editor, and sophomore Becky MacDougall will join the staff as features/arts editor.

Staff photographer Dave Schelbe '86 will take over as photography editor next January. Current photography editor Steve Farley '85 is taking a leave of absence from the paper.

Another Williams tradition was performed last Sunday as old and new RECORD editors posed atop the Thompson Memorial Chapel. Incoming editors Dan Keating and Jon Tigar are shown with outgoing editors Steve Spears and Rich Henderson (top) moments before they threw the old editors over the side of the chapel tower. The editors broke (left) insuring good luck for the next staff.

TV swiped from Hopkins

by Carol Davenport

Several recent incidents of theft have raised the question of whether Williams students should retain an open-door policy.

On November 25 Robin Rodie, President of Mark Hopkins, reported a television stolen from the house T.V. room. According to Rodie, students who had been in the T.V. room the previous night told her that the television had been there at 3:30 a.m. and was missing by 4:30 a.m. At the same time, Henry Cooper '85 reported a full-length black cashmere coat and two polo shirts missing from the hall of his suite in Carter House. In addition, several bicycle thefts have recently been reported in the Greylock area and the Berkshire Quad.

Although none of these items have been recovered, Ransom Jenks, Director of Security, said that security officers found two juveniles in the Bryant T.V. room on November 26 at 12:30 a.m. After turning the youths over to the Williamstown police, Security was informed that they were on leave from the Youth Service Board, a rehabilitation center in Springfield for juveniles who have committed crimes. Although there is no evidence to link the juveniles to the thefts, Jenks said "it is common knowledge in Springfield that we have an open-door policy and that it is very easy to find what you need . . . stereos, coats, jewelry, etc."

Jenks feels that more precautions should be taken against theft. He said: "I advocate that a student room key also lock the exterior door. It would make Williams a more secure place." However, despite the recent theft in Mark Hopkins, Rodie says: "I think one of the greatest things about Williams is that you don't have to lock your doors. I don't think the few thefts would warrant a different sort of policy."

New OCC director—

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor praised Kassamali's personal qualities of "warmth, imagination, and energy" and "her positive rapport with students." "I'm confident that she will do a good job," he said.

After receiving her B.A. from Cedar Crest College and her M.S. from Syracuse, Kassamali worked at Corning Glassware, Wellesley College, and Agnes Scott College. She has been at Williams since 1978. Her husband, Kim Bruce, was granted tenure last week in the Mathematics department by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions.

University of Florida

A fried guinea pig has sent a University of Florida math major to jail for 60 days, according to the Weekly World News. George Schiro tossed little Albert into a hot frying pan when Albert refused to play. Neighbors heard a pig screaming and called the police. Schiro also made Albert take showers with him. Albert was sent to a foster home where he is "happy and doing just fine."

University of Georgia

A sperm bank that recently opened near the University had so many first-day donors that it had to stop taking applicants for two weeks. Donors are paid $20 and can donate every two days. The bank opened near the University because of the demand for semen among educated people. "Would you want the sperm of a college graduate or someone with an IQ of 60?" asked bank manager Donald Zeh.

Cornell University

At 11 p.m. every night, hundreds of Cornell students open their windows and scream for 10 minutes.

Administrators put up with the noise because students claim it relieves tension, although neighbors and students often complain about the nightly ritual. Dorm director Mike Botticelli suggested that it is what the students yell, not the yelling itself, that upsets people.

A Security official also complained that the screams may drown out legitimate calls for help. "Someone could be in the bushes getting robbed or raped, and the patrol officer could think it was that doggone scream," he commented.

Bowdoin College

Fraternity Beta Theta Pi's initiation rite resulted in $20,000 worth of damage to their house, a letter of condemnation from the Bowdoin faculty and the loss of their national fraternity charter, according to the Orient.

The fun began at midnight one Wednesday, when pledges were informed that they were accepted into Beta. The pipes in the house sprinkler system burst because members had been swinging on them. To avoid getting wet, the party moved to the front porch while the college plumber was called in to repair the pipes. The Fire Department arrived when the fire alarm was activated by the sprinklers.

A Security officer and several firemen were physically harassed by frat members, and a Security car received $668 damage in the form of a mangled door and scratched windshield. The plumber's truck was also taken for a ride.

A group of Initiates then went to the Theta Delta Chi house where they engaged in a fight. Uninjured Betas proceeded to the center of the Bowdoin campus, where they reportedly "broke windows, smashed college phone extensions and created numerous disturbances." By 4 that morning Security finished rounding up the delinquents. Nine freshmen identified as leaders of the Initiates were sent off campus for the weekend. Subsequently, two were suspended and five were given campus labor assignments and placed on social probation.

Beta president Robert Sciollo downplayed the seriousness of the initiation and the sanctions. "(Security) didn't really understand the atmosphere, didn't handle it professionally," he claimed.

Springstreeters

by Anna G. Simas

The Wellesley Widows teamed up with the Springstreeters last weekend to delight an enthusiastic crowd in the Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

The antics of the Williams men kept the audience smiling, while the vocal talents of both groups were impressive.

The Widows managed to overcome occasionally weak moments. Highlighting their work was soloist Joan Marshall, second-alto, whose gutsy renditions of "Smack Water Jack" and "The Boy from New York City" were well-received.

Though the greater part of their repertoire was devoted to traditional light-hearted tunes, the Springstreeters did a fine job with more serious numbers such as "Somewhere" and the gospel song "Poor Wayfaring Stranger."

The Springstreeters did not remain serious for long, featuring a cream pie duel between Blake Martin and Richard Dodds during "Why Must I Be a Teen-ager in Love?"

Wrapping up the evening, the groups combined to perform Christmas carols, which delighted the audience and set a few of its members to singing along. On the whole, the evening was a success for the Widows and the Springstreeters.

Pucksters fall to North Adams

by Dave Woodworth

The men's varsity hockey team dropped a tough 4-2 decision to North Adams on Saturday, capping off an unsuccessful week of ice action.

The game was a rough, brawling affair as the Mohawks, playing on their home ice, tried to take advantage of the small rink. The tone was set in the first minute as Williams and NASC took turns rubbing each other's noses into the boards.

the boards.

NASC got their first goal at 4:48 of the first period, with Barry Hayes drilling home a rebound on a power play. Hayes also got the second goal at the 12:08 mark, making it 2-0, NASC, at the end of the opening stanza.

Can't capitalize

The Ephs, who appeared a bit tight in the first period, opened the second with a strong surge, and played the Mohawks evenly for most of the period. Unfortunately, Williams was unable to capitalize on several good scoring opportunities.

The Mohawks, on the other hand, were able to take advantage of a power-play situation to up their lead to 3-0. Paul Cooney tallied the goal with 5:30 left in the frame, and thirty seconds later, John Pellerin scored to put NASC up 4-0 at the conclusion of the second period.

Two late goals

The Ephs made a valiant attempt to get back into the game in the third period, but it was simply a case of too little too late. Jeff Potter '85 got Williams on the board with a goal at 5:55 of the third, Mark Wysocki '83 and co-captain Bob Brownell

'83 getting the assists.

Senior co-captain Sam Flood registered the second Eph goal, cranking up a slap shot from just inside the blue line that found the upper lefthand corner of the net. The score came on a Williams power play. Brownell getting the assist, with 6:55 left in the game.

The Ephs had a final chance as they were a man up with about four minutes left, but were unable to get any closer. Dan Finn '84 had 34 saves in the loss, while John Pasquale had 29 for the Mohawks.

Lose in tourney

The loss lowered Williams' record to 1-3, as they were defeated in both games of the Williams Invitational Tournament over Thanksgiving break. The Ephs fell to RIT in the opener by a 5-3 margin, and dropped a 6-5 overtime decision to NASC in the consolation game.

The bright spot of the week was a 6-3 win over American International College at Springfield on Wednesday. Ed Finn '83 scored two goals and Charlie Thompson '83, Brownell, Potter, and Brian Rutledge '85 scored one apiece.

Swimmers win big

Both men and women swimmers started their seasons with two victories. Saturday, the men creamed Amherst 75-38 while the women trounced the Lady Jeffs 86-53. Last Wednesday, both teams also beat UConn—the men 75-38 and the women 86-63.

The men took 10 of a possible 14 first place finishes over Amherst, getting off to a roaring start in the medley relay, where Will Andrew '86, Dave Johnson '83, Bill Couch '86, and Rob Sommer '84 splashed to a quick 3:42.36 in the 400 yard event.

Sommer broke a two year old pool record, set by teammate Couch when he was a junior at The Hotchkiss School. The record came in the 200 yard backstroke where Sommer's time of 2:01.26 eclipsed Couch's 2:01.7 standard. Sommer also picked up a victory in the 200 individual medley, (2:02.03).

Best start ever

Williams Head Coach Carl Samuelson said, "The men are off to their best start ever. We're well ahead of where we were last year at this point in the season". Last year, the Ephs finished second in the nation to Division III powerhouse Kenyon.

Samuelson had praise for the whole squad. "We've been training well, and the team looks stronger than ever. Our real strong point is the team's versatility; we have 3 or 4 guys in every event who can win."

"I was very happy with swims by Johnson, (200 breaststroke, 2:16.44); Bob Kirkpatrick, (200 breast, 2:19.55); and Mark Weeks in the spring events, (50 free, 22.41; 100 free, 50.30)," said Samuelson.

Women cruise to win

The women were led by sophomore Kim Eckrich, senior co-captain Liz Jex, and freshman Kathy Kirmayer. Eckrich exceeded National Qualifying Standards while winning the 100 individual medley, (1:05.18), the 100 Fly, (1:02.28) and the 200 breaststroke, (2:32.55). Jex picked up victories in National Qualifying times) in the 100 breaststroke (1:11.6), 100 free (54.8) and the 200 individual medley, (2:19.3). Kirmayer gained honors in the 100 and 200 backstroke events (1:03.09 and 2:21.61).

Other winners for the Ephs were Dina Esposito, in the optional diving event, and Katie Hudner in the 50 free (25.51). The free relay of Eckrich, Kirmayer, Rachel Stauffer, and Hudner closed the meet out on a winning note, covering the 200 yards in 1:46.06.

Crush UConn

On Wednesday, the men were led by Andrew, who won three events: the 100 freestyle (50:1 seconds), the 200 free (149:2) and was a member of the winning free relay along with Mills, Mark Weeks and co-captain Frank Frltz (3:19).

Andrews was not the only freshman to show well for the Ephs—Couch registered a first in the 200 individual medley (2:04), in addition to a fine showing in the 400 medley relay, where he teamed up with Johnson, Dom Kulik, and Mills to defeat a powerful UConn. quartet (3:42).

Samuelson also lauded the performance of Jeff Mills, who was "key in the winning of both relays and swam an excellent 50 Free," placing second in that event by only .08 of a second (22:54).

Sommer, an All-American last year, was a dual winner in the distance events, splashing his way to victory in the 1000 freestyle and the 500 free.

Other winners for the Ephs were Johnson in the 200 breaststroke (2:17) and Aronson in the 200 butterfly (2:03.6).

Important win for women

"Both teams rose to the occasion, but for the women, it was more than the first meet, it provided an opportunity to qualify for Nationals," said Samuelson.

The women did qualify for national bids: Jex in the 100 fly, 100 individual medley, and the medley relay. Hudner splashed to National times in the 100 individual medley and medley relay, while Esposito clinched a berth in the required diving event.

Eckrich, a national champion in five events last year, swam to wins in the 100 and 200 Breaststroke events as well as in the 200 I.M. and the Medley relay.

A pleasant surprise for the Ephs was the performance of Frosh Kathy Kirmayer, a backstroke, who qualified for Nationals in all three backstroke events; the 50, 100, and 200.

Hoopsters lose N.A. Tourney

by John Clayton

Williams finished third in the Berkshire Classic this weekend at North Adams; losing to tournament winner Southeastern Massachusetts University, 74-67, but beating Hellenic College 68-63 in the consolation. The Ephmen lost to Hamilton 78-61 last Wednesday.

Williams beat out Hellenic College for third place in North Adams State's Berkshire Classic basketball tournament Sunday. The Ephmen lost to Southeastern Massachusetts University, the tournament winner, on Saturday.

"Defensively, we were better than they were," said Williams Coach Curt Tong of Sunday's victory. "We tried to keep them outside by clogging up the middle, and for the most part we succeeded."

"We also tried to cut our turnovers in half from the night before," Tong said, "and we did a pretty good job at that too."

The night before, turnovers and foul shots were keys to S.M.U.'s victory. "They lived at the line," said Tong. S.M.U. had 24 free throws to the Ephs' 13. "The problem wasn't with the officiating," Tong continued. "We earned every foul. Their quickness won the game for them by causing us to commit so many fouls. Indeed, they were much quicker than we expected."

Guard Art Pidoriano had 18 points against Hellenic and 17 against SMU. Center Scott Olesen had 15 Sunday and 17 Saturday. Freshman point guard Tim Walsh, in two excellent efforts off the bench, had 16 and 10 points respectively.

Saturday's game saw S.M.U. jump out to an early eleven point lead. Williams came back to get their only lead of the game at 24-23. It was short-lived, however, as S.M.U. went on a seven point streak to take a 31-24 lead. From then on, Williams could get no closer than three, although S.M.U. could never bury the Ephmen.

S.M.U. went on to beat North Adams State for the championship Sunday 80-77, holding off a last-minute surge when the Mohawks cut the lead by 17 points in 4:05.

The team stayed even for three quarters against Hamilton, but a late rally gave the Continentals the win.

With 12:41 left in the game, Olesen scored to put the Ephmen ahead 47-45. But that was the last lead Williams would see, as the Continentals went on a 33-14 tear in that last 12:41.

Olesen led all scorers with 20 points. Pidoriano had 18, and Walsh chipped in 12.

Williams' first home gamewill be Wednesday night at 6:00 against Norwich.

Ephs squash tourney

by Chris Clarey

The Williams varsity squash team outclassed ten opponents in a round-robin tournament held this past weekend at the Williams squash complex. The Ephmen finished 10-0 with a combined match record of 84-6 for a three-day event.

"I felt the team collectively played really well," said first-year coach Steve Heath, filling in for Sean Sloane, who is away on sabbatical. "None of the other teams could match the strength of our top six," he added in reference to number one player Greg Zaff '84, number two Tom Harrity '84, number three Jeff Sultar '84, number four Billy Nau '84, number five, co-captain Jamie King and number six Doug Roble '86. Williams won every match easily, as no opponent got more than two wins and six were shut out.

Zaff played particularly well, dropping only one game in eight matches, maintaining the level of play which earned him the championship of the A Division in the Boodles Gin Tournament held two weeks ago in New York.

Heath says he "is very optimistic about the season," and that "the team should be very competitive in its matches with the top squads in the country: i.e. Harvard, Princeton, Trinity, Yale and Dartmouth."

Greg Zaff '84 sailed his way to 7-1 record in the Williams Invitational Squash Tournament this weekend. The Ephmen won the tourney with a 10-0 record.

The Office of Career Counseling will move from its spacious quarters in Mears House (at top) to this sterile space in Stetson. But OCC director Kassamali says, "Since they are willing to invest time and money into remodeling, I don't have many reservations."

Languages to Mears

Space shuffle relaunched

by E. A. Stanton

In response to strong protests by language professors and students, the college administration has changed a previous decision to move the language center from Weston to the Roper Center on Stetson's lower level in favor of a plan to relocate the languages in Mears House.

The Office of Career Counseling, currently located in Mears House, will occupy the Roper Center instead. The Black Students' Union will retain two rooms in Mears, and the Student Photo Club will still have its basement darkroom. In an unrelated decision, the Laboratory for Prehistoric Archaeology, also currently housed in Mears, will be relocating to another town.

Language professors are very enthusiastic about the new plan. "We are as happy about this as we were unhappy about the other (decision)," said French Professor George Plstorius. He noted that Mears will house classrooms, club rooms, a language lab, and nine faculty offices.

Many faculty members and students felt that the original plan to move the language department to Stetson represented a lack of commitment to improve the image of languages at Williams. They argued that a separate building provides a special identity for the department and that the Roper Center could not meet their space needs as well as Weston.

Two arrested in Spring St. incidents

by Dan Keating

Two Williams students were arrested by Williamstown police last week and a third was involved in a fight which the police broke up. The rash of incidents has caused Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zolto to express concern about student behavior and the Log.

There have now been three arrests involving students leaving the Log, including an earlier incident involving a student who destroyed the display window of King's Package Store after drinking at the Log.

All three arrests involved students under the Massachusetts legal drinking age of 20 who had been at the Log, the College pub.

"Strong concern"

"I have strong concern about the situation which had come up in the last few weeks," said Zolto. "We have no trouble with students drinking in their rooms or college parties, because they just go home. It is when they have been drinking and then wind up on Spring Street that trouble occurs."

The first incident last week happened after midnight Sunday night. Paul F. Toland '85 has been charged with wanton injury to real property and possession of stolen property for allegedly taking a town-owned street sign. He was arraigned Wednesday in Northern Berkshire Trial Court and pleaded not guilty. He will appear in court again this Wednesday.

In the only incident not concerning the Log, the police broke up a fight between a Williams student and a local resident outside The Purple Pub on Bank Street Thursday night. No arrests were made.

The third incident of the week occurred early Friday morning. John A. Fetterolf '86 was charged with wanton injury of private property for allegedly breaking the storm door on a private home. He was released on personal recognizance and will be arraigned Wednesday.

Baxter Log?

Dean of Freshman Cris Roosenraad said that these matters are now legal and thus out of the College's hands. Both he and Zolto affirmed that the College and town police still cooperate closely to avoid unnecessary problems. Zolto commented that in light of this cooperation, a problem may be arising when this many matters have to become legal concerns.

Moving the Log to a more central location on campus, specifically Baxter Hall, is one suggestion to stop student problems on Spring Street.

Dean Roosenraad maintained that the second arrest did not involve the Log. "A team party was held in the building that later becomes the Log," said Roosenraad. "It was a party situation that was mishandled, but it had nothing to do with the operation of the Log."

Roosenraad also denied that the Log could be moved to the basement of Baxter Hall, known as the Rathskeller. "The new fire codes allow the current usage as a pool room and television area. The modification needed to make it usable as a large student pub (meeting fire codes) is economically not feasible."

The 7:45 AM express bus run from Williamstown to New York City will be offered only on Friday and Sunday mornings instead of the previous seven days a week, according to bus company officials. Likewise, the 5:15 PM bus back up from New York will only be offered on those days.

Low ridership on the 7:45 bus was the reason for the scheduling change, which took effect January 3, they said.

There will still be one bus to New York a day, leaving at 11:55 AM, but it takes six hours to get there. The express bus took four.

"On an average day there were only two to three Williamstown people on the early morning bus," according to Judy Benoit, desk clerk at the Williams Inn.

Ray Oche, a Pittsfield ticket agent, commented that there "has been a slow drop in the bus service to New York over time," but the schedule with two daily buses had remained the same for the last 10 to 15 years.

No price change

Vermont Transit, which is owned by Greyhound Corporation, operates the runs from Williamstown to New York. Its traffic manager, Bob Steele, said he believes the price of a ticket to New York will not be affected by the scheduling change. The price is currently $30.35 one-way and $57.70 round-trip. He is not aware of any future schedule changes, he added, but he referred to the New York run as a "situation which requires further watching."

The buses from Williamstown to Boston are operated by Englander Coach Lines. Their schedule remains relatively untouched. Benoit said that there are more people going to Boston, "at least seven a day on the morning runs." There are four daily buses to Boston.

Boston bus profitable

It remains profitable to keep the morning buses to Boston running because the afternoon runs make up for the morning losses, according to William Gay, executive vice president-general manager of Englander. "As long as Greyhound only had one morning run and was losing money, it was not profitable to keep it because its loss was not absorbed by the other afternoon runs . . . Englander can absorb one losing run and Englander's loss is marginal," he said.

We Support Apartheid

By failure to divest of its stock in companies which do business in South Africa, the College implicitly supports apartheid. That the College has not divested before now is an atrocity. Editor Emeritus Rich Henderson's opinion piece in this issue provides a compelling argument for immediate action.

We agree. Judge for yourself.

Log Some Responsibility

Incidents like the ones which occurred this week with the Williamstown Police cast a shadow over one of the College's most popular features: the Log. Although these cases involved only a few, they threaten to close the Log to many. This would be distressing; we are fortunate to have a college pub which is more than the corner of some newfangled complex.

But what's good for us is not always good for the town. Some Williamstown residents who feel that students leaving the Log threaten the tranquility of Spring Street have suggested moving the Log to Baxter Hall or another central campus location. This proposition would be both expensive and unappealing to students and the Administration alike.

If something is worth having, it is worth keeping. To keep the Log on Spring Street requires only that we encourage more self-restraint among those few students who lack sufficient self-control. It would take very little to save the Log, but equally little to lose it.

Sado-society

To the editor:

After reading about what "feminist theologian/philosopher" Mary Daly said during her recent appearance at Williams, I was puzzled. Why had the male sado-society permitted her to become a tenured professor at Boston College? Why did a male-controlled firm publish her book, and why can it be found not just in feminist bookstores but also in male-dominated ones throughout the land? Why does a college whose faculty, administration, and student body are predominantly male invite her to speak at its place of worship? Suddenly I had a flash of insight and suspected that something like the following happened not long ago...

At a secret location high in the Colorado Rockies, the national Association for the Preservation of Patriarchy was in full session. The topic: the best way to combat the growing feminist movement. Some elderly association members suggested that handsome, wealthy young bachelors be recruited to romance the feminists' leaders, sweep them off their feet, and marry them. After all, isn't that what all women really want? But the President of the Association had a better idea. "It isn't the leaders that are dangerous," he said, "it's the ideas. And we can stop the ideas by making them so ridiculous even the feminists will be embarrassed by them!"

"How?" the assembled members wanted to know.

"Simple," he said. "We'll find a promising young lady—in fact I already have one in mind—and throw the full weight of our influence behind her, making sure that she gets frequent speaking engagements, that her books get published, and that in general her voice is heard."

Several of the members guessed a name.

"No, not Phyllis," he said, "this one is worth six Phyllises because she will embody the image of feminists we want people to have. First, we want people to believe that feminists are man-haters. Well, no one will hate men more loudly and obnoxiously than she. We'll have her preach a doctrine that anyone can poke holes in: that men are innately and totally evil, women innately and totally good."

"Second, we want people to believe feminists are irrational. So we'll have her base most of her arguments on silly word plays and blatant appeals to emotion."

"Third, we want people to think feminists are self-centered and self-indulgent. She will magnificently manifest both qualities, and what's more—she'll be proud of them!"

"Finally, as an added touch of outrageousness, we'll have her attack Christianity. Of course she won't do this with reason, but with slurs in bad taste. And in its place she'll preach a sentimental worship of nature!"

The great hall resounded with applause as the Patriarchs unanimously passed the President's proposal. "Best of all," the President shouted, trying to make himself heard over the cheering, "there is absolutely no danger her ideas will ever be put into practice. Without us—where would girl babies come from?"

Jennifer Swift

Malicious

To the editor:

We found Brett McDonnell's article in the December 7 issue of the Record not only misinformed, but also sensationalist and malicious. Educated and well-reasoned criticism of Mary Daly's lecture is certainly appropriate, but name-calling such as McDonnell engages in has no place in a "liberal" institution.

The analogy to Hitler falls on many levels. First, McDonnell falsely attributes power to a relatively powerless group. Radical feminists are fighting the dominant group in this society, while Hitler attacked an historically oppressed minority.

McDonnell further obscures Daly's point by reducing her rage to a simplistic hatred of men. She does not concern herself primarily with men, but with educating and empowering women. Apparently McDonnell sees women only in terms of their relationships to men, and thus reads Daly's love for women simply as a rejection of men. This is evidence of his own phallocentrism more than of any "neurosis" on Daly's part.

McDonnell implies, with smug paternalism, that the efforts of women to unite in the face of oppression are "dumb;" what is "smart" is to deny this oppression and put "humanism" first. We agree wholeheartedly that patriarchy dehumanizes us all, but to change this we must have the courage, as Daly says, to name the human agents of oppression.

Finally, McDonnell trivializes the deaths of over eleven million persons by comparing radical feminism to Nazism. Daly has never proposed nor seriously entertained the notion of patricide. McDonnell makes this "serious charge" without having read any of her work, by his own admission. Daly believes that men must learn to live without draining women, physically and spiritually. This requires changing the nature of female-male relations, but it certainly does not include killing people. To equate a "unifying spirit" among women with the slaughter of Jewish people devalues the struggles of both groups.

McDonnell's sort of hate-mongering does much to damage the cause of human liberation, and we regret that it appeared in this newspaper.

Cuban diplomat blasts trade embargo

Over twenty years ago, the United States severed all official diplomatic and trade relations with Cuba. Travel between the countries was restricted. Since then, the U.S. has remained firm in its attempts to weaken the Cuban economy and its determination to uphold the embargo. Ramon Sanchez Parodi, the senior Cuban diplomat to the United States, gave his views on the embargo and other matters in an interview with Editor-in-Chief Jon Tigar. Tigar visited Cuba in 1981 with a delegation which discussed the possibility of lifting the embargo.

Let's start with some historical background. How long has the trade embargo been in place?

Officially, since 1962. February, 1962.

Unofficially, since...?

Unofficially, really since 1960. That is because one of the main products that we sold to the United States was sugar; and the amount of sugar we were allowed to sell to the United States was cut in June or July of 1960. So that basically meant that the most important part of our trade was embargoed in 1960. So it's been on for over 20 years.

How successful have efforts on either side been to circumvent the embargo?

Well, really, the most important thing for us about the embargo is, first, you have to understand the situation Cuba was in in 1960. We were a very underdeveloped country, very dependent on the U.S., not only for trade but for all sorts of technology, economic relations, all sorts of things. We had to change that practically overnight, because one day we were selling a quota of sugar to the United States, and the next day this was eliminated.

The major impact was in the first few years. We succeeded in changing this situation, finding new markets, changing our technology, finding new partners for trade and economic relations.

So more than circumventing the embargo, more than trying to keep things the same way, what we did was to change completely the pattern of our trade and economic relations, and even our approaches and prospects for development. We felt reliant on the United States, dependent on the United States. More than circumventing the embargo, Cuba has become independent from the United States.

Who fills those needs now? Japan, I know, for some electronic goods.

Basically, the COMECON countries. That is, the European Socialist countries, plus the Soviet Union to a large extent. Plus, the western countries like Japan, which is one of Cuba's major economic partners, plus Canada, Spain, France, Italy.

Have there been any fluctuations in the severity of the embargo in the past twenty years, or has it remained a hard, cold front?

There have been no changes.

Because I remember when I was in Cuba there was a flu epidemic, spread by insects, which took a lot of lives before the State Department would allow the sale of the necessary insecticide to Cuba.

In that epidemic about a hundred people died. It was through the participation of the Pan-American Health Organization that the United States finally licensed American companies to sell this insecticide to Cuba.

What other instruments are available to the Reagan Administration to impair the Cuban economy? That seems to be a goal of this Administration.

What U.S. officials have said about it is that they will continue and try to tighten the screws on the embargo. But besides that...

There's nothing else. What is the Cuban policy towards the embargo?

Well, our policy towards the embargo is, first, what I just told you. We are not depending on the U.S., relying on the United States, waiting on the United States to lift the embargo, to develop ourselves or our economy. In that sense, our attitude has been to continue to develop independently, and...

But you would still look favorably on a lifting of the embargo?

Oh yes. On the second hand, our position is that the embargo is an aggressive, unilateral, hostile, immoral action on the part of the United States towards Cuba. Especially since Cuba is a developing nation: a nation that has to develop faced with the hostility of a major power when what would be conceived of as a fair policy from developed nations, and even a major power, would be to assist and support developing nations that are trying to upgrade the quality of life of their people. So we believe that the embargo is a very immoral act, and something that history will pass judgement on. So our position is that the embargo should be lifted in order for the United States and Cuba to have normal relations.

The U.S. attitude [towards Cuba] is the same as trying to treat a 24-year-old man the same way you would a 6-month-old baby.

Switching to a more global view, America's line has always been that the main reason for encouraging the dependence of Southern Hemisphere countries on the U.S., both in Latin America and Africa, and really all developing countries, is overwhelming majority of the population. And that cannot be imposed from abroad by any foreign power.

Previous administrations in this country have taken a different tack; their behavior seemed to indicate that they believed that they could pay for the political structure of a country. Taking Nicaragua as an example, the Carter Administration passed 75 or 80 million dollars in aid right after the revolution. When it became clear that that wasn't going to work, that they couldn't buy the allegiance of the country, the Reagan Administration cut off the remaining monies that would have been given. How much allegiance is the United States going to lose in the next few years as the result of a policy which doesn't seem to be working? I mean, can they continue to buy influence?

I don't think so. I don't think anyone can expect to buy any kind of influence, especially in this modern world. In the 18th and the 19th century, in this hemisphere, we witnessed how the colonial territories, certain colonies here, and the Spanish colonies in South and Central America, underwent a process of political independence.

The bottom line here is that that political independence was needed because the structure of the relations with the metropolises, with England or with Spain, no longer could accommodate the goals of these national entities. They needed to change their relations in such a way that would make them able to fulfill their national goals because they had already developed. Admittedly, you have to acknowledge that their development came from their former relations with the metropolises. But they had already developed to a certain level in their society, and to go beyond that they had to change the colonial relationship that existed with England, or with Spain. That led to the independence of the colonies in America.

In a similar way, not exactly the same way, but in a similar way, Latin American countries have been dependent on the U.S. for almost the last 80 years, and especially since the second World War. In spite of the way that this relationship has stunted their own national development, there has been some development of these societies: in a social way, in an economic way, even in a political way. But no longer can this kind of relationship accommodate the national interests of Latin American countries.

For example, in terms of economic development, industrialization, all those things: it's impossible for a single country to provide for all those needs for Latin American countries. The United States can't provide that. So you have to look at a wider relationship. It's not a relationship with only the United States. All of the countries in the world need to do that.

So it's not a question of buying some sort of influence. It's a question of adjusting relations and adjusting trade to the real and objective situations of these countries, and I think that's the best way in which relations between Latin American countries and the U.S. could be acceptable and could play a role even in the own national security interests of the U.S., because those are also the national security interests of Latin American countries.

Open letter to Trustees: Divest now

by Richard Henderson

For years, the Trustees have been pressed by students to divest the College's holdings in South Africa. For as many years the Trustees have maintained an alternative position which they feel better addresses the issues of opposition to apartheid and Williams' responsibilities as an investor. The debate has not centered upon the merits of segregation policy; both students and Trustees unite in condemnation of the brutal South African system. Williams College is not a willing supporter of apartheid; it is trying to oppose it.

Yet Williams College supports and is supported by the apartheid system. Despite its ideological position, its de facto stance can do little to ameliorate or combat.

On paper, the College's efforts to fight apartheid appear impressive. The Trustees use proxy votes and "communications with management" to urge adherence to the Sullivan Principles, support unionization efforts for blacks, and "encourage fuller reports by companies on their South African activities." Williams set up a committee to help "judge companies on a case-by-case basis and decide how most effectively to encourage them" towards achieving the desired goals.

The theory behind this policy is simple: a stockholder can much more effectively guide the policies of a corporation than someone who has sold his shares. "It's better to exercise proxies than to walk away", explained an administration official. He related the story of a trustee who was hounded by shareholders about his company's South African operations. The trustee said he wished the disgruntled stockholders would simply sell their shares; supposedly this is exactly what Williams would be doing by divesting.

Not walking away

tent but blind. Companies who sign escape the surveillance of Williams, which ostensibly works towards "case-by-case" judgement and "fuller reports" of activities. Williams' only contact with signatories is through a yearly report issued by Arthur D. Little, Inc. The report gives broad statistics on the signatories' combined operations, using information provided voluntarily by the companies. Some signatories decline to answer certain questions, though we do not know which companies and what questions. Other corporations decline to respond at all. The best information Williams gets on a particular company they may own stock in is that it is "making good progress" towards adherence to the Principles, or merely "making progress," or "needs to be more active". This is insufficient information for Williams to pass judgment on its companies' South African operations.

Simple business sense dictates that any investor must know what his company is doing. South Africa's Business Protection Act of 1978 makes the information a subsidiary provides to its parent company or its shareholders unreliable and subject to cessation. The law makes it illegal for anyone in South Africa to supply information to any person outside the country on any aspect of business without government permission. Another law empowers the government to order any company operating in South Africa to deliver goods to the state that are determined to be essential to national security. Thus a company Williams owns shares in could be forced to supply oil, or computers, or jeeps to help the apartheid regime against black resistance, and the College might never hear about it.

Sullivan limited

Even if the College were to receive good information on corporate activities in South Africa, and were able and willing to make substantial efforts to influence the policies of companies it owns, Williams still would not help change apartheid laws. Indeed, the Trustees admit they would not. The Statement of South Africa for two reasons. According to the Investor Responsibility Research Center (which Williams uses to assess its investment policy), the withdrawal of even one firm "would represent a setback for the South African government, which meets world criticism of its policies by heralding each new economic, political and even sporting relationship it develops with the West as a sign of international acceptance." The international sports ban has pushed South Africa towards easing apartheid; something so important as withdrawal or threat of withdrawal by American companies would certainly force substantial change.

The second reason the multinationals must be pressured to leave is that they

cally and with media attention to pull out of the apartheid-dominated economic system. Neither way, I suspect, is at all palatable to the Trustees, but one of them must be taken. The latter is smarter: economically, morally, and politically.

We have already seen how difficult and ineffective it is to vote proxies and carry on the extensive communication needed for stockholder pressure. Additionally, owning the stock until the time a corporation pulls out, which one must do with this method, is economically unwise; undoubtedly the corporation and thus Williams will be taking a financial loss.

Divestment is morally the best route. We will no longer support apartheid, apartheid will no longer support us. Pol-directly support the South African government in important industries: automotive, computing, and oil. American technology and access to oil resources is vital to South Africa's health and is used by the government to enforce apartheid. Without computers supplied by American companies, the pass system which controls the movements of all blacks (and only blacks) could not be effective. Worse, in the event of black unrest, these "key" industries must cooperate with the Defense Forces, forming military commando units among their white workers to follow government commands under penalty of imprisonment.

Helping 40,000 of a total of 20 million blacks is worse than insignificant . . .

No matter how well these corporations treat the few blacks who work for them, on balance they become supporters of apartheid. By owning these companies, Williams becomes a supporter of apartheid.

An institution like Williams, committed to upholding the basic morals and ideals of Western culture, can not at the same time uphold an economic and political system that exists to brutalize five-sixths of a country's population. Instead Williams must get its investments out of that country. This can be done in two ways. One is to follow the current policy to a further, effective extent: as a stockholder pressure companies to withdraw from South Africa. The other is to refuse to invest in companies with South African operations, pressing them economi-ically, in the context of alumni relations, divestment can be depicted as concession to the damn kids where constant meddling cannot.

Finally, contrary to normal belief, divestment is economically smart. Other colleges have had good success with "clean" portfolios; as more institutions divest, brokers are becoming adept at managing such investment policies.

More importantly, Williams is a conservative investor. We should not be gambling in the high-risk, high-yield South African economic situation. When black riots erupted in 1960 and 1976, capital fled from South Africa. The current political situation is becoming more and more volatile today: extremists on both left and right are gaining power, strikes and disturbances are escalating. A major flare-up, which observers agree will come at some time soon, will be followed by economic panic. Williams cannot afford to guess when this will happen; it is better to get out now, when South-African affiliated stocks number a very low 20 out of about 200 companies in our portfolio, and stay out.

With this we can join the many major progressive universities, and the recently-divested, very wealthy Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the powerful political and economic campaign that truly opposes apartheid. We cannot continue to say we oppose apartheid but do nothing except support it. ■

The Student Activities Board has announced that Count Basie will play Chapin Hall on January 22. Basie, 78, achieved stardom in the 1930s with a series of national radio broadcasts and dance hall stints, and has remained popular ever since. Basie will be accompanied by his 15-piece band.

TO THE WILLIAMS COLLEGE COMMUNITY:

Yesterday's edition of The Record included an article relating the arrests of two Williams students for misconduct on Spring Street. This piece is important not so much for its subject matter as for the new "policy" it represents: that of publishing the names of individuals involved in these (and future) incidents.

We feel that this "policy" is unnecessarily damaging and unfair for the following reasons:

- 1) It reflects a complete lack of consideration for the individuals' standing in this exceptionally small college community, both during the period immediately following the incidents and during their future Williams careers.
- 2) Although The Record management traditionally turns over each semester, the academic year is nevertheless continuous. Policy precedents established in the fall, therefore, should be maintained throughout the year; otherwise, some people are affected now while others deserving similar "attention" last semester are omitted.
- 3) Even if a legitimate case could be presented in favor of such a policy change, its already inconsistent implementation is disturbing. In yesterday's article, for example, four incidents were mentioned but only two names were listed, thus unjustly focusing attention on only half of the group of students involved.

The Williams community must realize that any negative repercussions are a result of the accumulation of all four incidents and not any one. This fact is misconstrued by the decision to implement a new approach to college journalism during Winter Study rather than on September 8th. Above all, our primary disagreement with the policy centers around the impersonal manner in which those incidents and future incidents will be handled.

We believe that this situation is intolerable and should be reversed.

Open letter to Trustees: Divest now

by Richard Henderson

For years, the Trustees have been pressed by students to divest the College's holdings in South Africa. For as many years the Trustees have maintained an alternative position which they feel better addresses the issues of opposition to apartheid and Williams' responsibilities as an investor. The debate has not centered upon the merits of segregation policy; both students and Trustees unite in condemnation of the brutal South African system. Williams College is not a willing supporter of apartheid; it is trying to oppose it.

Yet Williams College supports and is supported by the apartheid system. Despite its ideological position, its de facto stance can do little to ameliorate or combat.

On paper, the College's efforts to fight apartheid appear impressive. The Trustees use proxy votes and "communications with management" to urge adherence to the Sullivan Principles, support unionization efforts for blacks, and "encourage fuller reports by companies on their South African activities." Williams set up a committee to help "judge companies on a case-by-case basis and decide how most effectively to encourage them" towards achieving the desired goals.

The theory behind this policy is simple: a stockholder can much more effectively guide the policies of a corporation than someone who has sold his shares. "It's better to exercise proxies than to walk away", explained an administration official. He related the story of a trustee who was hounded by shareholders about his company's South African operations. The trustee said he wished the disgruntled stockholders would simply sell their shares; supposedly this is exactly what Williams would be doing by divesting.

Not walking away

But "walking away" is not what divestment would be, while "hounding" is far from what Williams has done. Williams has actually done very little to "urge" or "encourage" through its investments. According to Provost J.

"Voting a shareholder resolution is easy for us but is totally symbolic . . . and virtually impotent."

Hodge Markgraf, the College's socially responsible investment policy centers on two continuing actions:

- Supporting shareholder's initiatives proposed by others—the proxy votes. Williams does not initiate proxies itself.

- Writing a letter every year to companies in which we have invested who have not signed the Sullivan Principles. Williams requests that they explain their reasons for not doing so; if a company's response is insufficient, we write more letters.

That's it.

Well, we sold Newmont Mining, but the College admits it did this not because of Newmont's actions in South Africa but its refusal to correspond with us.

College officials also admit that the policy is quite limited in its effectiveness. Williams buys and sells stock in these companies quite frequently, so it is very difficult to write over time or vote. Very often when a shareholder resolution finally comes to a vote, Williams has already sold its holdings in that company. If we do get to vote, sometimes we do not support a resolution we agree with in principle because it is poorly formed or places unnecessary burdens upon the corporation. Finally, says one official, "voting a shareholder resolution is easy for us but is totally symbolic . . . and virtually impotent."

Insufficient

Basing the active initiatives of Williams' investment policy upon signing of the Sullivan Principles is not only impotent but blind. Companies who sign escape the surveillance of Williams, which ostensibly works towards "case-by-case" judgement and "fuller reports" of activities. Williams' only contact with signatories is through a yearly report issued by Arthur D. Little, Inc. The report gives broad statistics on the signatories' combined operations, using information provided voluntarily by the companies. Some signatories decline to answer certain questions, though we do not know which companies and what questions. Other corporations decline to respond at all. The best information Williams gets on a particular company they may own stock in is that it is "making good progress" towards adherence to the Principles, or merely "making progress," or "needs to be more active". This is insufficient information for Williams to pass judgment on its companies' South African operations.

Simple business sense dictates that any investor must know what his company is doing. South Africa's Business Protection Act of 1978 makes the information a subsidiary provides to its parent company or its shareholders unreliable and subject to cessation. The law makes it illegal for anyone in South Africa to supply information to any person outside the country on any aspect of business without government permission. Another law empowers the government to order any company operating in South Africa to deliver goods to the state that are determined to be essential to national security. Thus a company Williams owns shares in could be forced to supply oil, or computers, or jeeps to help the apartheid regime against black resistance, and the College might never hear about it.

Sullivan limited

Even if the College were to receive good information on corporate activities in South Africa, and were able and willing to make substantial efforts to influence the policies of companies it owns, Williams still would not help change apartheid laws. Indeed, the Trustees admit they would not. The Statement of South Africa for two reasons. According to the Investor Responsibility Research Center (which Williams uses to assess its investment policy), the withdrawal of even one firm "would represent a setback for the South African government, which meets world criticism of its policies by heralding each new economic, political and even sporting relationship it develops with the West as a sign of international acceptance." The international sports ban has pushed South Africa towards easing apartheid; something so important as withdrawal or threat of withdrawal by American companies would certainly force substantial change.

The second reason the multinationals must be pressured to leave is that they

cally and with media attention to pull out of the apartheid-dominated economic system. Neither way, I suspect, is at all palatable to the Trustees, but one of them must be taken. The latter is smarter: economically, morally, and politically.

We have already seen how difficult and ineffective it is to vote proxies and carry on the extensive communication needed for stockholder pressure. Additionally, owning the stock until the time a corporation pulls out, which one must do with this method, is economically unwise; undoubtedly the corporation and thus Williams will be taking a financial loss.

Divestment is morally the best route. We will no longer support apartheid, apartheid will no longer support us. Poidirectly support the South African government in important industries: automotive, computing, and oil. American technology and access to oil resources is vital to South Africa's health and is used by the government to enforce apartheid. Without computers supplied by American companies, the pass system which controls the movements of all blacks (and only blacks) could not be effective. Worse, in the event of black unrest, these "key" industries must cooperate with the Defense Forces, forming military commando units among their white workers to follow government commands under penalty of imprisonment.

Helping 40,000 of a total of 20 million blacks is worse than insignificant . . .

No matter how well these corporations treat the few blacks who work for them, on balance they become supporters of apartheid. By owning these companies, Williams becomes a supporter of apartheid.

An institution like Williams, committed to upholding the basic morals and ideals of Western culture, can not at the same time uphold an economic and political system that exists to brutalize five-sixths of a country's population. Dennis Brutus, the internationally acclaimed South African exile, anti-apartheid advocate, poet and scholar who spoke here last spring, yesterday appealed a State Department recommendation to the Immigration and Naturalization Service that he not be given asylum in the United States.

The Dennis Brutus Defense Committee, however, believes that his life "will be placed in danger at the hands of the South African Secret Police if he is not granted political asylum in the United States."

Brutus is scheduled to lecture at Williams next Sunday night, January 16, in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, at 8 PM.

The London Times Higher Education Supplement reported that Williams is among a select group of 10 American colleges receiving $250,000 each from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation to improve those colleges' teaching in applied mathematics, quantitative reasoning and technology.

Amherst and Dartmouth were among a different group of colleges receiving "smaller grants."

Time magazine mentioned Williams in a report on the problem of copyright infringement by colleges which photocopy course materials regularly and on a massive scale. But Yale and Williams came off looking well as Time reported that both colleges post copyright warnings on the sides of campus copying machines.

Space shuffle

"It was the clear desire of the language people for us to reconsider our decision," said Markgraf. "It was reopened at their request, and we looked at a couple of other options, including Goodrich House. But Mears seemed to fill those needs best, so we were happy to respond in that way. I'm pleased, and I think the languages are. I salute Fatma (Kassamali, director of OCC), for her willingness to try the new arrangement."

Mears has less floor space than does Weston, according to College Provost J. Hodge Markgraf. But, he said, the languages will actually gain classroom space when the rooms currently occupied by the computer center in Bronfman are converted into classrooms. The computer center is moving to Jesup Hall, and the offices in Jesup are moving to Weston.

The question of faculty offices has been a source of tension between language faculty and the administration during the past several weeks. Most professors have traditionally preferred to have their offices in Stetson rather than in Weston, and this was one of the administration's arguments for the current underutilization of space in Weston.

ments for the current underutilization of space in Weston.

Part of the arrangement for Mears is that at least one senior and one junior member of each language department must have offices in Mears to ensure that the space there is used as effectively as possible.

OCC needs met

Staff at OCC, the only potential losers in the move, have a positive outlook.

"We feel that nobody would like to be moved out of what is as comfortable and convenient as this is, but Stetson will meet our needs," said Kassamali. "Since they are willing to invest time and money into remodeling, I don't have many reservations."

Putting the final piece into the space shuffle jigsaw, the administration will locate the athletic coaches' offices in Rice House, currently a co-op. The coaches are moving from their Jesup offices to make way for the new computers.

The same architect, John Jordan, will be handling the renovation of Weston, Mears and Stetson. The entire space shuffle should be completed by the beginning of the next school year.

Trade embargo blasted

The United States uses the stick as well as the carrot. One of the big sticks is the International Monetary Fund (IMF). For example, three years ago in Jamaica, Michael Manley ran for re-election and the IMF said, either you move away from socialism, or we will withhold all money and your economy will fall into ruin. And that's exactly what happened, and he was unseated in the next election.

Well, the IMF, even now with the new administration in Jamaica, has not been able to provide what the Jamaicans need for their own development. At the same time you have seen how the international financial situation is deteriorating, and this is something that has to be solved. What's going to be done about it, I don't think anyone has the slightest idea.

It's not a question of simply imposing policies like the IMF. That's not solving anything now, and it hasn't ever solved anything. Since its inception, the IMF has been pursuing the same policies, and they haven't solved anything. Quite to the contrary, the situation is one of chaos, and the international monetary system has to be restructured. The question of the new principle of the international credits for development has to be upheld. There has to be international assistance for development, especially for Third World nations. That has to be upheld. But how are we going to get there?

What do you think the future is of Cuban-American relations? With so many people out of work, the American political climate may change. Is the embargo going to be lifted anywhere in the foreseeable future?

Well, I think sometime in the future the embargo has to be lifted. I don't know when. I'm not going to make predictions; I wouldn't like to get into that game. What I do believe is that since 1960, as we said in the beginning, there has been one and only one policy in the U.S. towards Cuba, as embodied in the embargo; isolation of Cuba, and so forth. But that was 23 years ago. Since that time, Cuba has undergone dramatic changes: politically, economically, socially. Probably 60 percent of Cuba's population has been born in those 20-odd years. So it means that Cuba, in 1960, was completely different from what it is today. You are dealing with a completely different individual. The U.S. had a policy to deal with Cuba when they were 6 months old; now they have the same policy, when Cuba is approaching the 24th year of revolutionary changes. The U.S. attitude is the same as trying to treat a 24 year old man the same way you would a 6 month-old baby. That has to change, because you cannot keep policies static in that dogmatic way.

I think we need to understand this situation and define ways in which to establish normal relationships. That's what I see in the future; finally we will get to a situation where we restore a normal relationship between Cuba and the United States.

They are not going to be what they are now, they are not going to be what they were 25 years ago, or 50 years ago. They will be different. They will have to be different.

Hoopsters downed by Harvard

by Ward Katsanis

The women's basketball squad split their games last week, losing to Harvard 84-50 Saturday but beating Skidmore 48-43 on Thursday.

Harvard opened with a full court press and played an aggressive man-to-man defense for the majority of the game. The Crimson secured the lead early and never relinquished it. Despite a short period during the first half when Williams applied a full court press of their own (the score was 12-10 with 11:00 remaining), Harvard had a very comfortable lead.

The halftime score was 34-17, but then Harvard dominated the first two minutes of the second half, outscoring the Ephs 11-0. The final score of the contest was 84-50, with Harvard's Sue Clapp leading all scorers with 18 points.

Eph scorers

Williams had three players in double figures: Kay Lackey '85, T.K. Meehan '83 and Tracy Burrows '84 had 15, 14 and 12 points respectively.

Women squashed

Opening the season in a well-played but disappointing match Saturday, the women's squash team was trounced by Harvard, 7-0.

Coach Renzie Lamb commented, "Overall, I was very proud of the team. Generally speaking, the loss was due to a difference in match experience. Harvard is one of the top teams in the country, whereas several members of our team had never even played varsity squash until today." Lamb cited Captain Barb Riefler '83 and Amina Mahmood '84 for their excellent performances.

Pucksters edged—

For a moment, it appeared that the Ephs had again tied the game with 59 seconds left, but the referee ruled that the puck had not crossed the goal line. The Crusaders were able to kill the remaining time, despite the fact that Williams pulled its goalie.

The Crusaders outshot Williams by a 39-24 margin in running their record to 10-3-2. Dan Finn had 35 saves for the Ephs, while Usseglio had 21 for Holy Cross. The Ephs' record dropped to 2-5.

Of the loss, Coach Bill McCormick said, "I think we did a pretty good job against a very good team. The loss of Brownell and Rich Gallun, just when we seemed to be injury-free, has forced us to work with a patchwork lineup. If we can get these nagging injuries cleared up, I'm pretty optimistic about our future. Although we have a tough schedule, our play in the third period was inspiring."

Wipe out Hamilton

Earlier in the week, Williams rode four third-period goals to victory as they defeated Hamilton by an 8-4 count. Seven different players got into the scoring column for Williams, including Brownell (2), Ed Finn, Rutledge, Wysocki, Flood, and Charles Thompson '83. The victory proved to be a costly one, however, as Brownell will be out for at least a month.

Williams coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin emphasized that Harvard, a strong Division I school, had already played seven games compared to only one for Williams. Hudson-Hamblin felt, though, that Williams "did well on defense" and that this game provided "good practice."

Beat Skidmore

Earlier in the week, Williams traveled to Skidmore where they were victorious 48-32. Three Williams players again scored in double figures: Lynne Jaycobs '85 had 12 points, Meehan had 11 and Lackey netted 10. Co-captain Meehan also led in the rebound department with 13 and in steals with seven.

Coach Hudson-Hamblin commented that at Skidmore, Williams took the lead right away and never lost it. With a record of 1-1 now, the women hoopsters look forward to their upcoming home games in the Molly Stark Classic, to be held this Saturday and Sunday in Lasell gymnasium.

Rob Kusel

All American

by Dave Woodworth

Several members of last fall's highly successful men's soccer team have earned individual postseason honors.

Senior Rob Kusel was named to the Division III All-America team, as well as the All-New England squad. He is the first All-American that Williams soccer has produced since Greg Hartman in 1978. In addition, Kusel and goalkeeper Ted Murphy '85 were selected to play in the ECAC Division III All-Star game.

Williams' Fox Award for leadership and dedication went to senior captain Aytac Apaydin, while Jeff Sutton '83, the team's leading scorer, was named Most Valuable Player. Kris Strohbehn '83 was voted Most Improved.

Becky Baugh

All New England

Senior Becky Baugh, a four-year starter on the Eph soccer team, has been rewarded for her prowess as the squad's outstanding forward by being named to the second team Division II-III All-New England Women's Soccer Team.

Baugh served as a striker and a trailer for the 4-6-1 Ephs, and although she did not lead the team in scoring as she did her sophomore year, she had what Coach Ed Grees characterizes as a "fine season." Becky "carried the team with her strength and determination," according to her coach. "She's a great athlete and it will be a shame to lose her to graduation."

Basketballers invade Cuba

by John Clayton

The men's basketball team had an unusual Christmas vacation—a two week trip to Cuba.

The team returned Friday night from a cultural and athletic trip in which they played (and lost) three games, one of them on national television. They also visited a factory, national museum, hospital, and beach.

Everyone on the trip—the team, head Coach Curt Tong, Assistant Coaches Bob Peck and Ery Chambliss, and Political Science Professor Carlos Egan—came back impressed with the friendliness of the Cuban people.

"The most interesting part of the trip was going out and talking to people," said junior Art Pidorlano. "We met with students, workers, people in government, and the head of a friendship organization, and just asked them questions."

Junior Greg Lockhart and senior captain Scott Olesen knew some Spanish and thus were able to talk with many people on the street. "The friendliness of the strangers we met was amazing," said Lockhart. "There were many young people around, who were very outgoing and ready to converse."

Talented Cubans

The Ephmen played three games against very talented Cuban teams. "We lost all three games," said Coach Curt Tong, "but it was no disgrace. Their shortest player was 6-4, and they went right up to 6-10.

"And they could play," continued Tong. "Many people think only Americans can shoot well. Not true. These players could shoot. We learned what quality basketball is in these games. If we can stay with them, and we only lost by five points in the third game, then the tough teams on our schedule don't look so bad."

Tong was also pleased with the spiritual results for his team. "Every team needs things like that—opportunities to live together and get to know each other. In an alien society, you tend to group together and pull for each other. So our players now appreciate each other more. We grew a lot, both as people and as a team. That will also show up in our play.

"In terms of basketball, we also defined our roles much better," Tong said. "We have different players with different talents—unfortunately not five with all of them. Now we have a better understanding of who can do what."

Celebrities

Team members were treated like real celebrities, playing in the national coliseum (with a 12,000 capacity, although it was never filled, according to Tong), while the second game was on national television.

They were also celebrities as they walked down the street, and team members played the role of ambassadors well, said Tong. "That kind of exposure is good for the college," Tong said.

The Ephmen, in turn, were impressed with the Cubans. "Many of them really want to be friends with the U.S.," said Pidorlano, "and this blockade is really hurting them."

All the players were enthusiastic about the trip. "We had a great time," said junior Ed Schmidt. "We went to a lot of cultural activities—a cabaret, a baseball game, the museum, a couple days at the beach."

Beat New England

After they got back, the team beat New England College 67-61 Saturday night.

Pidorlano had 25 points to lead all scorers, and senior forward Andy Goodwin had 18 points.

The Ephmen took advantage of sloppy play to jump out to a 22-15 lead early in the first half, but the Pilgrims battled back to lead 37-34 at halftime.

"We were very, very tired," said Tong, "But we were emotional and had a lot of desire, and so were able to hold on."

Williams jumped out to leads as great as nine in the second half, and although New England narrowed it to two with 4:17 left, the Ephmen got clutch baskets from Pidorlano and junior Ed Schmidt to secure the win.

Leaping into a forest of angry Pilgrims, junior Ed Schmidt contributes to Williams' 67-61 victory over New England College as Dave Krupski (right) and Mike Meadows (back) look on. Hoopsters returned from a Bay of Purple Cows Invasion to beat the Pilgrims Saturday. (Plonsker)

Pucksters edged by Holy Cross

by Dave Woodworth

Playing without the services of senior co-captain Bob Brownell, who injured his collar-bone in last Wednesday's game against Hamilton, the men's hockey team lost a tough 4-3 decision to Holy Cross at Chapman Rink on Saturday.

The Ephs came roaring back from a 3-0 deficit in the second period to knot the contest at 3-3 with two power-play goals in the final frame, but ran out of momentum as the Crusaders got the game-winner with less than two minutes remaining.

Holy Cross took an early 1-0 lead on a power-play goal by Pat Kennedy at 6:29 of the first period. With Brian Winters '85 out for interference, Kennedy took a pass from Chris Brown and wristed a shot past goalkeeper Dan Finn '84. Finn's sterling performance in several other penalty-killing situations kept Williams from falling any further behind, however, and the score remained 1-0 at the end of the first period.

Crusaders jump ahead

The Crusaders got two more quick goals in the second period, as Mike Coan, assisted by Kennedy and Jerry Deleo, knocked in a rebound at the 4:05 mark.

Moments later, Mike Robben upped the lead to 3-0 with a short-handed goal. With Holy Cross playing a man down, Brown intercepted an errant Williams pass and broke free down the left side. His 35-foot slap shot hit the near post, but Robben beat Finn with the follow-up with 5:16 gone in the period.

The Ephs got on the board at 17:08 of the second stanza, when Brian Rutledge '85 scored off assists by Mark Wysocki '83 and Mike Uretsky '85. The goal came with both teams playing a man down, as Jeff Potter '85 and Richard Shea of the Crusaders were in the box for roughing.

Ephmen tie it up

Williams finally got its power play off the shelf in the third period. With Joe Lunny of the Crusaders off, Potter and Wysocki dug the puck out of the left corner and centered it to Ed Finn '83, who drilled the shot by Frank Usseglio at 2:25 of the period.

Then, with Owen Dugan out for high-sticking, the Ephmen tied the game at the 4:43 mark as co-captain Sam Flood '83 cranked a shot from the point. Although his attempt went wide of the net, Wysocki took the puck as it came off the boards and beat the goalkeeper to the near side.

By now the momentum rested completely with the home team, and when Dan Finn made several spectacular saves to turn aside a Holy Cross power play with about five minutes left, the Ephs seemed well on their way to salvaging a tie, if not gaining a win. However, Lunny dashed these hopes with a goal at 18:29 of the period.

First victory in 3 years

Skaters ice Skidmore

The women's ice hockey team chalked up their first victory in three years by defeating Skidmore Thursday night 2-1 at home.

Williams' Meredith Bibber '85, assisted by Captain Bea Fuller '83, opened the scoring action with a goal four minutes into the game. However, Skidmore evened up the score soon after with a breakaway goal. The score remained tied through the second period.

Williams finally clinched a win with three minutes left in the game when Jeanette Hazelton '85, assisted by Beth Ebel '86 and Meredith McGill '83, slipped the puck into the net.

Williams coach Bernie Nuener was pleased with his team's win, but said he hopes to see better passing and skating in the future.

The Williams pucksters are looking forward next to hosting the Molly Stark Tournament January 15-16 when they hope to continue their winning record.

Ephmen make tracks

Junior tri-captain Bo Parker turned in an impressive performance Saturday as he led the Eph trackmen to a 73-63 victory over defending Division III champions, M.I.T. Parker won the 1500 with a strong 3:59 finish, broke the school record with his 2:37 time in the 1000, and turned in a personal best of 1:54 in his leg of the Eph's mile relay.

"Parker's performance was outstanding," commented coach Dick Farley. "Not only did he win his two regular events, but he came from 35 yards back to win the final relay which gave us the points we needed to edge by M.I.T."

Make up deficit
Williams was behind by 20 points after the field events and was only able to make up the deficit by winning all of the last seven running events.

Other first place performances for Williams included tri-captain Tomas Alejandro's 6.5 in the 55-meter dash, Greg Lao's jump of 12' in the pole vault, Ted Leon's 51.5 in the 400-meter run, Tom Pingree's 2 minutes flat in the 800-meter run, John Nelson's 9:07 in the 3000-meter run, and Paul Toland's 6'4" in the High Jump.

The Williams squad, now 1-0 on the season, looks to its January 16 tri-meet against Union and Hamilton for its next victory. The meet will take place in the Towne Field House beginning at 1:00.

Swimmers drown Hamilton

by Chris Harned

The men's and women's swim teams handily defeated Hamilton, sweeping first-place finishes in every event except one. The men upped their record to 3-0 by a score of 87-26, while the women followed suit with their 99-41 victory.

The win was never in doubt, with first place finishes spread evenly throughout the team. Diver Jim Stockton led a balanced attack with his two wins, in the required and optional diving events.

Other winners for Williams were: Rob Bowman in the 1000 freestyle (10:15.7), Will Andrew in the 200 free (1:50.9); Jeff Mills in the 100 freestyle (:49.4); and Mark Weeks in the 50 freestyle (:22.5). In other events, Bill Couch won the 200 Individual Medley (2:0.9); sophomore All-American Pete Orphanos in the 200 fly (2:02.5);

John Peloso in the 200 backstroke (2:12.9.9) John McClelland in the 500 freestyle (5:17.5); and breastroker Dave Johnson ended Williams winning ways, streaking to a 2:20.2 victory in the 200 breast.

The women's meet was highlighted by dual victories by Rachel Stauffer in the 100 and 200 free (57:0.7 and 2:04.9), Kathy Kirmayer in the 100 fly (1:03.6) and the 100 backstroke (1:09.2), Katie Hudner in the 50 backstroke (31.0) and the 50 freestyle (28.0), Dina Esposito in both diving events, and Kim Eckrich in the 200 IM (2:16.5) and the 50 breaststroke (33.3). Senior Co-Captain Liz Jex won the 100 Individual Medley (1:05.0). The Medley Relay team of Kirmayer, Jex, Hudner, and Ann Tuttle was also victorious (1:58.9).

Both teams will travel to Southern Connecticut this Saturday.

Brutus on campus

Reagan, Williams charged

by Katya Hokanson

"This institution is involved in what is undoubtedly the most racist society in the world," declared exiled black South African poet Dennis Brutus to a capacity crowd at Brooks-Rogers Hall on Sunday.

Money is never invested in South Africa for charity or reform, said Brutus, but always for profit. Brutus, who was exiled from South Africa twelve years ago and now faces deportation from the US, devoted his Sunday speech to outlining the Reagan Administration's "unprecedented expansion" of relations with the all-white government of South Africa.

The poet attacked the Reagan Administration's policy of "constructive engagement" in investments—a policy the administration says is to exert positive influence on the oppression of a black majority by a white minority in South Africa through pressure by investors—as "totally false and dishonest." Williams College also officially endorses this policy.

A black South African resistance leader's parting words to Brutus as he left Robben Island, a South African prison where Brutus broke rocks in return for having pressured the South African Olympic Committee to include qualified black athletes on its all-white team, were "get the corporations off our backs," the poet reported.

Black South Africans, who make up 83 percent of the population of South Africa, are excluded by law from taking part in the political process, including voting. The all-white Pretoria government rules the country. Exclusion and oppression of blacks is called apartheid.

Regional policeman

Although "other administrations are not innocent," Brutus said, the Reagan Administration has greatly stepped up US contact with the Pretoria government and has provided aid to its military. Brutus feels that the US has settled upon South Africa as a regional policeman of the southern portion of Africa.

The head of the South African secret police has met with the Pentagon, Brutus said, as well as with Jeane Kirkpatrick, US Ambassador to the UN. At the same time as the head of the South African armed forces was meeting with US officials at the Pentagon, he said, the South African army went on search and destroy missions in Angolan villages and refugee camps.

The US also arranged for over a billion dollars to be loaned to South Africa by the International Monetary Fund, said Brutus, an amount he feels corresponds to the rise of the Pretoria government's military budget.

CC founds panel, finds $11,000

by Dave Kleit

The College Council passed a proposal for a town meeting concerning the residential housing system, discussed recent student arrests relating to the Log and Record coverage of those arrests, and announced that $11,000 in Council funds had been newly discovered, at a lengthy meeting last Wednesday.

The town meeting, proposed by Council vice-president Jay Ward '84, will combine a panel discussion and a referendum on the housing issue, both of which will be held in February.

"The CUL has in the past and is now discounting the consensus of the Student Body to such a degree as to be alarming," Ward said in his proposal.

Panel discussion

The proposed panel, designed to give voice to student opinion, will include members of College Council, Housing Committee and the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL). The Record was also invited in the proposal, but has declined.

"The CUL has boldly and contemptuously taken the Housing Committee from our jurisdiction," said Ward of College Council's involvement in the panel. "They have made fundamental changes in the house

Bottle bill boosts beer prices

by Jim Peak

It used to be that once a group of friends had polished off a six-pack, everyone would use the empty containers to practice their basketball skills, eventually filling the nearest wastebasket with an assortment of bottles and cans. But now, because of the Massachusetts bottle bill which took effect yesterday, it pays to save those empty containers.

Consumers are now required to pay a deposit on every non-biodegradable container of soda, mineral water and beer purchased. The deposit will be five cents for containers holding 32 ounces or less, and at least ten cents for larger containers.

The empty bottles can then be returned to any dealer, who will refund the deposit even if the bottles were purchased at another store. The bill does not cover alcoholic beverages other than beer.

Passed in referendum
The bottle bill was originally passed in the Massachusetts legislature last year after a long and bitter political fight. Opponents of the bill then successfully petitioned to have the law placed on last November's ballot. Although an earlier version of the legislation had been defeated at the polls, this time it passed by a comfortable majority.

Proponents hope that the new law will greatly decrease the number of bottles and cans discarded on the state's parks and highways. The law also bans all containers which are joined by plastic rings or any other device which cannot be easily decomposed.

Jerry Smith, owner of King's Liquor Store on Spring Street, thinks that the "bottle bill is a very good idea in principle," but admits that he is not exactly sure what the bill's eventual effect will be. "We won't know what the problems will be for another six months," he said.

King's, which has a sign in its window inviting customers to ask questions about the legislation, has had quite a few inquiries from puzzled consumers. "The state did not inform people well," said Smith. He also did not notice any increase in business from people buying before the law took effect.

Bottle-bill labels

Bob West, manager of West Package Store, is less than happy about the new law's provisions. Since all cans and bottles must be labeled, West has been forced to pull products from his shelves which lack the proper five-cent stamps from his distributors.

These containers are almost as valuable as the contents now that the bottle bill is in effect. (Schell)

College questions African investments

by Ned Ladd

Williams has invested in four companies which have made no progress toward worker equality in their operations in South Africa, according to the College's Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR).

At last week's ACSR meeting, College Treasurer William Reed cited a report by Arthur D. Little, Co., an international consulting firm, which labeled International Telephone and Telegraph, E.I. Lilly Industries, American International Group and Norton Industries as "unsatisfactory or not making progress" in their South African operations.

Provost Hodge Markgraf indicated that letters of inquiry will be sent to these companies. When the responses are received, the committee will decide on further action.

Sullivan Principles explained

The Arthur D. Little Co. rates corporations in South Africa in terms of wages, promotions and living conditions for blacks as compared to whites. This system was devised by the Reverend Leon Sullivan, a black Philadelphia clergyman. The Sullivan Principles mandate the following conditions:

1. Nonsegregation of the races in all eating, comfort, locker rooms, and work facilities.
2. Equal and fair employment practices for all employees.
3. Equal pay for all employees doing equal or comparable work for the same period of time.
4. Initiation and development of training programs that will prepare Blacks, Coloreds and Asians in substantial numbers for supervisory, administrative, clerical, and technical jobs.
5. Increasing the number of Blacks, Coloreds and Asians in management and supervisory positions.
6. Improving the quality of employees' lives outside the work environment in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities.

Eph can do it all

by Kip Cinnamon

Kip Cinnamon is a Charlevoix, Colorado native and a 1982 graduate of Williams College.

When I returned to Charlevoix, people asked many questions. "What did you learn in college?" friends said. I didn't know what to say. Sure, I learned plenty, but I can't sum it up. I told a close friend about this. He said, "Well, how about one thing you learned?" I can do that now. It goes like this:

It happened at Stigs. Stigs was the dearest bar in the West and the homeliest. There were two semis in the lot next to a signboard with a yellow light inside, 'STIGS WESTERN RANCH' it announced. In the window a blue neon blinked 'COLD' and a red one 'BEER'. It was so dead, the screen door banged behind me and I heard an echo. Three farmers and the two trucks sat at the bar. Behind the bar sat Stig. Otherwise the cinder block ballroom contained empty tables with clean ashtrays. A Coors calendar hung over the cigarette machine. It was a week late. Stigs was the only bar in Salina.

Salina is halfway into Utah on 50. Salina has Stigs, the Corral Motel and Cafe, a Texaco, and some houses and stores. It is an outpost. Truckers and travellers eat and drink there and sometimes stay the night. Ranchers in Sevier County find something else to do there. It is not an attractive town. Then, it was dark and there was nowhere else for miles.

I stopped at noon in mid-Nevada. Big scattered drops plinged off my helmet. The greasy blue clad attendant smiled, flashed a golden incisor and told me something. He said "One thang 'bout Nevada, if you don't like the weather, jus' wait fi' minutes." He smiled his smile. "Cuz it's bound to change!" This was utterly untrue.

I rode in the rain for hours. It was often violent. Gusts bucked the bike from side to side. Beyond every low brown mountain I hoped to see blue over the empty plain. But five minutes stretched to five hours. On ridge after ridge, in valley after valley, I was blown and splashed by another rolling grey squall line. Finally it stopped. I rode until I found Stigs.

I sat at the bar between the farmers and the truckers.

"What'll it be thar stranger?" said Stig. "Yu'd better take two, cuz I'll be across the street fer a blte." He served me two Olys and left. His bar was as dead as a disconnection. So I sipped and listened to the neons buzz. Often in these places a stranger carrying a helmet is a curiosity. People ask "Where you from?" or "Where you headed?" or "Don't you get wet when it rains?" They may feel friendly about this and treat to one or two. There seemed little chance of this at Stigs.

By and by my beers dried. Still there was no threat of dialogue. I decided to start something. I bought some smokes. It was startling how loudly the change jangled in the machine. The others did not seem to notice. They remained hunched over their beers.

I breathed deeply, twice, and asked one trucker for a match. I regretted this instinctively. Time in Michigan taught me to ask for 'a light'. Otherwise it's "Sure, your face and my behind. Haw, haw, haw." I bit my lip. He turned to me, blinked deliberately and slid "Cert'n'ly." The man unsnapped his shirt pocket. I exhaled, relieved. This guy hadn't been to Michigan.

"Cert'n'ly, yer breath and a buf' flo."

The dearest bar in the West burst alive. I laughed too. My face felt very, very warm.

We all got to talking. The farmers were ranchers. "Ranchers is ranchers not farmers" one said. I said I was a student riding east to finish. The truckers hauled plywood to Flagstaff. They were from Idaho. The only things I knew about Idaho were the license plates said "FAMOUS FOR POTATOES" plus what a myopic friend recently told me in San Francisco. She had traversed Idaho and mistook dust devils for tornadoes. "The weather in Idaho was most frightening," she said.

"I hear the weather in Idaho is most frightening," I said to one trucker.

He shook his head. "We hain't had a hellstorm all year."

I was agog. I've seen blizzards blast across the big lake. I've seen a tornado tear through Kalamazoo. I've never seen anything that I could even hyperbolize into a hellstorm.

"Wow!" I said. "A hellstorm? What's a hellstorm?"

The man wrinkled his brow and looked at me. "It's when little pieces a ice come down and bounce all around."

"Ohh, a hallstorm," I said. "I thought you said a hellstorm."

The man wrinkled his brow and squinted at me. "That's what I sayid, a hellstorm."

Then he told me that Idaho was God's country. All mountains and volcanic ranges and dense forests and not too many people to junk it all up. Most of what remains wild in the West is up in the manhandle he said. He told me of a road up in Boundary County that cuts down the side of Mt. Kanisku, the only trail to the northernmost logging camps.

"Fifty-six switchbacks in twenty-one miles," he said. "Fine-ly closed it down when somebody figured more was reckon' than was gettin' to the bottom!"

I told him I would surely like to see all that.

He said, "All you got to do is head north fer a day!"

Stigs walked in. He tongued a toothpick around to the side. "Idaho? God's country. North fer a day."

Everyone nodded at this. I did too.

That's pretty much what I learned. I can go to Idaho if I choose. More than that. From those unusual instructors in that unlikely classroom, I discovered some freedom. Whether it is "heading north fer a day" or choosing something else off a prescribed path, I can do it. There may be plenty of utter untruths, hellstorms and switchbacks along the way, but I can do it. This is very important. Maybe the most important one thing I learned in college.

The Williams Record

A show of force

Thanks to the College Council, students will finally have both an opportunity to voice an opinion on the house transfer system and a chance to affect directly the way that system works. Last week the Council passed Proposition 2, which provides for extensive discussion at a Town Meeting and direct action in the form of a referendum. We hope the campus will make full use of both forums.

A strong showing would go far to remedy a sorry situation; the Committee on Undergraduate Life has steadfastly tried to establish an "ethos" at the expense of student needs and concerns, while the campus has been unable or unwilling to focus its views in any meaningful way. As a result, we have come perilously close to a situation in which housing choices are etched in stone and abstract concepts like house unity are enforced rather than nurtured.

Tentative planning schedules the town meeting for Wednesday, February 2, and the voting on the following two days. While this leaves only a precious two weeks, that is more than enough time for students to discuss and unite. Unfortunately, neither the discussion nor the referendum are binding. We can only hope that a show of force will establish the need to heed student opinion.

We stand together-let's move

One issue before the Trustees this weekend is final approval of and appropriations for the new gymnasium. Patience and grave necessity have generated agreement between Students, Administration, Faculty and Trustees. We must have the gym.

The patience is now wearing thin. Now that the decision phase is over, we must act immediately.

The opportunity is here to take a big step. The consensus should move the Trustees to strong action.

LETTERS

Irresponsible

To the editor:

The editorial policy of your paper never ceases to amaze me. On page two of the January 11 issue, the Record published an editorial condemning the investment policy of the college for its support of apartheid. The editorial also urged readers to appraise the Op-ed article on page four. Yet couched between these two pieces, the Record includes an interview advocating the lifting of the trade embargo against Cuba.

It is completely irresponsible for the editors of the Record to express concern for the rights of 20 million blacks in South Africa on one page, and then, on the very next page, support the repressive and totalitarian regime of Fidel Castro. Amnesty International and Of Human Rights have consistently listed Cuba as the worst violator of human rights in all of Latin America—worse than El Salvador, Guatemala, or Argentina. Furthermore, these abuses are very well documented. One need only turn to the poetry of recently released political prisoner Armando Valladares to read of the torture and human experimentation in Cuban prisons.

Editor Jon Tigar neglects to mention these abuses, and while this omission is misleading and irresponsible in and of itself, the irresponsibility is heightened by the Record's stance on divestiture. If the College should not invest in South Africa where blacks are denied their basic rights, then why should the U.S. trade with a nation which represses an entire population? The two editorial opinions are completely contradictory.

Human rights violations are unforgivable, without exception—unless of course, the perpetrators have caught the favor of the editors of the Record.

Dennis Brutus: The poet in search of a listening ear

"I'm supposedly one of the most dangerous opponents of the apartheid regime."

Dennis Brutus, exiled South African poet, is currently undergoing deportation proceedings in the U.S. He recently spoke to the Williams Community about his struggles within the apartheid system. The following interview was conducted on the afternoon of January 15th by Samuel Schuchat, recent graduate of Williams College and long-standing member of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

Prof. Brutus—what is your legal status now, and why can't you go back to South Africa?

There are two issues there. Right now, I'm in limbo. In the United States, I've been facing a deportation proceeding for some time and I went into court again in Chicago this week on Monday where there was a rather surprising new development. My attorney was informed that some of the grounds for moving against me were classified under an Executive Order, that I was not allowed to know what these grounds were, nor was my attorney allowed to know. So we're now going to dispute that particular issue before we can get back to the deportation proceedings. We intend to challenge the court and insist that I be allowed to know what the grounds are for action so that I can rebut them. The Immigration Service itself admits that this is the first time that they've ever used this particular statute in a deportation proceeding. So the short answer is that I really don't know, but I still am facing the possibility of deportation.

As for the second part of your question, the short answer is I signed an agreement when I left South Africa stating that if I returned I would go to prison, so that's part of the answer. Also, since then I've been pretty active in anti-apartheid activities in Britain and the United States and elsewhere, so that I'd probably be in a lot of trouble if I went back there.

How would you characterize Reagan's policy of "constructive engagement." Under Carter, there was an embargo on the sale of military equipment to South Africa, which, under the Reagan administration, has been changed so that there is a far more liberal interpretation, and goods which in the past could not have been sold to South Africa are now being sold. I think particularly of one which is mentioned in your student paper, the sale of 2,500 cattle prods for 'crime control'; the other one that comes to mind is the sale of highly sophisticated computers for use by the South African military and by the nuclear industry in South Africa, so that these are significant changes from what the Carter position was. All of them are in the direction of making South Africa more powerful, both in terms of the economy and in terms of its military might. This in turn means that it's pretty clear that the Reagan Administration sees Pretoria as a regional policeman, as the force which can dominate the southern part of the continent on behalf of the United States' interests, not only in South Africa itself but also in Namibia and in relation to neighboring countries like Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Angola, and others.

I'm not saying that the Carter administration had a policy that satisfied South Africans, but under Reagan, it's become considerably worse. The commitment of the Reagan Administration to a racist white minority government in South Africa is much more naked, much more abrasive.

What's been the effect to date of South African destabilization efforts in the front-line states? Can you tell us something about what the past year has been like?

Well, I'd like to keep it as brief as I can, but I must say it's been extremely damaging. In the case of Mozambique, it's taken two forms: penetration to the capital, Maputo; an attack on an ANC office in Maputo, the killing of several people, the kidnapping of others who were taken back to South Africa, and interrogated under torture.

All that clearly has a dangerously destabilizing effect in the region. But bad as that is, in terms of the economies and politics of those places, I think even worse is the deliberate creation of a monster which can terrify and subdue the region. The South Africans are consciously setting out to create an image of themselves as the dominant power capable of striking into any of the neighboring countries and confident that they will not be meaningfully condemned by the United States or the Western powers. There might be a slap on the wrist, there might be a resolution at the UN expressing alarm, but in fact, South Africa is becoming the giant of the region and there is no serious attempt to condemn them.

What's been the response in some of the states that have been threatened this way?

Well, I can see one very clear development and perhaps this is even desired by Washington, but as they feel themselves more vulnerable to attacks by South Africa, they're going to seek arms elsewhere and if they can't get them from the West, they're going to get them from the East. But it may even be that given the kind of trigger-happy attitude you have in Washington now, the kind of confrontation politics, that they would welcome the development where African countries turn to the Soviet Union for arms and supplies because that would justify their pouring in even more arms in support of South Africa.

"There seems to be no occasion where the trustees listened to sweet reasonableness."

What's been the response of the ANC to the raids and incursions of South Africa into the front-line states?

The ANC has responded with counter-attacks within South Africa, of which by far the most spectacular recent one was the series of carefully timed explosions in the nuclear reactor outside Cape Town at a place called Koeberg. And the ANC has said that as the South African police and the Army become more vicious in their attacks, the ANC will be compelled to respond by counter-attacking inside South Africa. What you will see is an escalation of the conflict with only one possible end. For just as Mozambique and Angola and Zimbabwe have come to independence after a long period of struggle, so we will achieve the independence of South Africa in due course—sooner or later; if the United States steps up its supply of arms and money to South Africa, it will take longer. But the final outcome, whether it's sooner or later, is not in doubt.

I'd like to move now from South Africa to some things that have been happening in the U.S. Just this past week, Massachusetts divested $100 million in pension funds from South Africa. I think recently Connecticut did the same—$13.8 million dollars were divested from involvement in South Africa. First of all, what are the effects of this kind of action on South Africa itself?

I think the answer is both monetary and symbolic. And it may well be that the symbolic is more important than the monetary. The South African economy—in spite of the fact that South Africa is the world's #1 producer of coal, #1 in the production of diamonds, possible #2 in the production of platinum, and very high up in the list of uranium producers—has always been rather fragile, dependent on the world's gold prices (which in their case have been very much in their favor). But also, they have so over-spent in the region of building up their defense industry and army... that the economy has always been delicately balanced.

In addition, the South Africans have always seen as more important than the actual investment, the question of what is represented in terms of Western support for the apartheid system and the apartheid economy. And therefore any withdrawal represented also a withdrawal of support. And for them that means that the symbolic movement was at least as important if not more important.

I should go on, however, and point out that in terms of economic importance, this, I think, has been diminished in the very recent past... by the loan of $1.1 billion from the IMF. Now when South Africa can get that kind of loan from the IMF, it represents a vote of confidence which transcends any kind of vote of no confidence coming from a particular state or a particular university.

... And what scares me is, anytime you lend a country a billion dollars, it's on the assumption that they're going to have a stable government and a stable economy in order to repay that loan. And so, the West has an interest in shoring up the apartheid economy, if only to insure repayment of their loan.

Can you tell us something of what you've done and why? Why do you think college divestment is particularly important.

My short answer is that I have not found any other issue as good as this one for educating people—students, faculty, general public—to get them to understand that the economic participation of the U.S. in apartheid is greatly valuable to the maintenance of the apartheid system. It's also an issue on which people can locally act, that they can rally around.

... I'm pleased about my own role, but I don't magnify it. I see myself as part of a team. I should add, however, that according to the files of the South African Secret Police force, I'm supposedly one of the 20 most dangerous opponents of the apartheid regime. And I should imagine that my role in working with people on the divestment issue, as my role in working with people on the sports/racism issue—these are the things that are troublesome (to the apartheid regime).

In how many colleges has the divestment campaign met with success?

Well, we counted up to 22—private and state institutions. But invariably, I have to say, there seems to be no occasion where the trustees listened to sweet reasonableness. There is one instance—one small university in Indianapolis, Indiana, called Central Indiana University. I spoke at a convocation there (and I don't know whether that was the reason). But shortly after that, the trustees voted, without student pressure, to sell every stock they had in any corporation active in South Africa. And that's the only occasion that I saw a decision being made without considerable student pressure. In all the other instances it's been demonstrations, sit-ins, protests, visits to the homes of the trustees and the president, campaigns on campus. But it has to be a sustained campaign of pressure and always, I think, to succeed, you need the involvement both of students and faculty. And it should surely be possible to get a few faculty with sufficient guts and sufficient moral concern to be willing to become involved. So one has to keep at it.

I think that brings us to my last question for you. Looking at different colleges and universities, how important are the actual corporate connections of trustees? At Williams, several of our most important trustees are chairmen of the board and presidents of major corporations that do business in South Africa.

Right: for instance, Union Carbide, which is in the top 10 in terms of investment in South Africa. In many instances the relationship is what I think you ought to call incestuous, for there are fundamental immoral and unnatural relationships where the same person who might be the president of a bank making a loan to South Africa is asked to sit on the board of a university and decide whether or not that university should put its money in his bank. And clearly he cannot be impartial in the matter.

Trustees coming

by Ned Ladd

The Board of Trustees will begin a semi-annual series of meetings with various members of the College community starting this Thursday, January 20. Of prime concern to the Trustees is next year's tuition rate, which the Budget and Financial Planning Committee will discuss on January 21.

Board secretary and College treasurer William Reed feels this will be the most important issue the Board will discuss during their meetings because of its effect on the College budget.

Other meetings include a cocktail reception at the Log for the Trustees and members of the College Council on Thursday night. Council President Stuart Robinson '83 hopes to discuss the funding of club sports with the Trustees. He cited the need for more money, either in the Athletic Department or Student Activities budget, to back these sports in intercollegiate competition.

Later Thursday night, the Trustees will meet with the Committee on Undergraduate Life to discuss the controversial house transfer policy.

Proposed gym

Friday's Building and Grounds Committee meeting will focus on the proposed gym as well as review the Lawrence Hall and Adams Memorial Theatre renovations, according to Reed.

The Trustees will discuss Honorary Degree recipients at the Degrees Committee meeting on Friday afternoon.

The Finance Committee meeting on Friday afternoon, will be held as a forum for the Anti-Apartheid Coalition and the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility to discuss College policy regarding corporations that do business in South Africa. The Anti-Apartheid Coalition will call for a restructuring of the ACSR so that it will be more visible in the College community, and will call for complete divestment of all stocks in corporations with South African operations.

A Saturday morning meeting will involve a discussion on all the committees' reports. The Trustees will give guidance to the College administrators at this meeting, according to Reed.

Dining halls safe

Campus dining halls now pose no health hazard to the Williams community, claim Food Service Director Jim Hodgkins and Williamstown Health Commissioner Michael Muzyka.

A third health report was filed in November following two reports which found high levels of bacteria on campus silverware, cups and plates. According to Muzyka, the third report found Williams' kitchens "in general compliance" with the state sanitary code. He added that the results showed "marked improvement" over the two previous tests, taken October 9 and 16.

Hodgkins explained that the Food Service responded to the "sign of trouble" by changing dishwashing procedures. Silverware is now washed three times over and Food Service employees periodically check for unsterilized utensils.

Hodgkins added that the relationship between Food Service and the Health Department has always been good and spoke of Muzyka as an "educator" who warns the Food Service when trouble arises.

"We don't have the equipment to test our facilities," Hodgkins stated, "so we have to depend on Commissioner Muzyka to inform us when trouble arises."

Muzyka said that periodic health inspections were "routine." Another test will be taken later this month, he said.

Endowment up by $23 million

by Jack Mayher

A market surge in the last half of 1982 boosted the college's endowment to a market value of $141 million, a $23 million increase since June 30.

The jump in the value of the endowment will have no dramatic effect on planned raises in tuition. As Treasurer William S. Reed noted, the economic policy of the college is a fairly conservative one.

Since the market is so volatile, the college prefers to save the profits of good times to offset possible future slumps. Only after a period of sustained growth would the trustees consider a change in policy, said Reed.

Williams' endowment, the 33rd largest in the country, contributes 40 percent to the cost of the college's operation. Forty to eighty percent of the endowment is invested in common stock, with the remaining portion devoted to short-term cash equivalents.

Alumni gifts

According to Reed, the goal for the endowment is to beat inflation plus five percent, thus ensuring that the endowment would grow by five percent per year in the long run.

Crime on campus

Violent crime, although rare, has plagued several Williams students this fall. On November 26 a senior was attacked by two men in Prospect House and on November 4 two freshman women were assaulted on Cole Field.

A senior came back to his room to find two men trying to steal his stereo system. According to the police report he attempted to stop them but was overpowered and cut on the face and arm as the robbers escaped, empty-handed.

In his complaint, he described the men as definitely not of college age. One was a white male, six feet in height with black hair and long sideburns. The other was shorter and had brown hair. The Williamstown Police are now investigating the incident. Anyone with information pertaining to this crime is encouraged to report it to the police.

Assault and battery charged
Williamstown Police have already acted on the November 4 assault. A local man was apprehended and charged with assault and battery the morning after the attack, and was arraigned on December 22. The police declined to release the suspect's name until his next court appearance, which is scheduled for January 19.

Theft was a problem at Williams last summer. A local juvenile stole $300 in cash and a Sony Walkman, according to Dean of Freshman Cris Roosenraad. The thief was apprehended on August 5.

Roosenraad lectures frosh on Log, transfers

by Dave Kleit

"We are going to get the Log back open soon," assured Dean of Freshman Cris Roosenraad at a Freshman Council meeting last Sunday, adding, "but I do not know how we are going to do it." Roosenraad also spoke to the Council about the housing system.

Roosenraad expressed optimism about getting the Log reopened to those under 20, although he noted that new safeguards against underage drinking are probable. However, he went on to say that if there is another serious problem involving the Log, it will probably be closed for the rest of the year.

"We need some kind of system where we all take responsibility for each other," he said. "We don't want the Log losing its license."

Defending all those in authority involved in the situation, Roosenraad stated, "There really isn't a heavy except state law . . . and the desire for beer."

Maximize first choices

Roosenraad went on to explain the housing system and transfer policy along with the proposed modifications being discussed. He stated that the "goal is to maximize first choices."

Referring to College Council discontent with the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), as manifested in a recent town meeting proposal initiated by College Council vice-president Jay Ward '84, Roosenraad commented, "The CUL is not out to impose some kind of faculty whim." Roosenraad professed to not fully understand the Ward proposal, but added, "I look forward to the chance to talk to Jay and the other Council members."

Juggle-a-thon flies

On Saturday January 15 the Juggler's Vein sponsored the first annual Juggle-A-Thon. The event took place for 16 hours in Baxter Hall, with 26 students juggling for half-hour stretches. Tim Sedlock and Tom Paper, both class of '84, organized the event.

Each juggler solicited sponsors for the slots in which they juggled. Over $600 was raised; the money will be donated to the Williamstown Community Chest and to Underprivileged Housing in Sri Lanka.

The sanctity of Bette's Coffee Shop will soon be shattered by sounds of brrreeeeppp, kowplew and Mr. and Mrs. Pac Man's wedding march. (Lane)

Bette's Coffee Shoppe

Donkey Kong added to menu

by Susan Kelfer

Good Morning Jay." "Good Morning Bobby." The men exchange regular hellos as I slump in my chair trying to pry my eyes open. I grunt out that I would like some coffee please while my breakfast partner tries to ascertain whether or not it is too early in the morning to get a hamburger. The waitress assures him that it is, indeed, too early for burgers. Her name is Nellie; she waits patiently while we roust ourselves out of our precaffeine indecision and order some eggs.

We are sitting at one of seven tables in a comfortable narrow hovel on Spring Street—Bette's Coffee Shop. Soon—as of February 1st—the sanctity of Bette's will be shattered by sounds of brrreeeeppp, kowplew and Mr. and Mrs. Pac Man's wedding march. Bette's Coffee Shop is becoming Bette's Video Arcade.

Bette's Video Arcade

The plans to expand Bette's first developed when, as one of the owners explains, he was "trying to think of something to get you kids in here." The result will be an addition to Bette's. The coffee shop half will remain the same; a door will connect the restaurant with what used to be Renzi's Book Store storage space—the storefront to the left of Bette's.

Bette Lauzon opened her place ten years ago. Ronald Lauzon, Bette's son, and Rachel Lauzon now own and run Bette's Coffee Shop. Rachel and Ron took over last year when Bette purchased Pine Hollow Campground in Pownal, Vermont. Both Ron and Rachel are friendly and open to college students. Both explain that most of their customers are regulars—and unfortunately not a lot of them are Williams students. They hope to attract more students with their new addition.

Honey Bette's

Bette's Coffee Shop's hours have been 7 A.M. to 3 P.M. since it first opened. One gets the feeling in fact that not much has changed inside honey Bette's in years.

The menu at Bette's for the past ten years has been basic—eggs, coffee, pancakes and toast in the mornings and hamburger-type fare in the afternoons. After three o'clock, Bette's will now also be serving what the Lauzons call "crazy sandwiches"—Donkey Kong Burgers and Pac Man Sandwiches, for example. The Lauzons did not apply for a liquor license. Rachel explains that "sometimes it's enough of a hassle over coffee, much less drinks." The coffee shop will still be run by Rachel and will open at 7 A.M. as before. The video arcade—run by Ron—will open at 3 in the afternoon, and both will remain open until 11 P.M.

Deleterious side-effects

Bette's Video Arcade will house twelve machines at first—the town will allow the Lauzons to run up to 20 games. Rachel explains that they had to go before the Zoning Board, the Board of Appeals and the Williamstown Selectmen to receive permission to open their arcade. Ron explains that, at first, his proposition "turned the town over a bit for sure." Citizens who originally expressed concern about possible deleterious side-effects of Bette's Video Arcade have been placated by the regulations. Ron says, "I'm still surprised I got it." The conditions under which the Lauzons will be allowed to operate are restricted.

The arcade will open on a trial basis and must go up for review every three months. New town ordinances legislate that no person under 16 may play the games without a parent or guardian present; those between 16 and 18 must have written permission at all times, and must be accompanied by a parent or guardian after 8 P.M.

Williamstown Police Chief Zolito believes the restrictions will enable him to "stay on top of the situation." Ron Lauzon says that enforcing the rule "is going to be a pain in the neck probably," but that trouble is going to have to be prevented somehow. "I can't walk everybody home," he says. There

Duran brings energy to RIO

by Declan McManus

It's a bad time to be reviewing albums, as I cannot find any recent releases worthy of praise. So I'll turn to an album that might as well be new, considering its limited airplay.

Rio, by Duran Duran, was definitely one of the slickest records released in 1982. The glossy Nagel print on the cover conceals nine exquisitely crafted techno-pop tunes. If that term puts you off, don't put aside your paper. This album is successful where many of its kind fail, because instead of just going through the motions of making music, the group has endowed their creation with a large quantity of energy.

Disposable lyrics

The band has not changed their characteristic sound very much for this album. Instead of repeating the work on Duran Duran, their debut album, they have perfected their original product. The music is extremely catchy. If their lyrics are a bit disposable, they at least combine smoothly with an often haunting background sound to produce a mysterious, sometimes elusive package of songs.

The haunting sound is most evident on "Lonely in Your Nightmare." A synthesizer winds like a snake deep within the mix, carrying the listener away to a hazy world of light and music. The recording here is slick, but not offensively over-produced. The listener only feels that he cannot grasp the song. There seem to be no sharp edges to hold on to. The song instead presents itself as a smooth surface.

The group gets a little rougher on the album's two most accessible tracks. The title track opens the album. Although at first hearing it sounds unimpressive, the chorus is decidedly catchy, and calls out to be replayed.

The hit on this album is "Hungry Like the Wolf," which has received some airplay, due

R.P.I.

Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute reported that "a student senate candidate at the University of New Mexico has learned that baring your soul to your constituents isn't necessarily the best way to get elected. Kevin Bersell, a 24-year-old nutrition major hoping to 'grab somebody's eye,' hung campaign posters around campus showing him in the nude. Bersell says the photo, which shows him from behind and in which he wears only wrap-around sunglasses, was taken last summer by his brother. But the student election commission was unimpressed, and ordered Bersell to place 'censored' stickers over his photographed derriere or risk being booted off the ballot. Although the poster did attract attention and publicity, it didn't help. Bersell came in 19th among the 22 candidates vying for 12 Senate seats."

Amherst College

Amherst is violating its non-discrimination policy by renting college property to the local all-male Rotary and Kowans clubs, claim several faculty members. In addition, several highly placed administration members, including Affirmative Action Officer Robert Grose, are members in good standing of the Rotary Club, reports the Student.

President Julian Gibbs maintains that although Amherst owns 75 percent of the stock in the Lord Jeffrey Inn, it is not considered college property. College attorney Richard Howland disagrees, "By any reasonable interpretation of the word 'own,' Amherst owns the Lord Jeff."

As for the administrators in the Rotary, Gibbs said they have been active in the drive to admit women. Besides, "there is nothing illegal about belonging to an organization that discriminates on the basis of sex," he added.

English department secretary Madeline Casey wasn't satisfied with the Affirmative Action Officer's reason for belonging to the Rotary: "You either accept women or you withdraw. One need not be a wimp."

Middlebury

New Vermont legislation prohibits the serving of alcoholic beverages at open parties without a liquor license. Students at Middlebury College report that, as a result, things are a bit quiet around campus at the moment. Fraternities, dormitories and other campus groups may not throw parties at which alcoholic beverages are offered until Middlebury organizes a college catering service. The service will, with liquor license in hand, be hired for all open parties which aspire to serve alcoholic beverages.

Discourtesy disturbs Serenade, Schumann

by Greg Capaldi

One element in Friday night's Music in the Round recital in Brooks-Rogers Hall was appalling. It wasn't the performances, which were worth hearing, though not perfect. It was the audience. At least thirty people arrived late, and some entered the hall during movements instead of between them. One young man distracted listeners and performers alike by taking pictures. Isn't it common knowledge that flash pictures can distract or momentarily blind a performer?

What follows may not be, under the circumstances, a fair appraisal of the playing by MITR director Julius Hegyi and the ensemble. Offered in the more successful first half of the program were Kodaly's Serenade for two violins and viola and Schumann's Piano Quartet.

Vigorous and soulful The Kodaly is a colorful and dramatic blend of nationalistic and contemporary elements. Despite the high scoring, the sound is neither screechy nor top-heavy. This rendition could have done with a little more buoyancy and a little less swooping up to high notes, but it was generally on the mark in both vigorous and soulful passages.

Almost as good was the Schumann. The best thing about the work, besides the gorgeous theme of the slow movement, is the clever construction. Individual movements quote each other and sometimes forecast the theme of the one to follow. Such devices were well-highlighted by the players, who also provided rich string tone and a careful balance with the piano. Unfortunately, two movements had sloppy starts, and the slow movement was too much so.

Dragged out

Ponderous tempi similarly dragged out Beethoven's Trio in E-flat for violin, viola, and cello to excessive length in the second half of the program. A piece with only three monophonic instruments shouldn't demand more than 25 minutes of undivided attention, and this one lasted 38. Despite an expressive reading by the artists, this listener was inclined to agree with a companion's suggestion that Beethoven may not have intended this early work as a recital piece. And the music itself did not seem like one of the composer's more inspired offerings.

are those—the town kids and a few adults—who oppose the restrictions.

And Bette's regulars? "Everybody's wished me luck with it," says Ron. "They want to play too." Of his own feelings, Ron says, "If this works, fine. If it doesn't, well, we'll try somethin' else." Besides, he explains, "I've dropped a few quarters in those games myself." Rachel confesses that she, too, likes to play on occasion. She does however have one concern: "I don't want it to be a dive."

"We're going to do our best," says Rachel. "I just want it to be a nice place where kids can come down and have a good time." Then she looks past my shoulder toward the other end of her shop; a friend is holding up a baby for Rachel to see. She waves, shrugs her shoulders and says, "Hopefully it won't end up being too different than it was before."

Creative decision-making. It's the rule, not the exception, at Chubb.

The property/casualty insurance business demands an ability to make carefully calculated, creative decisions.

Because it's the element of risk that makes insurance necessary — and exciting. Property and casualty insurance involves the highest sort of risk, and is the least predictable form of insurance.

Why? It has been said that people die more or less "on schedule." But who can predict when — or if — a bridge will collapse, an ocean liner will sink, a trusted employee will embezzle, or a home will be burglarized?

Creative thinkers make successful property/casualty insurance professionals. And we should know. It's been our business for 100 years.

Chubb's National Recruiting Coordinator William Harwood, Contract Surety underwriter Bruce Wilson ('79) and Personal Lines underwriter Lucy Shen ('82) will be on hand Tuesday, January 18 at 1:00 pm for career counseling, and at the Log at 7:00 pm for an information session. We cordially invite you to stop by and learn more about Chubb, and our innovative way of doing business. If you're a creative thinker, you will be interested to hear what we have to say.

Hot Jazz to Hit Chapin Hall

by Marc Mazzone

Count Basie is a veritable jazz legend. This pianist has played in most major clubs around the world. But in spite of his fame, his rigorous tour schedule and his falling health, he always seems to find time to play small engagements such as the one planned for Chapin Hall on January 22.

William Basie was born on August 21, 1904 in Red Bank, New Jersey. In his early years he studied piano with his mother; later, Fats Waller became his greatest influence. As a young man, he played in Harlem night clubs, but in his early twenties he joined a black vaudeville group and went on tour with them.

Hottest ticket

When the group disbanded in Kansas City, Basie was left stranded and without a job. His luck soon changed, however, when he was invited to join the Bennie Moten Orchestra.

After Moten's untimely death in 1935, Basie assumed leadership of the band. Shortly thereafter, he was discovered by John Hammond, who introduced him to audiences in Chicago and New York. Almost overnight, the Count Basie Orchestra became one of the hottest tickets of the time.

Since then, it has been all wine and roses. Count Basie has received and continued to receive critical acclaim. He has toured the world over from Latin America to Japan. In 1961 he played at the inaugural ball of John F. Kennedy. Today, he remains much as he was back in 1935: steadfast, yet mobile, inveterate enough to be an anchor in a swiftly changing world, yet dynamic enough not to remain tethered to any particular age.

Count Basie and his band will bring their timeless brand of jazz to Chapin this Saturday.

Timeless tradition

One might wonder at this consistent popularity spanning nearly half a century. Part of the answer certainly lies in the timelessness of Basie's music. Every time the Basie Orchestra plays, it is a fresh experience; they are as modern as they are traditional. And Basie has been able to achieve this modern feel in his band without sacrificing his jazz roots. In his years as a bandleader he has remained faithful to the blues form as the primary source for his music.

Of course none of this would be possible without the extraordinary Basie sidemen. He has managed to consistently recruit top notch musicians, musicians with verve and fire, among them names like Freddie Green, Thad Jones, Clark Terry, Lester Young, Coleman Hawkins, and Jay Jay Johnson.

Charismatic leader

But the greater part of the Basie Orchestra's success must be attributed to the personality of its charismatic leader. Basie's easy, often humorous style behind the piano has helped to establish a unique character that in many ways has been the wellspring of the band's immense popularity for five decades.

That wellspring has shown little sign of drying up. If anything, Count Basie is more active today than he ever was. It seems particularly fitting that the man who in 1935 was one of the foundations of modern jazz should in this year of 1983 be one of its foremost proponents.

Brutus—

Furthermore, Brutus said, the Reagan Administration overturned two Carter decisions, one which had prevented the sale of a military computer to South Africa, and one which had severely limited sales of goods to the South African army and police.

In contrast to Williams, which still owns $20 million in firms which do business in South Africa, Brutus cited a long list of American colleges which have completely divested, including Amherst, Harvard, Brandeis, Yale, Tufts, Mount Holyoke, Smith, Rutgers, U. of Mass., and Ohio State.

Deportation political

Asked about the Immigration Department's notice to deport him, Brutus noted that his attorney was served with a paper informing her that the reasons for his deportation notice are executive order—meaning that neither she nor Brutus is allowed to know what the reasons are. A judge has ruled that a pretrial hearing to discuss the evidence for Brutus deportation notice is in order.

Brutus feels the reasons are political and that that is why they have been classified. Pretoria, he said, may have influenced Washington officials. Brutus, whom the Immigration Department intends to deport to either South Africa, Zimbabwe or England, intends to demonstrate that South African agents can kill him no matter which of the three countries he ends up in.

Following his speech, Brutus led a candlelight vigil at the president's house. The participants in the vigil, perhaps 200 students and faculty, shouted "Divest now!" until President John Chandler came out. Chandler gave a short talk, thanking the participants for their concern and reiterating his conviction that divestment is a "complex issue," as well as assuring everyone that the College "deplores apartheid."

Bottle Bill

"I have no complaints about the law, only the haphazard implementation of it," he said.

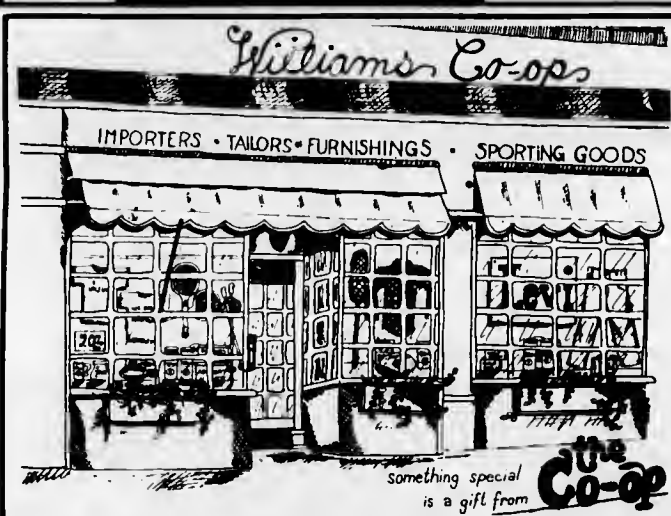

Like King, he is unsure about the law's effects: "It's just going to be a period of learning, for the consumer and for us... I imagine there'll be an initial price shock and the conventional six-pack will be quite expensive."

Nancy Jenks-Jay, head of the recycling program on campus, is also anticipating a trial period of the bill's effects.

Recycling won't cease While she feels there probably won't be an immediate effect on campus recycling this year, "the problem next year will be that the person who picks up our recycling material will not be able to compete with the big distributors" who will be recycling now too.

There will still be things to be recycled here, of course, such as food jars from the co-ops and wine bottles. Jenks-Jay hopes to keep recycling alive on campus by "working out something where we could collaborate with the community," which also has an extensive recycling program.

Prof. Blasts Nukes

by Peter Muz and Ned Ladd

The United States has reached a critical point in the arms race, claimed biology professor Barton Slatko at a Tyler House Talk last Tuesday night.

Because nuclear weapons are becoming standard battlefield equipment "the command to use these weapons will be diverted to a lower level, making it possible for a conflict comparable to the Falklands to escalate into an all-out nuclear war," he said, pointing to West Germany and the Middle East as potential hot spots.

Slatko explained that the concept of a "limited and winnable nuclear war" has made the horrors of nuclear war more palatable to some diplomats. He feared that this false confidence could make nuclear war a terrifying reality in our lifetime.

Psychic numbness

He also spoke of a "psychic numbness" which prevents people from honestly facing the concept of nuclear war. This detachment, said Slatko, allows people to overlook the fact that both the United States and Soviet Union now possess more than enough weapons to blow up the entire world several times over.

In spite of this, people clamor for more powerful and destructive weapons. "The problem," he continued, "is with the political system which is geared to keep the arms race going."

Technology, too, has advanced so much that

Professor Barton Slatko denounced new nuclear weaponry and endorsed a nuclear freeze at Tyler House last Tuesday.

today's weapons are far more destructive than before. Slatko cited the development of first strike and counterforce weapons such as the MX and Pershing II missiles as factors which could bring us closer to a nuclear holocaust.

"We are still at the point that if someone fires a first strike, the counterblow will do serious damage. But with the advent of these new weapons, if the Soviets think we have first strike capability, their best defense may be to fire on us before we fire on them," he said.

Freeze necessary

In light of these developments, Slatko sees the growing nuclear freeze movement as a necessary declaration of intent by the U.S. to start ending the weapons race, and even as a catalyst "toward fruitful U.S.-Soviet arms negotiations."

S. African Investments

Possible divestiture

If these four delinquent corporations do not respond or show evidence of progress against apartheid, the committee could recommend divestiture. This has occurred only once in the history of the committee, according to Markgraf.

During the 1980-81 school year Newmont Industries failed to respond to committee inquiries about wage policy in South Africa. "We became frustrated with the management," said Markgraf, "and recommended divestiture to the Trustees' Finance Committee." The Finance Committee accepted this recommendation and, with the trustees approval, sold all stock in Newmont Industries in January 1981.

Concerns about nuclear proliferation also arose during the ACSF meeting. Reed felt that nuclear weapons and nuclear energy would be the most common referendum topic on corporation proxies. These proxies are scheduled to come out with corporation annual reports sometime this month. They will allow shareholders to vote on social issues that directly relate to corporation activities.

Nuclear options

Committee Chairman Dick Lamb '71 explained that the various stockholder proposals ranged from complete abandonment of all nuclear technology to the banning of production of "offensive nuclear weapons." The committee agreed that each proxy should be considered separately and that no general decision on nuclear policy should be made.

Political Science Professor Vincent Barnett spoke of the need for communication between Williams and other colleges on these and other proxy issues. Committee member John Agostini '76 was appointed to gather information regarding proxy coordination among small New England colleges.

College Council

transfer system without consulting College Council, despite assurances that they would do so.

After an amendment was added altering the debate format originally proposed to a panel discussion, the proposal passed 20-0 with two abstentions. The panel will tentatively be held February 2 and the referendum over two days, February 3 and 4.

Though concern was voiced that an open forum would confuse the issue, Ward expressed the prevailing sentiment in saying that the Council's views should be tested by student opinion.

$11,000 found

The meeting opened with the surprise announcement that $11,000 of Council funds had been discovered in a previously unknown account. The Business Office had diverted the money to the wrong account. The "new" money raises the Council sustaining fund to $16,000.

"It was rough funding groups this year," said John Small, Council treasurer. He pointed out that "people do feel that they were short-changed, and now they'll be coming back for more." The Finance Committee will meet and distribute the newly-found money as groups come forward to ask for it.

The recent closing of the Log to students under the drinking age (20) was also discussed at the meeting. "We have to watch out for ourselves," said Council president Stuart Robinson '83, and emphasized that being admitted to the Log is a privilege. Underclassmen voiced strong dissatisfaction with the situation.

Record criticized

Criticism was directed at the Record for publishing the names of students arrested in the incidents that led up to the placement of restrictions on the Log.

Several people present, including one person whose name had been published, felt that the Record should be held directly accountable to the College Council, since it receives funds from the Council, and said that the Record editors should be called before the Council to explain its policy.

Robinson and Ward opposed this suggestion, referring to it as censorship. Robinson, noting his control of the agenda, refused to allow a vote on the matter.

Track races ahead

by Lyman Casey

Victories in the field events put Williams out in front early, and several strong performances in running events stretched the lead as the Eph track team's 77 points bested Union (62 points), Hamilton (24 points) and Hartwick (10 points) in Schenectady Saturday.

Paul Toland '85 jumped an outstanding 6'5" to win the high jump, and Tomas Alejandro '83 and Hugh Huzenga '84 also came up with victories in the long jump and triple jump.

Bo Parker '84 and Alejandro, both established stars in New England Division III track and, along with John Kowalik '83, tri-captains of the team, are usually counted upon to come through with wins in several events. Saturday was no exception to the rule for these two.

Alejandro added a win in the 50 meter dash, and Parker won both the 1000 and 1500 meter runs. Ian Brzezinski '86 then ran away with the 3000 meter run.

Union strong

The victory over a surprisingly strong Union squad was sealed by the 1500 meter relay squad of Ted Leon '84, Bill Love '86, Kevin Jenkins '85 and Alejandro, which came from behind to win.

The women's track team, shorthanded this weekend, ran well against an overpowering Dartmouth Squad and tough Union, Hamilton, and Hartwick entries, but managed just nine points.

The men and women each face tough meets at home on Friday at 6:00 against Springfield, Westfield, and Albany. The meet will be the Ephs' first home appearance of the season.

Swimmers undefeated

(12:00.3). The Medley Relay team won with a combined time of 2:00.2.

Looking ahead

Both undefeated Williams teams are looking forward to the nationals later this season. Coach Carl Samuelson hopes that if the athletes stay healthy, the Ephs will have a chance at winning the titles.

Williams has two home meets on Saturday. The men face UMass while the women will battle Smith. Samuelson expects Smith to be an especially tough challenge for the Ephwomen. Depth seems to be the only problem for the talented squad. Should the women defeat Smith it would be a promising sign for the nationals.

Pucksters lose

The women's hockey team lost the Molly Stark tournament this weekend, losing Saturday night to a strong Colby team 21-0, and losing the consolation game to Middlebury 6-3 on Sunday.

Team members say they prefer to think about losing Saturday by three—touchdowns. They were disappointed, as they thought they played well, but Colby was too powerful.

Beth Ebel, Pam Briggs, and Bea Fuller scored the three goals Sunday in a game marked by improved defense. Middlebury scored the two insurance goals in the last two minutes.

Squashmen trounced

The varsity squash team had a rough week, losing to both Princeton and Yale and dropping to 10-2 on the season.

Princeton, the nation's top-ranked team last year, had little trouble with the Ephs, winning every match 3-0 en route to an overwhelming 9-0 victory.

Yale, number three last year behind Princeton and Harvard, was a much different story as three Williams players won and three others came within striking distance. The team's top three, juniors Greg Zaff, Tom Harrity and Jeff Sultar all went down to defeat, but number four man Billy Nau and co-captains Jamle King and Matt Lynch came through with solid wins—Nau, 3-1, King, 3-0 and Lynch, 3-1, to make the match score close at 6-3.

The team's next match is at home Friday against Rochester at 3 pm.

Squash successes

The women's squash team won two matches this week—7-0 over Middlebury on Saturday and 4-3 over Dartmouth on Tuesday.

"Everyone played very well," said Coach Renzie Lamb. "Only two matches went to five games, and those were because of a lack of concentration on our part. All of our players were better than theirs."

Tuesday's 4-3 win was the Ephwomen's first ever over Dartmouth. The win is significant as it means that the Williams team could move up to compete in Division I.

Number three player Cassie Fisher '84 clinched the match in a close 3-2 playoff victory. Number two Hilary Thomas '85, number six Liz Cole '83 and number seven Amina Mahmood '84 all crushed their opponents 3-0.

Lamb said, "We proved in this match that we can come up against the big teams and win."

Skiers warm up

The ski teams had a scrimmage with some of their top rivals last weekend.

Coach Bud Fisher said he was pleased with the women's results, as captain Ellen Chandler '83 finished tenth, Sara Bates '85 was 13th, and Karla Miller '85 was 15th.

Fisher was less pleased with the men's X-C results, but was confident that they would improve for the St. Lawrence Carnival next weekend.

The alpine teams did not return until Monday.

by Andrew Garfield

After braving a snow storm which dumped over a foot on New Haven, the men's and women's swim teams raced to decisive victories over Southern Connecticut State College.

Led by Rob Bowman '83 and Rob Sommer '84, the men increased their record to 4-0 with the 70-43 triumph. Bowman won the 500 freestyle (4:54.1) and the 1000 freestyle (10:03.3). Sommer won the 200 backstroke (2:02.1) and the 200 individual medley (2:02.5). Bill Couch '86 finished second in the 500 free with an impressive time of 4:56.8. Ben Aronson '83 was the runner-up in the 1000 free.

The other winners included Dave Johnson '83 in the 200 breast (2:18.5), Peter Orphanos '85 in the 200 fly (2:01.9) and Will Andrew '86 in the 200 free (1:48.5). Jeff Mills '84 turned in a solid performance by finishing second in the 50 free (22.5) and the 100 free (48.9).

The team of Couch, Johnson, Orphanos and Frank Fritz '83 won the Medley Relay with a time of 3:46.5. Jim Stockton '83 won the 3 meter dive competition and came in second in the one meter dives.

Women win big

The women sunk Southern Connecticut 107-36, losing only two events. Freshman Kathy Kirmayer led the charge, winning the 100 backstroke (1:04.1) and qualifying for the nationals with a 2:18.7 victory time in the 200 back.

Senior Co-Captains Katie Hudner and Liz Jex each won two events while Kim Eckrich '85 won three. Hudner won the 100 IM (1:06.3) and the 50 free (26.3). Jex was triumphant in the 200 free (2:01.7) and the 500 free (5:29.8). Eckrich prevailed in the 100 breast (1:14.1), the 200 breast (2:39.3) and the 400 IM (4:58.2).

Dina Esposito '83 won both the one meter and 3 meter diving events. Other winners included Rachel Stauffer '85 in the 100 free (57.3), Cecelia Cieplela '84 in the 200 fly (2:24.2) and Jonna Kurucz '85 in the 1000 free

Hoopsters net second in tourney

by Ward Katsanis

The women's basketball team took second place in the Molly Stark Classic over the weekend by beating Middlebury 51-46 on Saturday, but falling to Colby in the championship game, 56-31 on Sunday.

Poor shooting (9 of 38) in the first half put the Ephs behind 24-18 on Sunday. In the second half, Colby came out running and moved the ball inside to pull away from Williams. The final score ended 56-31 to give Colby the championship.

T. K. Meehan '83 led Williams with 14 points in leading the squad to second place in the tourney. Therese Langlois scored 18 points for Colby.

Williams Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin cited her team's small bench and inability to match Colby's pace as the difference in the game.

Against Middlebury in the first round, Williams jumped to a 27-17 halftime lead. The Panthers whittled down the lead throughout the second half. The game was a see-saw battle through the last ten minutes until Meehan sank two free throws with 1:45 remaining to put Williams ahead for good.

Senior Kathy Evans iced the game with a jumper and two free throws in the last 40 seconds.

Evans led all scorers with 15 points, and Meehan chipped in with 12. Hudson-Hamblin commented that Williams' press and defense were very effective. She was also pleased that the team never lost its cool.

In the consolation game Sunday, Hamilton College soundly defeated the Panthers by a 67-26 margin.

The Molly Stark tournament is traditionally hosted by Middlebury, but this year was moved to Williams.

Earlier in the week Williams faced a powerful Dartmouth squad and lost 74-28. Tracy Burrows '84 netted 12 points and collected 11 rebounds for Williams.

The team plays Hamilton tomorrow at Hamilton and Union this Saturday at home at 6:00.

Tracy Burrows '84 goes up for a shot in the Ephs' 51-46 victory over Middlebury Saturday in the first round of the Molly Stark tourney. Williams lost the championship to Colby Sunday. (Shapiro)

Icemen skate into second place

by Dave Woodworth

The men's varsity hockey squad placed second in the Lake Forest Invitational tourney played in Chicago this weekend. Williams won its opening game against host Lake Forest, 4-3, but lost to Bowdoin in the finals by a 5-2 count.

In the championship game, Bowdoin registered the first four goals of the contest. Williams finally got on the board at 2:55 of the third period when Brian Rutledge '85 tallied unassisted, cutting the lead to 4-1.

The Polar Bears' John Theberge (with two goals and an assist on the night), stretched the margin to 5-1 shortly thereafter, however, essentially putting the game away. The Ephs' Rich Jackson '85 rounded out the scoring with a goal at the buzzer, assisted by Mike Uretsky '85 and Rutledge.

Once again Dan Finn '84 faced a barrage of shots, 52 in all, and turned aside 47 of them. Williams, on the other hand, managed only a comparatively paltry 32 shots.

Hat trick

Williams got into the finals by virtue of a 4-3 win over Lake Forest on Friday night. Jeff Potter '85 was the hero of that game, as he notched Williams' first hat trick of the season. Dan Finn turned in another brilliant performance, making 41 saves. With a midweek loss at Middlebury, Williams' record drops to 3-7 on the year.

The team travels to Salem State tonight, then to Union on Saturday.

Chiefs scalp Ephs in massacre

by John Clayton

In two tough road games, the basketball team lost 80-64 to Springfield Saturday and 72-70 to Dartmouth last Tuesday.

All-American guard Buddy Clarke scored 26 points and Gary Grumoli added 24 to pace the Chiefs. Springfield led throughout the game; the Ephs cut the lead to two at 48-46 with 12 minutes left, but could not keep up with the powerful Chiefs.

Pidoriano leads

Art Pidoriano '84 once again led Williams with 20 points. Co-captain Scott Olesen netted 12 and junior Dave Krupski added 11 for the Ephmen.

The Chiefs jumped out to an early lead, with Czerapowicz defending Pidoriano well, although Krupski scored all of his 11 points in that half.

The halftime score was 39-31, Springfield. But Williams ran off six in a row at the beginning of the second half to cut the lead to 39-37.

The game then remained close until the eight-minute mark, as Clarke and Grumoli paced the Chief's to the win.

The game was a physical one, as Krupski, Olesen, Pidoriano, and Springfield's Dan Czerapowicz fouled out. Williams committed 25 fouls in the game, 18 in the second half, as the Eph front line had trouble containing 6-7 center. Pedro De La Cruz (11 points).

Springfield (7-1) is second in the Division II New England standings.

Near upset

The hoopsters faced more upper-division competition last Tuesday, when they just missed upsetting Division I Dartmouth.

With the score tied at 70 and 1:33 remaining, Williams called a time-out to set up a stall for the last shot. However, with 30 seconds left, the Ephs fumbled the ball out of bounds.

After another time-out and a Big Green stall, Matt Stewart got free for a baseline shot. Although the shot missed, Pidoriano was called for a controversial foul on the play, and Stewart hit the two free throw with three seconds remaining.

Even so, the Ephmen just missed sending the game into overtime, as senior Andy Goodwin's desperation shot hit the rim at the buzzer.

McNicholas off bench

Pidoriano led all scorers with 26 points. Junior forward John McNicholas came off the bench to score 21 points, as he got hot from outside.

Dartmouth (5-7) dominated the first half, with their lead peaking at 13. However, the Ephmen came back in the second half, with Pidoriano and McNicholas leading the way, with their lead peaking at 63-59.

The last five minutes were a back-and-forth defensive battle, with McNicholas and Olesen doing an impressive job on the bigger Dartmouth forwards.

Difficult schedule

In the middle of the difficult part of their schedule, Williams travels to Trinity tonight for their third road game in a row. Trinity is ranked in the top ten in Division III in New England. The team then returns to face Connecticut College at home Saturday night at 8:00.

Grapplers go downFall to WPI, Albany State

by Chris Clarey

The wrestling team lost both its games this week—30-9 to highly regarded WPI and 35-7 to Albany State.

Saturday's match against WPI, originally scheduled as a tri-meet with including RPI, featured close matches and low scoring.

The lower weights were once again a handicap to Williams' cause, as the team was forced to forfeit at 118 lbs. and lost at 126, 134 and 142 lbs. consecutively.

Narrow the gap

Tri-captain John Leahy '84, wrestling for the first time this year after his recovery from knee problems, finally stemmed the tide at 150 lbs. with a 6-2 win over Nick Triantafell. Leahy controlled the match from the beginning, scoring the first four points and allowing Triantafell points only on escapes.

Sophomore Jeff May took a minor decision 7-1 at 158 lbs. over Paul Wyman, raising his individual record to 4-1 and narrowing the match gap to ten points.

However, WPI bounced right back, sweeping the next three weight classes and putting the match far out of Williams' reach at 30-6.

Positive note

One final positive note for the Ephmen was heavyweight Gary Stosz's 9-8 victory over George Duane in the meet's final match. Stosz used his 240 lbs. to good advantage, controlling Duane throughout most of the match and gaining the decision on the basis of "riding time."

Despite the loss, Coach Joe Dalley was "still pleased with the team's performance" stating "we expected WPI would be tough, but their skill coupled with our nagging injuries was too much to overcome."

Loss to Albany

Only juniors Dave Bicknell at 177 lbs. and tri-captain Chris Woodworth at 190 lbs. emerged with wins as Albany State pinned four Williams wrestlers and decimated three others in Wednesday's match.

Albany put the match out of reach early, sweeping the first six matches and amassing a 30-0 lead.

Bicknell's 17-8 victory over Doug Slater showcased Bicknell's technical skill and quick escape ability. Rough, brawling action was prevalent in Woodworth's 5-4 win over John Dehn.

Tri-captain John Leahy '84 has the upper hand over Nick Triantafell in Saturday's wrestling match against WPI. Ephs lost, 30-9. (Plonsker)

WAAC begins hunger strike

Written by Ned Ladd; reported by Jeff Brainard, Katya Hokanson, Dan Keating and Ned Ladd.

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) declared a hunger strike to protest Williams' investments in South Africa after meeting with the Trustees' Finance Committee last week. Three of its members began fasting Friday evening.

Trustees on the Committee expressed anger at the "prearranged hunger strike" and felt that it would have "no effect" on their deliberations concerning divestment of College funds from South Africa.

WAAC had agreed to send ten representatives to the Finance Committee meeting, but all of the estimated 150 participants in a rally held before the meeting crowded into the Hopkins Hall conference room.

WAAC spokesman Steve Sowle '83 presented its demands that the College divest in 15 companies which have been cited by WAAC for non-compliance with the Sullivan Principles, withdraw all short-term deposits from banks which loan money to South Africa, and restructure the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) to include student-elected members.

No change in policy Finance Committee Chairman Charles Mott said these demands required further study and declined to respond. Sowle then immediately announced the commencement of the hunger strike.

The three hunger strikers are seniors Derede Arthur and Eric Fernald and junior Mark White.

They have moved into Hopkins room 12 where they have announced plans to remain until their demands are met.

College President John Chandler stated that there will be no immediate change in the Trustees' investment policy as a result of the strike. He said he was personally "distressed" by the strike and feared for the health of the strikers.

Chandler also explained that although the implications of the hunger strike were serious, the WAAC petition advocating divestment, which was signed by 1200 students, carried more weight. "The Trustees will take seriously this outpouring of sentiment," he said.

"Pressure tactics"

Chandler expressed dismay at what he called the "pressure tactics" used by WAAC in Friday's meeting, saying, "the Trustees were frustrated, annoyed, and even angry in the hot, uncomfortable room jammed full of people." He blamed WAAC for making the meeting "a mockery" and said that the Trustees had little time to respond to the issues brought up by WAAC.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor charged that the members of WAAC never intended to hear out the Trustees in the first place.

WAAC spokesman Sowle admitted that WAAC had been "considering extreme action for a while" but cited frustration with what he termed continued Trustee inaction as the primary motivation behind the hunger strike.

Women's studies may be offered

by Lucy Lytle

A proposal to offer a concentration in women's studies was unanimously passed by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) in their meeting last week. The Committee is also considering a proposal to make introductory Italian a year-long course. If approved by the faculty at their February 9 meeting, the women's studies program would go into effect next fall. The program requires students to take Women's Studies 101 (Introduction to Feminist Thought) and Women's Studies 401 (a senior seminar) as well as an additional three Women's Studies electives from at least two departments.

Calling it "a strong, well-conceived, valuable program," CEP chairman Lawrence Graver is optimistic that the proposal will be approved by the faculty. Women's Studies Advisory Committee member Rosemarie Tong agreed, admitting that "the committee anticipates that the proposal will do very well on the faculty floor."

Tong noted, however, that despite "strong faculty commitment to teaching women's studies" and demonstrated student interest, there are "gaps" in the number of the program's elective courses in anthropology, biology and psychology.

Tong expects this situation to improve because the anthropology department recently made "a definite commitment to hire someone to teach a women's studies course, such as 'Anthropology of Sex Roles'" while the biology and psychology departments "are exploring the possibility" of developing more Women's Studies programs.

The CEP will consider the Italian proposal next month as part of a package for the Romanic languages. Citing "a growing student interest in languages," increased participation in the Junior Year Abroad program, and a "big turnout" for the beginning Italian course offered during Winter Study, Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley stated "I don't see any problems in getting the proposal approved."

If passed by the CEP, the proposal, which provides for a regular two-semester course with a sustaining program during Winter Study, will go before the faculty for approval at a meeting tentatively scheduled for March 16.

Pending approval of the proposal, a former Williams professor currently teaching at North Adams State College has been contacted and, according to Oakley, is "very enthusiastic" about the possibility of teaching Italian at Williams. His appointment also depends on approval by the Board of Trustees.

Trustees discuss Admissions, Log

by Tim Johnson and Jack Mayher

A proposal to enlarge the freshman class to about 510 students in the near future was introduced to the Trustees at their meeting last Thursday night with the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL). The new house transfer policy, effective this spring, and problems involving the Log were also discussed extensively.

"We recognize that the greater part of this school's talent and diversity is found in the prospective freshman applicant pool, not in our transfer and exchange programs," explained Dean of Freshmen Cris Roosenraad.

The admission committee has aimed for an incoming class of 490 students in past years. Raising that number to 510 would give Williams a student body of 1910.

The inflexibility of campus housing constitutes the main barrier to the proposal, however. The six current freshman dorms will not be able to accommodate the new increase, Roosenraad said.

Scattered freshmen

One proposal, termed "scattering" by Roosenraad, would distribute about 20 students, deemed "exceptionally mature" by the admissions committee, among upperclass houses. Dean Daniel O'Connor added that such students would be older members of the freshman class who had deferred their admission for a year or more. There are four freshmen currently living in upperclass dorms.

It was intriguing fantasy until I awoke to discover that it was actually a surprising reality. I turned on my light and said hello to my suite mate and two of our friends, one of whom had managed to crawl under my desk in pursuit of something of pressing urgency. They giggled

It is no mean feat to catch up on years of television, but it is imperative that we make an effort to do so. Chances are that sooner or later, a cure for Herpes will be discovered, so we cannot rely on that virus to buy us the time to catch up with the times. We must feverishly work to ensure that "the great educator" is recognized as the one implement available to prevent us all from being held prisoner in the Sexual Revolution.

Elvis Costello once called Ray Charles a "nigger" when he was drunk. It has taken years for his public to forgive him. Thousands of teenagers were killed while driving drunk last year. My next door neighbor back home was an alcoholic who committed suicide when she was drunk one night. My best friend's father was drunk one night and threatened his entire family with an ice pick. Two of them (not the one under the desk—he was concentrating) giggled at me and pounced upon the tin of three flavors of popcorn my grandmother had given me for Christmas. I'm not sure if they were trying to eat it or throw it at their faces to see it bounce off.

In any case, the tin soon emptied and the two of them had nothing left to do but watch their equally obfuscated companion's hindquarters as he knelt head first under the desk, as determined as ever not to come out until he had succeeded at whatever task he had set for himself. Trustees clarify College position on divestment

In view of the continuing campus discussion of whether Williams should refuse to invest in companies that do business in or with South Africa, the Trustees wish to set forth their position on the various issues implicit in the question of the College's responsibilities as an investor. The statement here will reiterate some of the points made in our statement of August, 1978. (This statement was originally printed in the Record, January, 1980.)

A college is in essence a community of teachers and students committed to the pursuit of knowledge and to the nurturing and development in its members of those dispositions and skills conducive to the discovery, understanding, preservation and transmission of knowledge. That commitment defines the College's central mission, which is fundamentally intellectual and educational in nature rather than political or economic. Only by strict adherence to that commitment can the College properly serve not merely the immediate needs of its own membership but also the long-term needs of society at large. And that commitment is a profoundly moral one. Against its exacting demands all other claims on the College's moral energies and financial resources must carefully be weighed.

By virtue of their office and as custodians of the College's endowment the Trustees incur several obligations. In the first place, they are obligated to maintain the conditions necessary for Williams to fulfill its intellectual and educational mission, both now and in the indefinite future. In the second place, they are morally and legally obliged to respect the intentions of those who gave the funds that constitute the College's endowment. Those donors clearly intended that their gifts be used to further the College's educational mission. In light of this consideration, and in the third place, the Trustees must respond with great caution to any suggestion that the College's resources and influence be diverted to serve ends not immediately related to that primary mission. Any such diversion not only risks calling into question the College's faithfulness to the intentions of the donors to whom it owes its existence and continuing vitality, but also carries with it the threat of dividing and politicizing the institution and thus jeopardizing its ability to fulfill its mission. But a further—and fourth—duty of the Trustees is to ensure that the College conducts its business, including the investment of its endowed funds, in a legal and moral fashion. In particular, as an investor in American corporations that do some of their business abroad, the College through its Trustees has a right to expect companies in which it owns shares to follow business policies and practices in their foreign and domestic operations that are broadly consistent with the moral and social ideals of American society.

Meeting all these obligations in a balanced fashion is not easy. The obligations are often in tension one with another, and, even when they are not, they are likely to generate perplexing dilemmas capable of dividing into rival camps even people who are unified in their devotion to the College and in agreement concerning the abhorrence of particular social and political conditions in the larger society and world. Moral condensation and the tactics of political mobilization have little to contribute to the resolution of such dilemmas. Economic affairs present a much more tangled spectacle than that of simple choices between financial gain and respect for human rights. In making responsible judgments and decisions one must distinguish moral turpitude from the complexity, confusion and intrusions of uncontrollable events that often characterize economic affairs. Choosing a responsible course of action requires, therefore, a patient process of rational deliberation, pursued in an atmosphere of openness, calm, objectivity and civility.

These generalizations are pertinent when one considers any of the many issues which particular individuals and groups wish to address through the use of institutional endowment policies. While there has been interest at Williams and elsewhere in using shareholder positions to influence decisions on nuclear power, environmental questions, weapons manufacture and other issues, the primary focus of concern has been American business activity in South Africa.

Perhaps it would be helpful to set forth some practical concerns that the Trustees must weigh when they are urged to adopt a policy of divesting the stock of companies with South African operations.

South African operations usually represent a small fraction—typically less than one percent—of the total business activity of those American companies that have a presence there. But the number of American corporations with some practical involvement in South Africa is large, representing about half the stock value of companies traded on the New York Stock Exchange. Were shareholding in such companies to be foreclosed to the College its list of potential investments would be severely constricted. Indeed, some categories of attractive investment opportunity would be almost totally eliminated. Moreover, many companies that do business in South Africa also extend generous support to institutions of higher education, including Williams. In case of a decision to divest, the College must in consistency decide whether it can properly continue to accept contributions from companies whose stock it refuses to own. Again, it has to determine whether it can accept contributions from the matching gift programs of many of those same companies. Williams receives hundreds of such gifts yearly that match (sometimes in a 2-for-1 or 3-for-1 formula) the contributions of those Williams alumni and parents who work for those companies. A generalized policy of divestment, if consistently pursued, would suggest that the College refuse to accept those matching contributions, and that decision would almost certainly disrupt relations with many alumni.

Important as these practical considerations are, there are more basic issues that also need to be addressed.

All agree that apartheid is clearly inimical to the moral and social ideals of American society. All agree, too, that that fact calls for careful monitoring

There is virtually no evidence to suggest that selling a company's stock is an effective way to influence that company's behavior.

by the College insofar as it holds shares in companies with South African operations. Neither of these points is at issue. What is at issue is the nature of the action to be taken and the objective for which it is taken. For some, both action and objective are clear, simple, and straightare clear, simple and straight forward. The action: divestment of stocks in all companies with operations in South Africa. The objective: forcing the withdrawal of American companies from that troubled land in the hope of promoting its economic isolation. For others, no less concerned about the moral issues involved, the matter remains a good deal more problematic. They believe that the question of whether to subject South Africa to a policy of economic isolation is a legitimate and important issue for the American government to decide but are troubled by the suggestion that colleges should adopt an official position on the question. Passing beyond that fundamental issue, they remain unconvinced that the objective of forcing the withdrawal of American companies from South Africa is necessarily a desirable one for the South African people themselves. They are even less convinced—even if it were desirable—that the divestment of stock by colleges and universities would do much to promote that end. Instead, they advocate as a more appropriate and effective measure the use of the College's position as a stockholder to influence the American companies in which it holds shares to conduct their foreign operations in accord with broad principles of conduct generally accepted by U.S. companies.

It is with the latter viewpoint, shared by the overwhelming majority of American colleges and universities, that the Trustees chose to align themselves in 1978 and with which they continue to align themselves today. There is virtually no evidence to suggest that selling a company's stock is an effective way to influence that company's behavior. On the other hand, there is growing evidence that companies are responsive when even a small percentage of shares are voted against management. Accordingly, the Trustees continue to believe that the most effective and responsible way for the College to influence the behavior of companies is through careful use of its proxy powers as a shareholder, in combination with other forms of communication with management.

With regard to business operations in South Africa the principles formulated (and updated) by the Reverend Leon Sullivan will in most instances constitute a practical statement of the standards accepted by American companies in their operations within the United States, and the Trustees hereby reaffirm their stated commitment to the effort to persuade American companies operating in South Africa to adopt and abide by those principles. If conversations, letters, and shareholder resolutions fail over a reasonable period of time to persuade the managers of a company that the Sullivan principles or their equivalent should be adopted and followed, then there would be good grounds for questioning the willingness or capacity of the company's management to run the business in a fashion deserving of the support of the College. This judgment could, in an extreme instance, lead to the decision to sell the stock, recognizing that such a decision to sell would also terminate any possibility of influencing company policies through the prerogatives of a shareholder.

While the Trustees are responsible for overall investment policy in both its financial and social dimensions, they rely on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities to recommend specific actions with respect to ethical and social questions pertaining to the companies in which the College holds shares. In the past they have in fact adopted most of the committee's recommendations, including a recommendation last year to sell the College's stock in a particular company. They commend its painstaking and thoughtful work and urge members of the Williams community to convey to the Advisory Committee those views and concerns that relate to questions properly falling within its purview.

As the Trustees continue to deal with questions relating to the College's responsibilities as a shareholder their principal concern will be to preserve the College's capacity to discharge its central intellectual and educational mission not only now but into the indefinite future. As they come to grips with the enormous complexities of these issues and discharge the full range of their obligations they will continue to need the patience, support and understanding of the Williams community as a whole.

Back to Basie

by Marc Mazzone

It was more than respect for the Count Basie legend that brought the Saturday night audience to its feet before a single note had been played, more even than admiration for the determination with which the 79-year-old pianist appeared onstage in a motorized wheel-chair from which he worked his way onto the piano bench.

It was something in the humor and warmth he seemed to exude effortlessly, something in his demeanor that suggested happiness and a deep affirmation of life. The Count is indeed an awesome stage presence. His humor, his relaxed style, and the tremendous enjoyment he derives from what he does fills the hearts of his audience.

Still swinging

Just what the sold-out crowd in Chapin Hall expected is uncertain, but the initial standing ovation was earned many times over in the two hours that the band played. The present personnel are some of the finest Basie has had in years. They play commitment and energy. The ensemble work is tight and precise; the entire band can play in the same nonchalant vein as its leader, yet still swing.

But in addition to the felicity of its ensemble passages, the Count Basie Orchestra has always been a terrific band for soloists, and Saturday night was no exception. They opened with the up-tempo "Wind Machine", in which tenor saxophonist Eric Schneider blew a dazzling technical display for sixty-four bars. Basie once admitted that he was "queer for tenor men", and the enormous list of great tenor players in his band emphasizes the point. Newcomer Schneider and veteran Eric Dixon both exhibited the proficiency that Basie has always expected of the men in these seats.

Trombonist Dennis Wilson soloed on his own arrangement of Jay Jay Johnson's "La-ment". Wilson's incredible technique combined with a range that spanned fully five octaves on the horn to make this one of the highlights of the first set.

In contrast to Wilson's elegant ballad style was the impeccable plunger technique of Bootie Wood's bold trombone. The plunger solo has always been an integral part of the Basie band, and Bootie Wood is one of the foremost in a school of impressive trombonists who have perfected that technique. His assertive, brassy style brought him cheers in a monumental six-chorus blues solo, prodded by a series of typically humorous and easy statements from Basie's inimitable piano.

Fast flugelhorn

Among the trumpets, it was Bob Summers who brought down the house. In a furious arrangement of "There Will Never Be Another You", Summers raced through an astounding flugelhorn solo that was bright, fast, and executed with brilliant precision. The first set closed with Ernie Wilkins' "Basie" and a fiery tenor solo by Schneider.

Hunger Strike—

The meeting featured a WAAC presentation outlining its reasons for demanding divestment. Andrew Levin '83 stated that "Americans have supported a race war" in South Africa by investing in corporations which do business in South Africa.

Costs, benefits

WAAC also addressed the structure of the ACSR. Sue Reilly '85 said the system of appointment of ACSR members was unacceptable. "If we are to take the ACSR seriously," she concluded, "we must have elections."

Mott felt WAAC misunderstood many of the issues surrounding divestment. He claimed that "divestment is ineffective" in terms of forcing corporations to pull out of South Africa. "There is no benefit and there is some cost," Mott concluded.

WAAC contested this, claiming that the political situation in South Africa is increasingly unstable and thus that investments there are a financial risk. It also cited other institutions which have divested with "negligible, if any, losses."

Profs join strikers

On Sunday religion professor Nathan Katz announced that "the members of the Williams College faculty have formed a support committee to express solidarity with the hunger strikers and full support of the demands presented by WAAC to the College Trustees' Finance Committee on January 21, 1983." The participating professors include:

GIFT CERTIFICATES

Faculty develops talent through research funds

by Chris Howlett

Faculty are being given the chance to "develop," as President Chandler recently announced several new faculty development programs as part of the Williams in the Eighties plan and report.

Beginning next year, two annual awards will relieve faculty members of all teaching responsibilities "except for a special seminar focused on the area of their current research," said Chandler. These seminars will be open to other faculty as well as students.

In addition, up to three similar awards will be given each year to faculty interested in developing new courses, particularly in fields in which they did not do their graduate work.

According to Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley, the courses to date have focused mainly on interdisciplinary areas. "I think we've given more support to courses related to Women's Studies than anything else," he said, although History of Ideas, Political Economy and Afro-American Studies have also received attention.

Business careers

A completely new program will begin this summer for faculty members contemplating career changes. President Chandler has established two $2500 fellowships to help faculty planning to change to a business-related career attend summer business school.

These three programs will be funded by a $1 million endowment established specifically for faculty development in the eighties, and made up partly of grants from the Mellon and Hewlett Foundations and alumni gifts.

Chandler expects these funds to grow. "It is anticipated that the presently budgeted $100,000 (per year) will be increased as additional resources become available and specific needs and opportunities are identified," he said. "The recent announcement that the Class of 1958 plans to designate its 25th reunion gift as an endowment fund for faculty enhancement indicates further progress."

These funds will also be used to continue several existing faculty programs, including paid semester leaves for assistant professors.

Oakley is especially proud of these. Whereas only about three a year were possible before funding began five years ago, ten or eleven are given annually now.

Little 3 conferences

"That's a critical time in people's career. I think it's a damn good program," Oakley said. However, many younger faculty members don't realize what an unusual opportunity it is for them to have a semester off at full pay.

"I don't think, in all honesty, that that's appreciated," Oakley commented.

Another program which has been very successful in past years is the annual Little Three faculty conference, where professors from the three schools meet to discuss a particular topic and read papers which they have prepared. These papers are later reprinted in the Berkshire Review.

This year's conference met at Amherst last week under the title "Expertise and the Politics of Risk." The participants were mainly members of the political science, economics and psychology departments, although any interested faculty members could attend. The topic shifts yearly and will be more humanities-oriented next year, Oakley explained.

Since each college usually sends about 25 members, the faculty have an excellent chance to get to know their colleagues at the other schools. "It's like having all our departments tripled," Oakley said. "The operations [at the colleges] are similar so you start with something in common."

Computer literacy

In addition, several more technical programs exist for "faculty enrichment."

Lawrence Wright, director of the college computer center, is currently teaching a course in general computer literacy which includes faculty and staff as well as students. This is the course's first year open to students; it began two years ago to serve college office staffs and faculty in other departments.

According to Wright, the very popular course is a compression of Computer Science 131, covering terminology, general programming and the BASIC language. It runs from the beginning of January until Spring Break.

Faculty take the course for a variety of reasons. Associate professor of music Douglas Moore took the course last year "simply to start the effort to become computer-literate, and as a way for me to get to know what can be done with computers in music."

Moore emphasized the relevance of such learning to any faculty member's field. "No matter what department you're in, there's an office that's running it" which will undoubtedly be using computer and word processor equipment, he said.

For this reason, math professor Neil Grabois is currently preparing a one-week summer seminar in micro-computing for faculty who have little or no previous experience. The course will be taught by assistant professor William Lenhart with a grant the college received from the Sloane Foundation.

Scientists examine history

by Steve Magnus

Winter Study is a time for reflection, not only for students, but also for academic departments, as science and mathematics professors demonstrated last Thursday in the IBM-sponsored lecture "Aspects of the History of Science at Williams College."

Biology professor Lee Drickamer kicked off the program with a slide presentation of buildings where science or mathematics classes either used to be or are currently held.

History of science professor Donald Beaver emphasized that science has played an increasingly smaller role in liberal education. Since 1900, he said, there has been a dramatic reduction in graduation and major requirements in the sciences and in the size of these departments' faculties relative to other departments.

Professors then spoke on the history of their departments, beginning with the most modern science, computer science, and ending with the most ancient, mathematics.

Computer growth

Mathematics professor Lawrence Wright said there has been "exponential growth" in enrollment in computer science and in the College's overall use of computers since 1968, the year of Williams' first computer science course. The course was then offered non-credit, since the administration "did not consider programming of enough intellectual content to constitute a full-fledged course."

Williams first offered psychology courses in 1891, according to psychology professor Richard Rouse. At that time psychology was part of the philosophy department, and did not separate until 1945. Williams graduate G. Stanley Hall, class of 1867, founded developmental psychology.

Amos Eaton, class of 1799, became a distinguished geology professor at Williams, according to geology professor Markes Johnson. Eaton also published the first geological fieldbook in the United States and founded RPI, in spite of having been convicted of forgery and imprisoned (originally for life) as a young man.

Drickamer said Williams did not teach Darwin's theory of evolution until 1902, 30 years after its general acceptance in the scientific community. It then took another 20 years before the biology department offered a full course on evolution.

Phosphorescent cream

Chemistry professor Diana Sedney told of Reverend Chester Dewey, Williams' first chemistry lecturer, as well as an early geologist. He was known to perform startling experiments on students, she said; not only did he run electric current through them, but he smeared phosphorescent cream onto their faces so they would glow in the dark.

In the mid-1800's, "physics" was not yet a word, according to physics professor William Wooters. Physics was then taught under the realm of natural philosophy. Early Williams physicists considered whether some parts of a tree have stronger wood than others, whether matter is infinitely divisible and what the nature of light is.

Hopkins Observatory is the oldest astronomical observatory in the country, said physics professor Karen Kwitner. It is named after Albert Hopkins (the brother of Mark, an early astronomer at Williams, who supervised its construction).

"Astronomy, both in general and at Williams, has come a long way," Kwitner concluded.

Divestment, tenure motions passed

by David Kleit

The College Council passed a divestment motion initiated by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) and proposed a modification in the tenure process at a meeting held January 19.

The WAAC motion, passed by a vote of 19-2 with two abstentions, called for the divestment by the college of stock in fifteen companies accused of encouraging apartheid. It asked the College to stop holding short-term notes in banks making loans to South Africa. The motion also proposed changing the selection process for the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) so that student members would be selected by direct student election and faculty members would be chosen by the faculty.

A modification of the tenure system was proposed in response to a series of motions by sophomore Steve Magnus. The Council approved a motion calling for required use of student evaluation forms by non-tenured faculty, including sending the statistical data from these forms to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP).

A publicity effort to increase student awareness of the tenure process passed unanimously. A motion to place a faculty member selected by the College Council on the CAP was defeated.

The Grosvenor Memorial Cup, presented annually by College Council to the member of the junior class who best exemplifies the traditions of Williams, was awarded to Tom Paper '84.

Jon Tigar '84, editor-in-chief of the Record, briefly explained the recent change in Record policy which led to the publication of two student's names following their arrests. He said that the new policy was designed to "treat the people involved and our readership as adults."

Risking flat feet, over 60 people took part in a marathon dance to raise funds for the Northern Berkshire Association for Retarded Citizens last Friday. (Shapiro)

Dance-A-Thon

A dance marathon to benefit retarded citizens was held last weekend at Lasell gym. The proceeds from the marathon will go to the Northern Berkshire Association for Retarded Citizens located in North Adams.

Dance organizer Dan Iacovella said that the marathoners raised approximately $1200 for NOBARC, which has provided residential, vocational and counseling assistance to the retarded since 1977.

66 students participated, 16 of whom lasted for all 12 hours. Iacovella called the marathon a success and is considering running another one next year.

Luce programs renewed

Williams College has received a three-year, $120,000 grant from the Henry Luce Foundation to bring distinguished black scholars and speakers to campus. The grant is similar to one awarded by the Luce Foundation in December 1979.

David Smith, assistant professor of English and chairman of the committee which administers Luce funds, believes that "the Luce grant has been enormously successful; the events it has sponsored have had a major impact on the intellectual and cultural life of the college."

Teachers this semester

This year, the Luce grant is sponsoring two full-time visiting professors. Dalton Miller-Jones is teaching in the psychology department all year and Clyde Criner '75 will offer two courses in the music department this spring. In addition, Rowland Wiggins of Hampshire College is teaching a Winter Study course on African-American music for the third straight year.

Programs made possible by the Luce Foundation earlier this year included a symposium on "Black Women's Agenda for the Feminist Movement in the 1890's," and visits by feminist poet Audre Lord, folk-singer Elizabeth Cotton and the improvisational jazz trio "Air."

Artistic alum receives $172,000

Author, actor and film maker John Sayles '72 was recently awarded $172,000, to be paid in installments over the next five years, by the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation.

The MacArthur awards are given annually to scholars in a variety of fields. Their purpose is to free recipients from economic constraints so that they can devote themselves to research and creative work. Recipients are free to use the money as they see fit without obligation.

Individuals cannot apply for the grants. Instead, the Foundation relies on anonymous nominations from its team of talent scouts.

Sayles first emerged in the national spotlight in 1978 when his first film, "Return of the Secaucus Seven," was widely considered one of the best releases of the year.

His newest film, "Lianna," recently opened in New York city to favorable reviews.

Renzi's star

Both films were written and directed by Sayles and include in their casts Sayles. Maggie Renzi '73 and Jeffrey Nelson '70. Renzi is the daughter of Ralph Renzi, proprietor of the College Book Store, who had a walk-on part in "Lianna."

Historic window restored

A century-old stained-glass window in Thompson Memorial Chapel which was in danger of crumbling has been restored by Cummings Studio of North Adams.

The window, located in the chapel's west transept, was dedicated to US President and alumnus James Garfield in 1882 and installed in the former chapel, now Goodrich Hall, soon after.

In 1915 the window was moved to Thompson and crammed into a space slightly too small for it, according to North Adams artist Bill Cummings, which explains its deterioration. Cummings Studio recently

Substitute speaker leads King tribute discussion

To celebrate Martin Luther King's birthday, students and faculty gathered in Thompson Memorial Chapel January 17 to hear a tribute and discussion led by history professor Dennis Dickerson. He replaced the scheduled speaker, Charles Evers of the Medgar Evers Foundation, who cancelled his talk because of illness.

Dickerson emphasized that the Nobel Peace Prize-winning civil rights activist shot down in 1968 was neither a "saint nor a libertine." Rather, he was "a man of moral vision, a Christian vision which obligated blacks to love whites and whites to love blacks." A man of mass action, King drew upon the welispring of the black community and church.

The discussion focused on educated blacks and their relationship to civil rights advocacy, the proposed Martin Luther King national holiday and Judeo-Christian involvement in civil rights.

Dickerson noted that in King's time, educated blacks were for the most part directly affiliated with civil rights advocacy. Talented blacks have since expanded into many sectors of the economy, but they have not yet been mobilized to advocate civil rights in an organized fashion, he said.

The question of a national holiday honoring King is now several years old. Dickerson stressed that it would be "an acknowledgment of his accomplishments and would represent the commitment of the country to racial justice." He termed "specious" the argument that the country cannot afford to give federal employees one more Monday off from work for this holiday.

"Judeo-Christian involvement in civil rights and the peace movement is an aberration of the 20th century," added Dickerson. He regretfully noted that "11 AM Sunday remains the most segregated time of the week" and claimed that the church is "more an obstacle to progressive change than facilitator of change."

Dickerson suggested that private beliefs about morality are not transferred to the collective whole in America. "We regard morality as a private thing," he explained. "But when it comes to a collective [problem] such as poverty, we have a difficult time conceptualizing it as a moral problem."

Trustees

The CUL had already ruled out other options for creating more space for the enlarged freshman class, including housing members in Thompson Infirmary or on a separate floor of West College.

Roosenraad, CUL members and Trustees also discussed issues raised by recent controversies over the Log. The CUL concluded that, although "some changes had to be made," the Log is an essential part of the school's social welfare.

No Log pitchers

The CUL announced its support of a proposal that the Log sell beer only by glasses instead of pitchers and that it alternate wet and dry nights, so that underage students could still periodically use the Log as a social gathering place. Final decisions on these proposals will be made at the Log committee meeting on Thursday.

The CUL also explained the details of the new transfer policy, which the Trustees did not question.

Under the new program, effective this spring, freshman inclusion applications will have priority over upperclass transfer bids. This represents a direct reversal of the priorities of past years.

The new policy will give more freshmen their first choice in the inclusion process and, Roosenraad feels, will bring more "continuity" to the Housing system by discouraging halfhearted transfers who are simply seeking a change.

"Our goal is not to discourage transfers, but rather to create a system of stable, well-run houses in which students will not feel the desire to transfer, and yet keep enough flexibility so that students with more serious reasons to transfer can do so," Roosenraad said.

Both Roosenraad and Dean Mary Kenyatta conceded that complaints about noise problems in Prospect House have been substantiated. "We have referred the problem to several architects, but it seems that there is no cost-efficient solution," bemoaned O'Connor.

In an interview this Sunday Chandler defended the Trustees' concern over the College's endowment, terming it "their overriding responsibility to serve the educational goals of the College."

"The question is whether it is better to stay and fight apartheid or to walk away, feeling proud, which is just a form of moral masturbation, an act which doesn't require any sacrifice," Chandler said. "And perhaps the cost of divestiture is an unacceptable sacrifice."

Chandler outlined responses to some of WAAC's demands. The Trustees have been aware of the 15 delinquent companies for only two weeks, he said. The Arthur D. Little report citing these companies has just come out and the administration is responding to this news by sending letters of inquiry to these corporations. The ACSR is responsible for investigating these companies, according to Chandler.

Chandler stated that he had no objections to the restructuring of the ACSR along WAAC's guidelines. He explained that this change would have to be taken up by the College Council and the faculty.

Chandler cited several reasons for not divesting. He explained that since over half of the shares traded on the New York Stock Exchange have some connection with South Africa, a policy of divestment would seriously curtail any investment policy. The resulting decrease in endowment income could have negative economic effects on Williams as an educational institution, according to Chandler.

And a policy of divestment were pursued, grants and alumni matching gifts from divested companies would probably cease, he added.

Kenyatta speaks

Muhammad Kenyatta, a noted advocate of divestment, student leader at Harvard Law School and teacher of a Winter Study course here, discussed the hunger strike before a group of about 120 students and faculty in Hopkins 12 Sunday.

Kenyatta said that in light of the fact that such people as Chandler and O'Connor "did in quiet ways what they could" to end American institutionalized racism some years ago, he is shocked that they do not seem to view the South African issue in the same way.

Addressing the contention that black South Africans benefit from the presence of "good" American companies in South Africa, Kenyatta said that the best black South African leaders disavow that contention, and that anyone who believes that is practicing "willful ignorance."

As part of its effort to inform the college community about its continuing strike, WAAC held an evening of music called "Waterhouse" on Sunday night in Hopkins, which was broadcast over WCFM.

South African query

WAAC has sent out a press release to area media, but so far press response to the hunger strike has been limited. Reporters came to campus from the Berkshire Eagle; the North Adams Transcript; WWLP, channel 22, in Springfield; and WFSB, channel 3, in Hartford.

Williams Director of Public Information Ray Boyer reported that he received an inquiry from the Springfield bureau of the Associated Press, on behalf of the South African AP bureau, as to the racial composition of the protesters. Boyer said he declined to answer the question on the grounds that it was "distasteful."

Chandler expressed concern over what he termed a trend over the last three years to depict Williams to the press as an "all-purpose scapegoat" for political issues such as racism and sexism.

Pucksters fall to Union

The hockey team lost to Union Friday night, 9-0. Earlier, they lost to Salem State 5-2 last Tuesday.

Playing without injured stars Charley Thompson '83, Bob Brownell '83, and Ed Finn '83, the team lost its third game in a row on Saturday.

There were 12 penalties on Williams, and seven of Union's goals came on power plays.

On Tuesday, Mark Wysocki '83 and Brian Rutledge '85 scored the Williams goals.

The team plays at the University of Connecticut tonight.

'83 had 12 points and 15 rebounds.

Union had control through much of the game, leading 32-23 at the half. Williams got within six late in the game, but had to foul in the late minutes to try to get back, thus allowing Union to edge up the score.

The team plays at home against North Adams State Wednesday at 7:30.

Wrestlers finish 2-1

The wrestling team went 2-1 in a quad meet on Saturday, beating Norwich 39-11, beating Keene State 24-19, but losing to Massachusetts Institute of Technology 28-18 in the final meet.

Sophomore Jeff May won all of his three matches, as did his fellow tri-captain, senior John Donovan.

The third tri-captain, junior Chris Woodworth, was 2-1, as was Dave Bicknell '84 and Gary Stosz '83.

The team faces a grudge match against M.I.T. next Saturday at Cambridge.

Icewomen gain revenge

The women's hockey team (2-3) beat R.P.I. 5-3 at home Saturday, avenging their season-opening loss.

Junior Pam Briggs scored a hat trick, while line-mates Bea Fuller '83 and Meredith Bibber '85 each scored once.

Defensesmen Sue Fritts '83 and Alice Comiskey '84 turned in outstanding performances, while goalie Wendy Young had 18 saves.

"We smelled the win in the second period," said Coach Bernie Neuner, "and that motivated us. The key to the game was that we played outstanding position hockey."

Women Hoopsters drop two games

The women's basketball team (2-5) lost twice last week, 60-52 to Union on Saturday and 75-37 to Hamilton on Tuesday.

Sophomore Kay Lackey led the Ephwomen Saturday with 17 points. Tracy Burrows '84 added 15 points while grabbing 14 rebounds, and T. K. Meehan

Basie

The hero of the second set was alto saxophonist Chris Woods. The band played a slow blues that served as a vehicle for Woods' solo, a series of walling blues notes interspersed with rhythmic chromatic runs and arpeggios that brought the audience to its feet in thunderous applause for the fifth time that evening.

Singer Dennis Roland was featured in three successive songs, and although his voice betrayed signs of weariness, especially in the upper register, the rich, pulsating quality of his lower notes and his enormously appealing stage presence made him one of the favorites of the evening.

As Count Basie left the stage, the audience remained standing in prolonged and heartfelt applause, and the Count paused a moment to quietly thank them for what he said was one of the warmest receptions he had ever received. And indeed, something amazing happened in Chapin Hall Saturday night.

Squash wins two

The men's squash team had a very successful week, winning matches both Friday and Saturday.

Friday, they beat Rochester 7-2. Saturday, the Ephmen nailed MIT 9-0.

The team plays at home Wednesday against Dartmouth.

Skiers finish fourth

by Chuck Mahoney

The men's downhill team, skiing at Lake Placid, placed fourth on both Friday and Saturday in the St. Lawrence Winter Carnival.

Captain Crawford Lyons '84 placed second in Friday's slalom competition and sixth on Saturday in the giant slalom to lead the Ephmen.

Other point-scorers on Friday were Chris Eagan '84 and John Pler '85, placing 14th and 18th respectively. Saturday, Pler raced down to 16th and Tuck Collins '83 followed immediately in 17th, closing the gap on third-place Dartmouth.

Coach Ed Grees said, "We finished better than I expected."

X-C disappointing

The cross-country team, however, did not fare so well, finishing in ninth place out of ten schools.

The Nordic highlight occurred Saturday when freshman Fred Eaton catapulted the Williams relay team out of tenth into ninth place overall due to his gargantuan efforts in passing Keene State during the anchor leg.

On Friday, Spencer Jones '85 finished 34th, while Nordic Captain Steve Johansen '84 captured 37th and Freshman Morten Moehs escaped in 42nd.

There were no leaps for joy or exclamations born out of rapturous ecstasy over the finish. Head Coach Bud Fisher remarked, "I think we're disappointed by our results, but we've got a super-young team and are going to do better."

The Nordic race, held at Middlebury because of a lack of snow at St. Lawrence, was captured by Vermont, which also won overall.

Next week's carnival is at UNH, where both teams look forward to continued improvement.

Swimmers still cruising

by Andrew Garfield

The men's and women's swim teams both increased their records to 5-0 with victories this weekend.

The men trounced UMass 98-21, taking first place in every event. Jim Stockton '83 and Rob Sommer '84 were dual winners: Stockton in the required and the optional diving contests and Sommer in the 200 freestyle (1:47.9) and the 200 backstroke (2:02.6).

Record breakers

Rob Bowman '83, amidst encouraging cries from the crowd, streaked to an amazing victory time of 9:59.2 in the 1000 free. Freshman phenomenon Bill Couch broke the pool record and the college record, and qualified for the nationals by seven seconds in the 400 Individual Medley (4:18.4).

Other Williams winners included Mark Weeks '83 in the 50 free (22.19), Ben Aronson '83 in the 200 IM (2:03.7), Peter Orphanos '85 in the 200 fly (2:01.2), Jeff Mills '84 in the 100 free (48.79), Will Andrew '86 in the 500 free (4:57.9) and Dave Johnson '83 in the 200 breaststroke.

Women glide past Smith

Led by Co-Captain Liz Jex '83, the women defeated Smith 84-65. Jex won the 500 free (5:27.3), the 50 free (25.21), and the 100 IM (1:01.9). Her times in the 50 free and the 100 IM were good enough to qualify her for the nationals in those events.

Kim Eckrich and Kathy Kirmayer also qualified for the national competition: Eckrich '85 in the 100 breast (1:09.9), the 200 IM (2:15.3) and the 200 breast (2:30.8); Kirmayer '86 in the 50 back (28.98). The time of 1:53.75 qualified the Medley Relay team for the nationals.

Other winners were Co-Captain Katie Hudner '83 in the 100 free (55.43) and the 200 free (2:01.6), Kirmayer in the 100 back (1:03.4) and Cecilia Cieplela '84 in the 1000 free (11:26.1).

Both teams have home matches this Saturday versus Bowdoin—the women at 11:30 and the men at 2:00.

Freshman sensation Bill Couch broke the College and pool records and qualified for the Nationals by seven seconds in the 400 Individual Medley Saturday against UMass. (Schell)

Against Albany

Runners sprint to first

Trailing Albany State following the field events, the track team surged ahead in the running events to win a quad meet held at Williams Friday night. Williams finished with 71 points to Albany's 50. Springfield came in third with 32 and Westfield State placed fourth with 15.

After taking first in only one of the six field events, Williams trailed Albany State 23-18 going into the running. Sophomore Paul Toland took the Eph's only first in the field in the high jump with a 6'5" jump.

Pull away

Williams then chalked up firsts in eight of the ten running events to pull away to a sure victory. Juniors Bo Parker and Brian Angle teamed up for first and second in the mile, then Ted Leon '84 won the quarter mile.

Kevin Jenkins '85 won the 600 yard followed by senior speedster Tomas Alejandro coming off a slow start to win the 60 yard sprint.

Parker won his second race of the night for Williams in the 880 and teammates junior Bennet Yort and Ian Brzezinski '86 wrapped up the distance events with victories in the 1000 yard and two mile.

Albany won the one mile relay but was mathematically eliminated from catching Williams with only one event remaining. Williams went on to win the two mile relay to end the evening with 71 points.

The Ephmen will have next weekend off and compete the following Saturday at home.

Junior Bo Parker leads the pack, with Brian Angle '84 in third place, in the track team's victory on Saturday. (Scheibe)

Tong leaving for California

by John Clayton

Basketball coach Curt Tong will leave Williams next year to become the athletic director at Pomona-Pitzer College in California.

"I was really torn," said Tong. "I love Williams, I love the area, and my family loves it too, but I feel that at this point in my career it is time to move on."

Tong, who also coaches women's tennis at Williams, will not be coaching at Pomona, at least until after he settles down in the job of Athletic Director, where he will be responsible for the entire range of athletic programming.

Similar school

"Pomona is a lot like Williams," said Tong, "and I think that's one of its attractions for me. Although there are large temperature differences, Claremont (outside Los Angeles) is similar to Williamstown, and the size of the schools is the same.

Pomona and Pitzer are separate schools which join together only for athletics, because Pitzer has no athletic department.

Basketball and women's tennis coach Curt Tong will leave for Pomona-Pitzer next year.

"It's tough to leave your home," said Tong, "but maybe I'm young enough to be able to move back here before I'm through."

Tong's history

Tong has been at Williams since 1973, when he came from his alma mater, Otterbein College. His record in 15 years of basketball coaching is 229-142. As women's tennis coach, Tong is 58-11, with his 1976 team winning the New England Championship.

Tong has had some experience as Athletic Director—two years ago when Williams AD Bob Peck went on sabbatical, Tong took over the position.

Greatest job

An extensive search will now begin to find a replacement for Tong as basketball coach. "I'm sure there will be plenty of applicants," said Tong, "because this is the greatest coaching job in the world."

Basketball splits

The basketball team broke a three-game losing streak with an 80-72 win over Connecticut College Saturday night. Earlier in the week, they fell to Trinity 85-76.

Coach Curt Tong cited the contributions of center John McCarthy '84 and guard Tim Walsh '86 off the bench as keys to Saturday's victory.

"John had some rebounds, some clutch foul shots, and even scored a few baskets for us," said Tong, "and Tim sparked us with his steals and assists."

Art Pidorlano once again led the Ephmen with 20 points, while co-captain Scott Olesen added 11 and junior forward Dave Krupski chipped in 10. The Camels were led by 6-8 center Peter Dorfman with 23 points.

Stick with plan

"I was pleased with the game," said Tong, "because we were able to stick to our game plan. We didn't fall behind early—too often we've done that and had to throw away the game plan."

"We were also able to bottle up their big man, Dorfman," Tong continued. "He's one of the best centers in Division III New England. He's also a fine rejector, so we tried to pull up in his face for the jump shot instead of taking it straight to the basket. Artie (Pidorlano) was especially good at that."

Close game

"It was a close game all the way," said Tong. "Our biggest lead was 14, with three minutes left, but even that got cut to five in the last minute."

Connecticut (6-2) had lost only to Trinity before this game.

Fall to Trinity

Tuesday at Trinity, the Ephmen fell way back early in the game, and were never able to make up the difference.

Pidorlano was once again the Ephs' scoring leader, with 21 points. Krupski had 13, Olesen had 11, and sophomore guard Pete Griffith responded to increased playing time with 12 points.

Big lead

Trinity jumped ahead in the first half, gaining a 46-28 half-time lead. Williams' strong second half, coupled with Trinity's stars getting in foul trouble, enabled the Ephs to cut the lead to nine.

Middlebury comes to Lasell Gym tonight at 8:00. "The Panthers are very strong," said Tong. "They're well-balanced and rangy. It should be a good game."

Skiers glide to fourth

by Kate Knopp

The Women's Ski Team, now under NCAA standings in Division I, began their carnival season this week with an overall fourth-place finish at St. Lawrence. The alpine team raced at Whiteface Mt. on the Olympic hill while the nordic team travelled to Middlebury for better snow.

The alpiners placed second only to UVM in the slalom. Scorers included Heidi Knight '86 in fourth place, Kate Knopp '85 in seventh despite losing a pole in the start of the second run, and Marcy Rubinger '85 in 22nd after a fall.

The giant slalom generated tremendous excitement when Knight won by a large margin. Unfortunately she left her teammates, as well as everyone else, way behind and the team placed fifth in that event.

Nordic exceptional

The Nordic team skied exceptionally well in the individual race on Friday. Captain Ellen Chandler '83 placed fourth followed by Sarah Bates '85 in 16th and Karla Miller '85 in 20th.

The relay, held on Saturday, sent Bates on the first leg, Miller on the second and Chandler finishing up by passing St. Lawrence and putting the team in fourth place. UVM won overall, followed by Middlebury and Dartmouth. The team travels to UNH next week if snow conditions permit.

HUNGER

DAY 6

Day 6—Thursday—marked the end of the hunger strike

(Scheibe)

Tourists bring hope to North Adams

Reprinted courtesy of the Associated Press

Ignored by the Industrial Revolution until a tunnel was hacked through the mountains to make it a booming railroad town, North Adams now hopes a $7.9 million project will make it bustle again—with tourists.

Taking a cue from Boston's successful revival of an old open-air market in the late 1970s, city officials and a private developer are sinking public and private money into creating a "Quincy Market of the Berkshires" in an abandoned railroad yard.

The project, aimed at fighting an unemployment rate between 10 and 15 percent (about double the state average), is scheduled to be completed in 1984.

"It's a risk," said Joseph Kellogg, the North Adams community development director. "There's no guarantee that the people will want to see all this, but we have to start someplace."

Kellogg pointed out that the Hoosac Tunnel, which brought the city's early prosperity, was a risk, too, in its time.

The four-and-a-half-mile railroad tube was the final victory of 19th-century industrialists over the mountains that blocked their way to the Erie Canal and markets to the west.

Considered one of the nation's civil engineering landmarks, the tunnel was supposed to take five years to build when drilling began in 1851. Before it was finished 22 years later, it had taken 195 lives, bankrupted three companies and cost three times the original estimate of $5 million.

Within two generations, the textile mills it had spawned moved away and cars and trucks began to replace trains.

"The big textiles moved south . . . and there's a lot of tourists who go through here to Tanglewood and elsewhere but don't stop. This will designate us as a place to stop and visit, eat and spend money and come back again," Kellogg said. He estimates that the park could attract up to 300,000 tourists a year.

The tourist project, which will become one of seven "heritage parks" in the state, entails turning seven dilapidated freight buildings into museums. The buildings are on the National Register of Historic Places.

Boutiques, bars and restaurants will fill the rest of the buildings in the old railyards, Kellogg said. Lanterns and railroad and textile memorabilia will dot the park.

"Our claim to fame was that tunnel. The park will depict the heritage of North Adams as a textile and railroad town," he said.

Aside from the park project, the city has spent about $1 million a year for the past ten years developing an industrial park on its outskirts; restoring the city's first commercial district; building a downtown shopping plaza; repairing sidewalks and putting up "period" street lights and rehabilitating housing.

The money has come from federal and state government grants or loans to private developers.

Construction on the heritage park is scheduled to begin this spring and will provide at least 160 jobs directly, according to Kellogg.

The city, which lost 3,000 jobs from 1965 to 1980 and shrank in population from 22,000 residents during World War II to 15,000 in 1980, also is looking to attract other employers, according to Mayor Richard Lamb (Williams '71).

Policies clarified

Hunger strike ends

by Dan Keating

Citing an apparent lack of Trustee willingness to act before the health of the hunger strikers would be endangered, the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) announced in a press conference Thursday that the hunger strike, begun six days earlier, would be terminated.

Three new hunger strikers had joined the original three on Wednesday, the day before the strike ended.

The announcement came following the release of a statement clarifying the College's policies by Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor earlier Thursday morning.

Claiming that everyone in the college community was worried about the strikers except the Trustees, WAAC spokesman Craig Venable '84 said, "the Trustees don't seem to give a damn." In a later statement, hunger striker Mark White '84 asserted that "we are not dealing with rational human beings."

In a separate press conference later that afternoon, Williams College President John Chandler said that it is crucial "to the integrity of the institution that it did not capitulate to these tactics."

Health of the strikers

When questioned about the alleged lack of concern for the welfare of the hunger strikers on the part of the administration and Trustees, Chandler said that the College had been deeply concerned about the health of the strikers, but that they were "also concerned about the health of the institution. It would be a loss if the college acceded to tactics of this kind," said Chandler.

Dean O'Connor's Thursday morning release clarified the College's position on the demands made by WAAC and the hunger strikers. Although Chandler commented that "the fundamental policy is exactly the same as it was before," WAAC spokesmen said the hunger strike had "already achieved significant results in terms of . . . the College's policy statement of this morning."

Concerning the 15 companies from which the hunger strikers demanded immediate divestiture, the College has agreed to try to accelerate the review process. The six month deadline, initially set in 1978, is still in effect for a College Council supports strike

by Jack Mayher

The College Council voted last Wednesday to support the hunger strike by members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC). The vote was nine to five with four abstentions.

The Council also voted (16-0-2) to reaffirm their support of the WAAC's four demands, including all-college elections for representatives to the Advisory Council for Shareholder Responsibility. In the past, candidates have nominated themselves to College President John Chandler, who then makes the final selection.

Council members voting against support for the strike explained that although the members of their houses supported WAAC's cause, they considered the hunger strike an inappropriate action.

College Council's town meeting to discuss the housing system and transfer policy will be held Wednesday night at 8:30 PM in Jesup Hall, and at last week's meeting, the Council agreed on three proposals to be presented at that meeting.

"Justice" in housing

The first proposal would set up an "equitable" transfer system with priority given on the basis of class and housing choice received during freshman inclusion.

The second would bring control of the Housing Committee, which has reported to the Committee on Undergraduate Life since this fall, back to the College Council. The final proposal mandates that class balance is of secondary importance to "justice" in the housing system.

WAAC gets funds

The Council also allocated money to various campus groups, including WAAC, which received $465 in additional funding for costs incurred last week. A new group, the Arts Students League, got $545 for its work in supporting student artists and raising awareness about the arts.

The Council gave $400 to support a concert of The Fearless Four, a rap group that will perform February 12. And the volleyball club received $35 to pay for additional officials at their games.

Scholar views Poland

by Peter Muz

"I want to break the stereotype with regard to Polish politics and make an appeal toward better and more innovative US foreign policy," said UC Berkeley scholar and prospective Williams professor Richard Spielman in his talk "Poland After Solidarity" last Monday.

According to Spielman, a stereotypical interpretation of Polish politics limits American national policy to a condemnation of Polish society. "All everyone sees is working class opposition to what is going on, but there was a solid basis for working class support of the regime which later turned into opposition. In fact," he added, "Solidarity leader Lech Walesa himself supported the regime until 1971."

Spielman also claimed that, contrary to the American stereotype, Polish leader General Jaruzelski is not a Soviet puppet but "a genuine reformer." Spielman cited Jaruzelski's refusal to commit the Polish army to a Soviet invasion force as instrumental in preventing U.S.S.R.'s invasion of Poland in 1980.

Stern rule beneficial

Speaking from personal experience, Spielman said that Poland is a society without rules. Office workers seem to make up the rules as they go along. "Whenever you enter an office in Poland," he said, "the first response is an automatic 'no'. You must say 'please' a lot until you get what you want."

In the context of a corrupt society, Spielman sees Jaruzelski's stern rule as beneficial for Poland in the long run. He claimed that the general is no Hitler but would turn Poland into a parliamentary democracy tomorrow were it not for the Soviets. Spielman, however, admitted that Jaruzelski has little popular support, and that his present authority is chiefly derived from the army.

Winter Study

More than a slope

Winter Study is one of Williams' many distinctive assets, and this January was no exception. Countering the criticism by some faculty last spring, students proved that they take it seriously.

This may be due in part to more substantial paper and reading requirements by instructors, which is commendable. But students have also responded to what remains a valuable chance to pursue unusual and creative academic pursuits.

By allowing students to appreciate the interdisciplinary and dynamic aspects of a liberal arts education, Winter Study helps students to approach the regular semester more imaginatively and energetically.

We hope that faculty feel the same way and will offer another selection of intriguing courses when we register this spring for next year's Winter Study.

Op-ed

WAAC wins victory

by Laura Hoptman

When the WAAC hunger strike ended as it rounded into its sixth day, the reaction was one of relief and surprise among both its supporters and detractors.

Relief because six students would finally break their fast, and because maybe now, the dirty and "complex" issue of divestment would go away. Surprise was expressed because it was felt that the student hunger strikers were not committed enough to go all the way, to fast until the Trustees agreed with WAAC's four proposals, and because what became a tremendous movement, one of more than one hundred WAAC members, faculty and Williamstown residents, disappeared one morning as if someone had waved a magic wand and spirited it away.

The administration, in the name of the Trustees, sent out the obligatory flag of victory, with the obligatory paragraph of castigation for the "unWilliams" activity of visible dissent—unruly trustee meetings, hunger strikes, rallies and whatnot. It is not in the spirit of "team playing" to call the press on the alma mater, to sleep in an administration building, to refuse food in the name of morality. It is, however, in the spirit of the college administration and trustees to ignore student opinion, to publicly ridicule dissenters and to call the press in a quieter, more professional manner.

WAAC's tragic mistake, it seems, centers not around the tactics it chose to express its opinion, or the cause it chooses to espouse, but rather in its premise on which all its efforts were based. This premise is that this institution and those who are involved in its care and feeding are moral. That the school and its Trustees are devoted to more than self-perpetuation. How naive! The success of the hunger strike, the Waterhouse, the teach-ins, and the informal discussions has been one of great education for the student body as well as for WAAC.

As a college, we have learned what Apartheid means, what divestment entails, and the extent of the college's involvement in the most racist regime in the modern world, save Nazi Germany. WAAC and its plethora of new members and supporters have learned to be tough. We have shed that Williams team spirit in the pursuit of a less homogeneous education, to judge a policy honestly, and to remain uncowed by those in the community who are older and more powerful than we are.

The issue of divestment on campus, as a result of this week, will not go away like a campus fad. The struggle to make this school a better place to learn in, will not go away, despite charges of "moral masturbation." WAAC is not ashamed of believing in morality, or in the pursuit of a broader education.

As a WAAC member, I would like to announce our own victory. We won. We did. Not in the way of full divestment; that will come in time. Not in the way of full student and faculty appreciation that too, will come. We succeeded in the spirit of this institution. We educated and we learned.

A victory

To the editor:

It has been argued that unless the Hunger Strikers achieve all their goals their gesture will have been in vain, and that their method insures the fact that the Trustees will not bow to their pressure. Therefore, it is argued, the Hunger Strike is a futile gesture doomed from the very outset.

However, whether or not any of the demands are met—the Hunger Strike is a tremendous victory. When people take time to educate themselves on a crucial issue there is a victory! When people commit themselves to serious dialogue on an important issue there is a victory! When people sacrifice their time, effort and physical well-being for a just cause there is a victory!

If all the demands are not met today—they will be met tomorrow. It is the personal conviction of people like our Hunger Strikers that insure ultimate victory.

Litter

To the editor:

A letter from a 1982 Williams graduate, Scott Highleyman, who is working on an agricultural cooperative in Africa arrived at the Center for Environmental Studies on the same day that your "Bottle Bill" articles appeared in the Record. As a coincidence, he comments on this same topic but as it occurs in the countries of Africa. After comparing economic and political differences between Zimbabwe and Botswana he states, "Finally, the most obvious difference between the two countries is the litter. Zimbabwe has all returnable bottles and no aluminum cans. Botswana has no returnable anything and everything is in aluminum cans. So when you take the train over the border into Botswana, you are immediately confronted with a field of cans along both sides of the tracks. The rest of the country is littered much the same. So don't let anyone ever tell you that Bottle Bills aren't effective!"

What have we gained? What can we do?

The aftermath of the hunger strike and the future of a movement

by Andrew Levin

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition ended its hunger strike on Thursday for several reasons.

First, it had become clear at that time that the trustees would allow the hunger strikers to fast to the point of doing permanent damage to their bodies without making further concessions to the overwhelming campus sentiment favoring divestiture. Second, we had accomplished a great deal in the educational and organizational realms, and we felt it was time to move on to other methods of pressing for full and permanent divestiture. Finally, campus and media attention was focusing increasingly on our tactics rather than on the issues involved. In this article we hope to clear up any confusion about why the hunger strike ended when it did and about where WAAC go from here.

To begin with, let us make it clear that the hunger strike was NOT ended as a result of an agreement between WAAC and the administration on a mutually satisfactory compromise on the fulfillment of WAAC's demands. We are pleased that the trustees have agreed to an open meeting in the spring and that President Chandler has accepted a restructuring of the ACSR providing for direct election to the Committee of faculty and student members by their constituents, assuming both groups prefer direct election to Presidential appointment as a means of selecting ACSR members. (The College Council, for its part has already decided in favor of the democratic route. We hope the faculty follows suit when it meets later this month.) Both of these changes are direct results of the hunger strike, being as they are clear departures from previous college policy.

However, with regard to our first two, more substantive demands, the College's position as outlined by Dean O'Connor in his statement last Thursday remains totally unacceptable. Rather than committing itself to divesting itself of any specific holdings or accepting any reputable outside agency (such as the Arthur D. Little Company) as a legitimate source of information with which to judge corporate employment practices in South Africa, the College merely agreed to a six month time limit for ACSR investigations of corporations which have been criticized for non-compliance with the Sullivan Principles.

We fail to see why the College thinks letters sent in reply to ACSR inquiries by the PR people of these corporations will more likely produce an accurate picture of their real employment practices than the carefully researched reports of the Arthur D. Little Company, the Investment Research Resource Center, or other monitoring agencies.

With regard to the second demand to stop making deposits in banks which loan money to South Africa, we are pleased to have so distinguished an advocate as Prof. Vince Barnett to attempt to sway the trustees on this issue. But we have seen no movement since 1981, when the trustees backed out of their commitment (made in the face of an April 1980 hunger strike by two WAAC members) to avoid making short term deposits in these banks.

In response to the contention that it would be an administrative nightmare to keep track of all banks extending loans to South Africa, we have said we would settle for withdrawal by the College from the well-known handful of banks which are the major lenders. Perhaps Mr. Barnett can elicit a serious response to this compromise.

No, it wasn't an agreement with the administration which ended the strike, but, conversely, a realization that we could expect no more serious dialogue with College officials before the health of our friends fell into serious danger. We ended the hunger strike because it had yielded tremendous fruit and because with each passing day it drew more attention to itself as a tactic, obscuring

... the open meeting . . . will be a milestone in student input . . .

the fundamental issues of Williams' investment in South Africa in particular and U.S. corporate involvement in South Africa in general. When media people began calling us up to ask what kinds of vitamins the hunger strikers were taking, we knew it was time to call the strike.

In the meantime, we had succeeded in putting divestiture back at the top of this community's agenda and in giving the national and international anti-apartheid movements a boost. This latter, accomplished largely through national media coverage, was marked by a high level of interest in our story by the South African press and communications of support from the U.N., student, community, and national anti-apartheid and peace groups, and members of the Mass. legislature and the U.S. Congress.

Here at Williams, the gains of the hunger strike were both educational and organizational. An average of 100 students attended daily teach-ins led by members of the faculty all week long; about 200 students (including delegations from Amherst, Hampshire, Harvard, and Wesleyan) heard speakers from all over the Northeast at our informational conference on divestment on Thursday; hundreds of students stopped by our information tables located in the dining halls almost every lunch and dinner to read our fact sheets and to discuss the issues with WAAC representatives; and of course the whole campus followed the debate between the trustees and WAAC, carried on through all-the spontaneously organized faculty support committee and the successful faculty petition drive (which continues) indicate a greater level of faculty commitment to getting the College's money out of South Africa than we have seen before; and WAAC, which last year consisted of two core members, grew during the hunger strike to become a political organization with eight working committees and upwards of 40 committed members, and with extensive contacts with campus political and religious groups and anti-apartheid groups in communities and colleges throughout the region. Many underclassfolk gained hard political experience by taking on major responsibility during the strike, and the full group has already met several times after the end of the strike to begin mapping a strategy to push for full divestiture this spring.

Thus, the end of the hunger strike is really the beginning of the next chapter,

When media people began calling to ask what kinds of vitamins the hunger strikers were taking, we knew it was time to call the strike.

campus mailings, WCFM, and the college newspapers. All of this belies the Record's characterization of the hunger strike as an "emotional plea" which was not conducive to "informed, intellectual debate" which is discourse on the trustees' "level."

Not only was the hunger strike a highly rational and carefully considered political act (which isn't to deny that we have a strong emotional commitment to this issue), it also led to a level of serious discussion about the College's relationship to apartheid which wouldn't have been possible on this campus if we hadn't forced it into the limelight.

Williams students know more about the complex range of factors involved in this issue now than they ever have before, and we plan to continue learning and teaching and listening in the hope that the open meeting with the trustees in April will be a milestone in informed student input in the decision-making process of Williams College.

In terms of organization, the hunger strike has begun one of the major political mobilizations seen at Williams in recent years: about 20 campus and local political and religious groups endorsed WAAC's demands, and most of these also endorsed the hunger strike—this includes College Council and the BSU;

and it will be an intensified one, of the ongoing struggle (now in its seventh year at Williams) to convince our trustees to divest completely, once and for all, of its holdings in companies doing business in South Africa. We do not call for divestiture so Williams can feel good ("moral masturbation").

Divestiture is an effective political action which lets South Africa know that one of America's most prestigious institutions will no longer participate in the outside economic support without which apartheid could not survive, and which lets Washington know that we, as an ethical member of the community, cast the only vote we have against continued U.S. involvement in South Africa.

Our goal now is to convince those still in doubt in the College community that divestiture is the only step we can take against apartheid, and that it is a step which will not undermine the main responsibility of the trustees: insuring the economic well-being of the college. Towards this end, we will be very active this winter and spring doing economic research, forming an Alumni Anti-Apartheid Committee, and stepping up the campus dialogue on this issue. This Winter Study has been an unusually educational one for WAAC. May we put our lessons to good use.

Mistaken

To the editor:

The letter from Anna Peterson, et al., published in the January 11 Record, repeats the main mistaken assumption which Mary Daly embraces in her philosophy, and again points out the major trouble with the radical feminist weltanschauung. The truth is, this is not a male-oriented society in any way; rather, it is inherently destructive to the male psyche. If the feminists are truly supporters of an environment of liberal thought,

I would suggest they add Dr. Herb Goldberg's The Hazards of Being Male on their reading list.

The facts are plain. The male death rate far outnumbers the female, so much so that by the end of the century there will be 145 women for every 100 men over the age of 65. The suicide rate is much higher for men, as is the number of sudden deaths from stress-related ailments such as heart attacks and hypertension.

Why is this so? Because the male is forced to live in a society which puts an unbearable number of conflicting demands on him without allowing him to be in touch with himself. He is expected to be aggressive, competitive, and ruthless at work, but when he comes home, he is expected to be passive, loving, and understanding. He cannot be too playful, because he will be considered irresponsible; but neither can he be too serious, or he will be considered cold and withdrawn. It is hard for him to make truly close friendships because he has been conditioned since a child that relationships with other males are to be competitive. And when he does find friends, he can't spend too much time with them, or his wife will suspect that he is "fooling around."

All human beings are made up of both a masculine and a feminine side. Society facilitates and even encourages women to recognize and express both sides of their character. But men cannot freely express either without being subjected to public shame or private guilt. If a man shows his feminine side, he may be accused of being a homosexual by both females and other males. If he shows his masculine side at the wrong time or place, he is accused of being a "chauvinist pig," and may develop an unhealthy sense of self-hate.

All of this adds up to a society which gets men into serious psychological and psychophysiological trouble. If the feminists truly support the cause of human liberation, as they claim they do, they must stop demanding that men change into something they are not, and must instead help men in our struggle to discover and be at one with the entirety of our true selves.

A final question for the W.F.A.: Do you see men other than in terms of their relationships to women? Think about it.

decision to divest or continue holding stocks in that particular company. Since the inception of this review process in 1978, the College has divested from one company, Newmont Mining Company, in 1980.

Barnett to check loans

Political Science Professor and Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) member Vince Barnett will meet with the Trustee Finance Committee to clarify the College's policy on making short-term deposits in banks with loans to South Africa.

The College agreed to stop all deposits in banks making loans to South Africa in 1980, but has since reversed the policy, claiming that the interwoven system of international banking made this policy an administrative nightmare. Barnett will consult with the Trustees on this matter and report back to the college community this spring.

The College has agreed to the democratization of the ACSR, leaving the details to be worked out by the College Council and the faculty. A move will be brought up in the regular February 9 faculty meeting to have the two faculty members to the ACSR elected by the entire faculty.

The College Council has already voted to have the two student representatives elected by the student body. The representatives are currently selected by Chandler.

Matter not settled

The College has also agreed to an open meeting this spring where Trustees will present their views and hear campus sentiment on the divestiture issue.

WAAC spokesmen maintained that the matter has not been settled. White said that "the issue will not die until apartheid does." Venable said that since WAAC has the support of the community, the mobilization can be resumed and that "we will use tactics to pressure the Trustees in the future."

One reason cited by WAAC for the discontinuation of the hunger strike is that attention was being diverted from the issue of divestiture to the condition of the hunger strikers. Saying that the decision to continue the hunger strike was made on a day-to-day basis, dependent on the administration's response, WAAC spokesman Sam Schuchat '83 said he was "shocked it has gone on so long."

White said that the vote to end the hunger strike was not unanimous, but that it was for the best.

Three more strikers

The hunger strike began Friday, January 21 when the Trustee Finance Committee refused to act immediately on WAAC's demands for partial divestment. Seniors Derede Arthur and Eric Fernald and junior Mark White began their hunger strike in Hopkins Hall that afternoon.

The following Wednesday, three additional hunger strikers, senior Elizabeth Gavrilles, junior Sonya Grant and sophomore Nura Dualah joined the original three. The strike ended the next day.

On Thursday WAAC listed a number of local groups which had endorsed the strike, including the Black Students' Union, College Council, a majority of the fellows at the Center for Developmental Economics and the Williamstown Methodist Church.

WAAC also received a telegram from the United Nations Special Committee to Stop Apartheid which endorsed their demands and actions.

"Appalling ignorance"

Chandler said that the strike pointed out the "appalling ignorance" on campus concerning the College's investment policies. In speculating on the future action of the College, Chandler said that "divestment is not the objective of the Trustees."

"[It [divestiture] is not an effective or responsible policy. It is not the responsibility of the college to have its own foreign policy," said Chandler.

Chandler went on to say that "the divestment game can go on and on. There are the Russians in Afghanistan, cigarettes, alcohol, nuclear weapons, arms producers. The list could be massive."

Have a beer, but only in a glass. (Scheibe)

Pitchers banned

The Log is now selling beer only in glasses instead of pitchers as a result of a recent administration decision, which was formalized at last week's Log Committee meeting. The decision was based on the advice of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program and the students on the Log Committee, a sub-committee of the CUL.

But the administration has ruled out the option of "dry nights" at the Log, during which no alcohol would be served so that underaged students could enter. Dean Cris Roosenraad admitted that student opinion does not favor such a policy, which has been an economic failure when it was tried in the past.

Roosenraad explained that the decision to ban pitchers is based on a belief that serving beer in pitchers leads to "a certain psychology" that promotes excessive drinking.

Log open, law enforced

The Log is now open to all Williams students, according to Roosenraad, who cautioned that the College will uphold the state drinking law. "The Log is no sanctuary from the law, nor is the College," he said.

Roosenraad conceded that most students use the Log responsibly as a social gathering place, but added that recent problems with the Log made it necessary for the College to use the new policy to encourage "responsible use of the Log."

Student response to the policy, which has been in effect for less than two weeks, is good, according to Log manager Rich Olson. He agrees that the new policy will make students drink more responsibly. "It's a little more difficult to come up and get six glasses than a pitcher," he said.

Fewer students

Many colleges face a slight drop in applicants for next fall, reported the Wall Street Journal, although Williams may be bucking that trend.

The number of high-school students taking the College Board's aptitude tests for college entrance is holding steady. But, says a College Board spokesman, "students who fear they won't be able to get financial help won't bother to apply for admission to college."

Phil Smith, director of admissions at Williams, told the Journal that he predicts that while total applications may be up, applicants from families with less than $20,000 in annual income will probably be fewer.

The fears about financial aid may be unjustified in many cases, colleges insist. "We'll be able to help everyone who needs it," said Smith. "The money is there."

Deportation delayed

A dispute over classified evidence has delayed the deportation trial of South African exile Dennis Brutus.

A U.S. Immigration judge in Chicago granted Brutus a continuance January 10 after a dispute arose over whether Brutus and his lawyers could view secret evidence to be used against him.

Prosecutors maintain that the evidence is "classified" and that its distribution, even to Brutus's lawyers, could threaten national security.

Meanwhile, Brutus's lawyers are questioning the constitutionality of using classified evidence at a deportation trial.

The Dennis Brutus Defense Committee, operating from Northwestern University where Brutus teaches in the English Department, has declared the delay "a positive development at this stage of the hearing."

But few industries are interested in developing the city to replace the textiles, Kellogg said, because interstate highways bypassed North Adams in the 1960's when they replaced railroads as transport corridors.

A fight by the city and the rest of Northern Berkshire County for a four-lane highway by-pass around Pittsfield to the Massachusetts Turnpike has been stalled since the 1960's.

Lamb and other city officials also have been lobbying to keep the city's largest employer, Sprague Electric Co., which opened in the 1930's. Sprague, which employed up to 4,000 20 years ago, now employs 1,500.

Jean Bernard Bucky

Will, Failure, and Community Theatre

by Susan Reifer

Jean Bernard Bucky goes by Bernie Bucky. He is the director of Adams Memorial Theatre, and has held that position since coming to Williams in 1974. He received a Bachelor of Science in mathematics from Queens College and his master's degree in Mathematics from N.Y.U. in 1960. For four years he taught and did research in mathematics and was enlisted in the Air Force. In 1966 he received his M.F.A. in Theatre-Directing from Carnegie Institute of Technology. Bucky arrived at Williams in 1974 from a teaching position in the Theatre Department at Berkeley.

He has directed opera with professional opera companies; summer stock in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Williamstown; college theatre at Berkeley and Williams. The list goes on, including even one 54-minute "fantasy-documentary" entitled REPORT. Bernie Bucky is also a teacher, a smoker, a coffee-spiller on occasion, and a man animated and enthusiastic about students, Williams, his work . . .

You went from mathematics to theatre rather abruptly. Why?

I've been dealing with that for twenty years and I still don't have a very good answer. I changed my mind. There are a number of things. I changed my mind because, well, one thing was I wasn't a wonderful mathematician. The other thing is more complicated and I think has something to do with the solitary nature of doing mathematical research. I was doing pure mathematics. The frustration at the infrequent productivity—if you have two good hours a week you are cooking, that is a lot. So I think, looking back, that that was a negative; in the theatre obviously it's a much more gregarious and communal enterprise. So I suppose that is why, aside from my interest in the theatre in general.

You were at Berkeley for a time. Do you find differences between the kinds of people at Williams and at Berkeley? Or differences in other things?

I don't know if the kinds of people are so different. When you imbed a theatre department much bigger than this—but even by Berkeley's standards very small—in a big university, it becomes much less visible. Added to that I was at Berkeley in the second half of the 60's and the early 70's when there was so much extravagant theatre going on in the streets that it was hard to compete in the theatre—it was even hard to know why one did anything in the theatre since the theatre outside was so much more compelling.

Here one is much more independent. And the relationship to the community is obviously much more intimate and close. And added to that personally the possibility for working with colleagues in other disciplines is much easier here than at a big university where everybody guards their turf very closely and has their prerogatives of jealousy.

Do you find that interaction among disciplines is important?

It is very important to me personally, and we make a big effort to try to imbed the theatre into the concerns of the community and the curriculum of the college. And there is so much more we can do. Let me give you an example of that to keep this away from all theory: At Berkeley there is an enormous English department, probably a 90 person faculty or something on that order. The relationships between the theatre department and the English department are not at all close. At a school like Berkeley that situation is much more typical than the one here. The relationship is hostile, mutually threatening and sometimes really downright aggressive. When my colleagues and I did a production of Shakespeare, for example, the English department would come en masse and sit in the second, third, fourth and fifth rows, and it was a typical experience that they would stay for twenty minutes, rise as a man and depart. The Theatre department's relationship with the English department here is different—one of mutual nourishment, mutual respect, and I would claim enriches both enterprises—particularly theatre.

Do you find that there is interdisciplinary interaction among the students here?

I think that they can be persuaded. Many of them are double majors. Many of our majors are double majors. If we couldn't do that our productions wouldn't exist. We have between seven and ten majors each year, and a big show uses 75 to 100 people. So obviously there are all sorts of people who, for better or worse, are identified as theatre people. Many of those people who are recognized as such do other things. They may be pre-med students. That does enrich the theatre. At a big university where all of the productions are done in a kind of closed circle, the theatre becomes very incestuous.

In a community art has a certain influence. Do you feel that—by your choice of what you present each year—that there is an influence, a planned influence?

That is a source of a great deal of anguish. The way one chooses plays—first it's the choice of the play then the choice of the way in which you produce it.

There are a number of responsibilities; least of the responsibilities I personally feel is the responsibility for creating a kind of cultural embellishment to the community. I mean that's nice if it happens, but I don't really care about that. What I care about is trying to imbed the kinds of things we can do into the general concerns of the college community. So that for example, over four years, over one student generation, it would be nice if we do as many different kinds of plays from as many different kinds of periods as possible. A student shouldn't get out of here without seeing one or two plays of Shakespeare that we do. That's A. B. I think though this hasn't been a deliberate policy, it works out that we try to do finalized plays in as provocative a way as possible as far as provoking discussions, even if people respond in the whole spectrum from negative to positive about the shows.

The other thing that we try to do . . . is to try to have the productions act as a kind of artifact that people can use in their other courses. That is to say, I will probably direct a Beckett play in the fall; Larry Graver will be teaching in the English department, cross-listed in the Theatre department, a special course on Samuel Beckett. So that this thing that will happen on stage can be used as an artifact. We've done that a lot. And that works fairly well.

What about Williams students as actors? How does that work?

I happen to believe that it is absolutely essential—this is not a universal belief though it may seem so—that it is absolutely essential in order to be an actor, to be reasonably literate. There are many schools of thought. There is the kind of school-marmish department in which one does Julius Caesar, puts sheets on and says all those words as best they can; you do Julius Caesar for the same reason every high school does it—because there are no dirty words. And everybody goes to the show and feels unbelievably guilty at being bored to tears because they know it's a great classic but it's just tedious and dull.

That's the most typical kind. The other kind is one in which professionalism—so called, in quotation marks—is asserted as the highest goal. Which means that you really don't have to know anything about history or literature or you may not even be able to read very well but you work on things like technical aspects of the production. What we try to do is create the balance, somewhere, and at that Williams students are particularly apt.

If the actors here suffer from one thing it's their wild articulateness. Though that's a nice vice if it's directed. Actors always have many kinds of defenses . . . For Williams students usually it is their ability to articulate in the most elegant and extended ways. So very often in rehearsal, talk, talking a lot, good talk, intelligent talk is substituted for the doing, and that's usually what has to be cut through.

But I must confess that's much nicer than trying to explain to a group what is it that is going on, to individuals who have no historical or aesthetic or literary intuition—and that Williams students have.

The other thing—generalizations are awful of course—but it seems to me that Williams students, for reasons that are not even entirely clear, have a sense of will that is very strong, and what happens is almost magical. It happens usually on opening night. Students transcend themselves. Like nothing you've ever seen in rehearsal; the things that caused you despair, problems that will never be solved, suddenly, through just sheer tenacious will you see them solving those problems. I see the students really transcending themselves. And that is really magical and wonderful. Usually what you see in dress rehearsal is what you've got. But often enough that is not true. It makes opening night really exciting.

You said in an interview in 1974 that you "see college theatre as a sanctuary for the entire community where an interchange of resources can take place."

It is a little on the pompous side, but I still stand by that. The feeling of this place, even the building, but also the kind of spirit of the theatre as being a sanctuary is true for the following reasons:

One of the things that Williams students are allowed to do here and very few other places is fail. Williams students, our students, the theatre students are encouraged to try to reach as far as they can in terms of extravagance of expression . . . which means they often fail. But that we encourage, I suppose, in all of our courses and in productions, that risk, that is the risk of failure. That is something that is rather a dirty word—in most other places at Williams.

In that sense I hope this is a sanctuary. . . . Finally I think the means of expression that one is accustomed to in the theatre provide a kind of alternative for students who are by and large operating in a structure of rigid obligations, dutiful obligations, you know, papers that are due and exams and that kind of structure.

Here success of the product is not so much emphasized as the value of the process. I personally, for example, don't at all care, in the shows that I direct, or rather care less than I ought to, about The Product. Once we have a dress rehearsal and have gone through that whole process, I'm fine. I would just as soon quit. But the students would be up in arms . . . My focus is really on the process and not in doing a show . . .

There are good reasons for going public, mostly because the actors want to do it, and certainly deserve to. They have paid their dues. But there is a difference between mounting a show in which the eye is on the product—as smooth as possible—there are ways of directing a show to do that—or trying to emphasize that the focus should be upon the process. That doesn't mitigate the need for performance. But it deemphasizes the product in favor of the way one works through it. For example . . . in the rehearsal process I might go through a series of kind of clumsy steps in which you don't really know what you are going to get in favor of directing in such a way that you maximize the audience's response. And that we do very often. There is a nice justice in the world and that is that the product is usually also improved by that mode of going through it.

The sense of the department's enterprises is truly that these things are collaborative, that the contribution of the actor is far more important than the contribution of the director. I really believe that. So that when one says—I despite it though it goes on—that "Well this is Bernie Bucky's play," I hate that with a passion. Because A, it intrudes, and B, because the contribution of the actor is negated. The point is that this is the product of lots of sensibilities, and intelligences and responses. It is not the Director's Play.

Stray Cats Revive Rock-a-billy

by Ben Thompson

On the strength of the radio and video hits "Rock This Town" and "Stray Cat Strut," Built For Speed, the first American release by the Stray Cats, is currently Number 4 on the Rolling Stone charts. The success of this album, a combination of cuts from the group's first two British albums, Stray Cats and Gonna Ball, is no surprise to fans who have followed the group from its beginning. The Stray Cats are a one-band rock-a-billy revival.

Built For Speed is almost a greatest-hits compilation from two earlier British-made LP's. This format seems to be the key to the album's success. Cut after cut has become popular, with a new song garnering airplay when an older one begins to fade.

Fleshed-out sound

The group's sound can be roughly classified as rock-a-billy. Bass and drums predominate, with occasional guitar licks cutting in. Originally, the band started with just a stand-up bass, a snare drum, and an electric guitar as their instruments. But subsequently they have fleshed out their sound. "Runaway Boys," "Rock This Town" and "Stray Cat Strut" are probably the best cuts on this album. With their steady beats, all three are catchy and very danceable. "Jeanie, Jeanie, Jeanie" and "Built For Speed" are equally solid.

It should be noted that four of these five strongest cuts, all from the first British album, were produced by famous British guitarist-producer Dave Edmunds. Edmunds' seems well able to convey the stripped-down rollicking sound of the Stray Cats.

Remade '50s tunes

The group's attempts at self-production or collaboration with Hein Hoyer on the second British album tend to sound more like remade versions of '50s tunes than distinctive 1980's originals.

The only fault of Built For Speed lies in the weakness of some of the tracks taken from that second album, Gonna Ball. Otherwise, the new album is a convincing debut by a fine group, energetic and freshly underproduced throughout.

Young violist displays technique

by Becky MacDougall

Listening to the recital given by violist Paul Neubauer last Tuesday evening in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, I experienced an uneasy feeling of déjà vu. I was remembering a concert I attended a few years ago where a young violinist named Eugene Fodor dazzled an audience with his astonishing technique, said to be the greatest since that of the nineteenth century violinist Paganini.

But despite Fodor's incredible technique, the public tired of him very fast: there was no depth in his playing.

Sensitive technique

I think that Paul Neubauer is developing a technique on the viola that in its quiet way is perhaps as outstanding as violinist Fodor's. But unlike Fodor, he combines that technical facility with a sensitivity towards music that leads me to believe that his success should be much longer-lived. By the end of his challenging program Tuesday night, Neubauer, ably accompanied by Margo Garrett, had fully captivated his audience.

Unfortunately, the program got off to a slow start, and the first half was almost disappointing. Neubauer opened with a pleasant short Baroque piece, Martin Marais's "Variations on 'La Folia,'" following this with a showy "Concert-pièce" by Enesco. Although these two pieces are very different in mood, both demonstrated Neubauer's unforced technique, full, smooth bowing, and rich sound. But Neubauer himself seemed stiff. Although his playing was relaxed, one had the feeling that he was holding himself back.

True disappointment

Therefore the Brahms Sonata in F minor that closed the first half of the program was a true disappointment. All Brahms is a test of the performer's ability to express himself, and Neubauer seemed unwilling to let himself go. Although his sound was still beautiful and his technique still close to perfect, his playing was uninspired, making for a rather dull performance.

But after intermission, Neubauer came back on stage almost a different person. As he began Hubay's flashy "Hejre katl from the Csarda," it became evident that he was much more relaxed and communicative with his audience. The same was true of his performance of Fritz Kreisler's arrangement of "Chanson Sans Paroles" by Tchaikovsky. Unlike the first half of the program, Neubauer played these two pieces from memory, and this may have had something to do with his more enthusiastic approach.

Totally Involved

But Neubauer again used his music for the beautiful Mendelssohn sonata that closed the program. This was by far his finest performance of the evening. He seemed by now enough at ease to allow himself to become totally involved in the music. His playing was emotional—where was this during the Brahms?—without sacrificing anything in the way of precision.

At the conclusion of the Mendelssohn, he was given an enthusiastic reception that prompted two encores. The audience left well-satisfied that it had heard a performance by a highly promising young violist.

Women's hoop

The women's basketball team (2-7) lost to American International College 78-59 on Friday.

Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin, however, was pleased with the team's second-half effort. "We really jelled together in the second half," Hudson-Hamblin said. "We finally matured, and were working well together out on the floor."

Tracy Burrows led the team with 21 points, 18 of them in the second half. Thalia Meehan added 17, while Cathy Evans had 13 points.

Different club

"We were very cold in the first half, shooting 25 percent," said Hudson-Hamblin. "At half-time it was 35-20. But we were a different club in the second half. I'm really encouraged for future games—we should get on the winning track."

The Ephraim women also lost to North Adams State 54-47 on Wednesday. Kay Lackey '85 led the club with 13 points.

Williams travels to Vassar on Wednesday and then Wesleyan Saturday.

Women's squash

Despite three losses, women's squash Coach Renzie Lamb was pleased with his team's performances last week.

Poland—

Spielman also said that the American press exaggerates the repression in Poland. "What to me is most remarkable about Polish society," he said, "is the lack of repression and the low level of violence."

He added that the Poles are dissatisfied with Soviet-backed party rule, however, and see Solidarity more as a revolutionary democratic force against that rule than as a trade union.

they had a two-man advantage for a full minute. They were unable to capitalize, and the Polar Bears stepped up the pressure. Finally, Chris Simon got the equalizer, assisted by Theberge, with just 1:12 left in the contest. Deadlocked at 3-3, the game went into overtime, and Theberge completed his hat trick with a goal at 3:34 of the extra period.

Another bitter defeat

The loss came on the heels of another bitter defeat, as the Ephs fell to Colby, 2-1, on Friday night. The first Colby goal, at 2:39 of the first period, came off the skate of a Williams defenseman, who skated through the crease just as Greg Apostol tried to center the puck from behind the net.

Mark Wysocki '83 evened through organizations like Solidarity, Spielman added. This strong nationalism is a direct effect of World War II which, according to Spielman, homogenized Poland by killing large numbers of Jews and city dwellers while leaving the bulk of the Catholic peasant population intact.

After the war, a large influx of peasants into the cities took place. The peasants regarded this move as a huge status jump and it resulted in widespread popular support for the Soviet-backed regime which took credit for it, Spielman said.

In recent years, however, this things up with a power-play goal at 2:18 of the second period, assisted by co-captain Sam Flood '83 and Rutledge. With Dan Finn '84 holding the Mules at bay, the score remained unchanged until 14:02 of the third period, when Dan Batten scored from the right wing on a 3-on-1 breakaway.

UConn as well

The third loss was to the University of Connecticut on Tuesday by a 4-3 score. Brian Rutledge again provided the only bright spot of the evening for Williams, as he turned a hat trick.

The losses ran Williams' skid to six straight, as the Ephs' record on the season dropped to 3-12.

support has eroded. According to Spielman, Poland under Jaruzelski is a very depressing place and the last few years have been the hardest ever. But he predicted that the future will bring growing stability for Poland which he hoped that the present regime will successfully achieve.

Hoop's hot at home

by John Clayton

Folks, this team is good. This team won three games in a row this week. Three games against tough opponents, three games that were not flukes.

Folks, this team wiped out Bowdoin Saturday 74-64, and Bowdoin only has one other loss in Division III. This team also beat Bates on Friday 82-72 and Middlebury last Tuesday 91-65.

Folks, this team has won four games in a row.

This team is 5-1 in the super-cozy confines of Lasell Gymnasium.

New heroes

Folks, this team just finds a way to come up with a new hero for every game. Saturday, it was guard Tim Walsh '86 and forward John McNicholas '84 off the bench to score 19 and 15 points respectively.

Friday, it was captain Scott Olesen '83 shooting 8 for 10 and guard Ed Schmidt '84 shooting 7 for 9.

Tuesday, it was the inimitable Artie Pidorianno scoring 28 points.

Folks, this group of players went off to Cuba and came back a team of players who know who they are and what they're doing. Folks, this team is good.

Streak shooter

Saturday, McNicholas scored the first five points of the second half to break a 26-26 tie and send the Ephs on their way.

Walsh sparked the team with his steals and assists while McNicholas kept pouring in the buckets on jump shots. "Johnnie Mack is a streak shooter," said Coach Curt Tong, "and he was hot."

Defensive predicament

Although the Polar Bears were able to cut the Williams lead to three (from a high of ten), at 61-58 at the 3:46 mark, the Ephs hit the clutch foul shots at the end to clinch it.

"Bowdoin is a good team," said Tong, "because they have a great balance of inside strength and outside shooting ability. They put you in a defensive predicament—you can't collapse, but you can't go out too far. That's why I was just tickled with our defense, especially Olesen, Walsh, and McNicholas."

Lesser opponent

Folks, they did the same thing to a lesser opponent on Friday. Pidorianno was having a bad night (that's right, for once Pidorianno did not lead the team in scoring), so Schmidt and Olesen took over.

Olesen collected 17 points on Friday, while Schmidt's jumpers were good for 14. Pidorianno, even on his off night, added 15 and Dave Krupski had 12.

Anything they want

Folks, this team knocked off highly rated Middlebury as well. They could do anything they wanted to on offense. Tuesday—Pidorianno jumper? Two points. Andy Goodwin drive? Two points. Dave Krupski offensive rebound? Two points.

"We had a slow start this season," said Assistant Coach Bob Peck, "but now things are falling in place, everyone knows their roles now. We've found the combinations that work, and we're going to stick with them."

One broad statement

How good is this team? It's hard to say. Lasell is an amazing equalizing factor. And the Ephs are 1-5 on the road. But three of those losses came before Christmas, before the Cuba trip that pulled them together. We can, however, make this one broad statement: Folks, this team is good.

Skiers slip at UNH carnival

by Chuck Mahoney

It was a disappointing weekend for the men's ski teams, as neither Nordic nor Alpine finished in the top five at the University of New Hampshire Winter Carnival.

The cross-country team raced at Middlebury for the second consecutive week, because of a lack of snow at UNH.

On Friday, the men finished a frustrating two points behind Bates to place them seventh in the individual competition.

Coach Bud Fisher commented, "We skied better this week than last, but still not as well as I think we can. It was disappointing to finish behind Bates by two."

Retaliate Saturday

The team retaliated forcefully in Saturday's relay, however, leaving Bates in the tracks to finish sixth.

Vermont took both events with their lack of American skiers; against such skiing demigods as Norwegians Pal Sjuistad and Frederick Thavlow, it required a tour-de-force by the Williams dynamos to place well.

Nordic Captain Steve Johansen '84 skied his best race of the year to date, finishing in 29th, while Spencer Jones '85 and Ragnar Horn '86 both showed improvement to place 31st and 34th respectively.

Alpine frustration

The Alpine team experienced frustration in both Friday's giant slalom and Saturday's slalom competition, with a series of mishaps and tantalizing course conditions.

One highlight in Friday's race was Alpine captain Crawford

Lyons' sixth-place finish, which secured his place at the Nationals in that event.

The team tied for sixth overall with St. Lawrence, as UVM found itself able to win, with Dartmouth in second.

Saturday unpleasant

Saturday was simply unpleasant as team members had problems skiing out of the course, missing goals gates, and DNF (Did Not Finish) ing.

Next week will provide a change in scenery for both teams as they race at Stowe for the UVM Carnival, the third stop in preparation for the Williams Winter Carnival February 18-19.

Hockey hurting, loses three

by Dave Woodworth

Looking more like a hospital ward than a hockey team, the men's varsity puck squad dropped all three of their games this past week.

Saturday's setback came at the hands of the Bowdoin Polar Bears, 4-3 in overtime, as eight (count 'em, eight) Eph players watched from the stands. Williams opened the scoring with a goal by Scott Karmozyn '86, assisted by Brian Rutledge '85 and Erik Mnutzen '86, at 5:02 of the first period.

Bowdoin came back to knot the score at one-all with just 12 seconds gone in the second period, as John Theberge, who has proven to be the Ephs' nemesis in their two meetings this season, led a rush down the right wing off the opening face-off. Brian McGuinness and Jean Roy assisted on the power-play goal.

The Ephs, however, got two goals of their own in the second stanza to take a 3-1 lead into the final frame. With McGuinness out for tripping, Rutledge took advantage of the power-play to notch his second point of the night, scoring at 13:30 on assists by Greg Pachus '84 and Dave Fritz '86. Rich Jackson '85, assisted by Rutledge, tallied what proved to be the Ephs' final goal at 19:11 of the period.

Williams seemed to have all of the momentum as McGuinness was again sent off with a mere 11 seconds played in the third period. However, Theberge scored his second goal of the game—this one shorthanded—at the 1:12 mark, closing the margin to 3-2.

The Ephs had a golden opportunity to widen the spread around the 9 minute mark, as

Winning Again

Swim teams 6-0

by Andrew Garfield

Cecilia Clepiela '84, with three wins, led the women's swim team to a 90-56 victory over Bowdoin on Saturday, while the men beat the Polar Bears, 101-31.

Clepiela won the 200 Individual Medley (2:20.6), the 200 backstroke (2:22.4) and qualified for the nationals with a time of 2:19.8 in the 200 fly. Rachel Stauffer '85 also qualified for the nationals in the 100 free (56.10).

Kim Eckrich '85 and Dina Esposito '83 had two victories apiece to pace the rest of the team. Eckrich won the 100 IM (1:04.2) and the 200 breast (2:37.2) while Esposito took first place in the required and optional diving events.

Other winners included Stauffer in the 200 free (2:02.4), Katie Hudner '83 in the 50 back (30.18), Peggy Thoman '85 in the 50 breast (33.84), Ann Tuttle '83 in the 50 free (26.27) and the Medley Relay team of Eckrich, Tuttle, Hudner and Liz Jex '83 (1:58.7).

Men bomb Bowdoin

With four seniors winning two events each, the men's swim team bombed Bowdoin 101-31.

Dave Johnson won the 100 breast (1:03.9) and the 200 breast (2:17.5). Ben Aronson won the 800 free (8:08.7) and the 200 fly (1:59.5). Mark Weeks won the 50 free (22.26) and the 100 free (49.44) and Jim Stockton won both the diving events. Rob Sommer '84 also had two victories: the 100 back (56.08) and the 500 free (4:51.9).

Record-breaking

Sommer, however, had his pool record in the 200 IM broken by teammate Bill Couch '86. Couch, setting his second pool record in as many meets, streaked to a national qualifying time of 1:59.49.

Other winners were John Peloso '85 in the 200 back (2:03.9), Rob Bowman '83 in the 200 free (1:48.8) and Peter Orphanos '85 in the 100 fly (54.66).

Both teams upped their records to 6-0. They will face Springfield next Saturday at home, the men at 2:00 and the women at 4:00.

Women take fourth

Although the official results have not yet been tabulated, Coach Bud Fisher estimates a fourth place finish for the women's ski team this weekend.

The women, skiing at the University of New Hampshire Winter Carnival, finished behind Vermont, Middlebury, and fairly close to third-place Dartmouth.

Held Knight was once again the star of the weekend, as she finished second in both the slalom and giant slalom for the downhill team. Kate Knopp finished tenth in the slalom.

Nordic third

For the Nordic team, captain Ellen Chandler finished third, while Sarah Bates '85 came in twelfth. The team took fourth in the cross-country relay, and places third in the overall Nordic standings.

Because of a lack of snow, the cross-country races were held at Middlebury. This caused the delay in discovering the overall Carnival standings, because those results had to be sent back to UNH before tabulation.

In a similar situation at St. Lawrence's Carnival last week, the official results were not available until Wednesday.

The Ephs travel to the UVM Carnival next weekend.

Here's our healthy Williams hockey players: Brad Ball '86 (19) chases the puck as goalie Dan Finn '84 and captain Sam Flood '83 and Ed Finn '83 (both in back) watch. (Scheibe)

Faculty distressed over inquiries

Calls from Dean's office

by Dan Keating

Claiming possible abridgment of academic freedom and intimidation by the Deans, a number of faculty members have complained about a series of phone calls, made by the deans during the hunger strike, to signers of the petition calling for divestment by the college.

The situation is currently being examined by the Faculty Steering Committee, according to Committee Chairman Professor Robert Kozelka. The matter will probably be brought up at tomorrow night's faculty meeting.

According to Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, eleven calls were made by himself and Dean Crls Roosenraad on the Sunday and Monday following the beginning of the hunger strike. All of the people called had signed the petition circulated before the hunger strike calling for total divestment by the college.

Degrees of pressure

Faculty descriptions of the calls ranged from decent and sensible to angry and threatening. About half the calls went to untenured faculty and half to tenured professors. In general, it was the untenured professors who felt a greater degree of pressure.

Due to the feeling that intimidation has occurred and with fear that it could continue, most of the faculty who have expressed concern over these incidents wish to remain anonymous.

One faculty member said he received an "angry" call and that "the effect of the call was intimidating and an abridgment of an individual's academic freedom." He went on to say that the Deans "seemed to be trying to drive faculty away from supporting the tactics" being used by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

An untenured professor said that he received a call whose "nature was not explicitly threatening, but implicitly threatening."

Other faculty were less disturbed. One person who was called said, "I was not intimidated and was glad for the opportunity to share some ideas with the Dean."

Professor Donald Beaver considered the call "perfectly sensible" and said that he was not intimidated at all. "I think it is bothersome that there is an atmosphere that would make some people feel intimidated," said Beaver.

Another tenured professor said he received a call which he felt was "nothing more than informative."

Some faculty had mixed feelings over the call. One professor who was called said he "appreciated the call" and that O'Connor was "decent about it." But this person also considered the call unnecessary and an "over-reaction on the part of the Deans."

Unclear purpose

Another professor called himself "puzzled by the call" which he received. "The purpose of the call was not clear to me, and

CC, Housing Committee clash

by David Kleit

Sharp disagreement erupted over the proper role of the Housing Committee Wednesday night at a town meeting sponsored by the College Council to discuss housing system priorities.

Speakers debating proposed changes in the current system included members of College Council, Dean of Freshman Cris Roosenraad and Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta.

The bulk of the College Council presentation, given by vice-president Jay Ward '84, and members Bill Sawyers '84 and Matthew Dodds '86, was a rereading of material previously distributed in all-campus mailings. It focused on the Council's concern for 'justice' in inter-house transfers, support for a prioritized lottery system, and minimizing the importance of class balance within a house as a factor in housing decisions.

Transfer groups limited

Roosenraad, chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), responded to the Council's accusation that the CUL has been attempting to limit transfers, saying, "We don't think that any action we have taken restricts the number of inter-house transfers."

A member of the audience objected, citing the limiting of transfer groups to two people as an action which will directly result in fewer transfers.

In an interview last week Roosenraad explained the reasoning behind the limitation.

"If we're dealing with a group larger than two that wants to transfer, obviously these people are satisfied with living together," he said. "For them, transferring is not an effort to get out of an intolerable situation but is solely to change their physical plant," which he rejects as "fool-hardy."

House stability

Roosenraad said he sees the British Maid shaken up

by Jim Peak

The British Maid was sold recently for $375,000 plus a mortgage to Chester Soling, a New York man who has extensive plans for turning the 118-year old Willamstown restaurant into a hotel.

The major change will be the addition of a three-story wing containing 48 rooms onto the back of the restaurant. The Orchards, an estate built in 1789 which lies adjacent to the Maid property, will also become part of the inn, although it will not be connected to the main complex. The bottom floor of what is now the restaurant will be transformed into the hotel's lounge.

Food will continue to be served upstairs, where a new kitchen will be built, and the current menu will remain unchanged, including the Maid's famous blueberry pancakes.

The original owner, Penelope Corbin, who will remain as manager for two more years, envisions the creation of a real "country inn, with rustic architecture, and a little atmosphere." There will be several types of lodging available, including conventional hotel rooms, a few larger rooms and several suites on the top floor.

Celebrity suites?

Corbin says that she has received a great deal of positive feedback from local people who feel that Willamstown will profit from a place offering this kind of accommodation.

Although she expects Williams parents and alumni to stay at the Maid frequently, Corbin says that the most immediate interest has come from actors working at Williams-theatre during the summer. "Already Ken Howard and Dick Cavett have asked about the suites," she said.

The architect for the addition is Fred Klein of Washington. Construction is expected to begin this May, and will be completed within a year.

The British Maid, a bastion of New England charm and blueberry pancakes, will become a country inn under new ownership. (Schell)

Bad Move

Too rarely do faculty members involve themselves in campus political issues; too rarely do students and faculty unite in a common voice. Therefore, it is vitally important that faculty feel that they can speak freely on any topic and that their words will not be misinterpreted or intentionally misused. Recent events give them little cause for confidence.

Prior to the hunger strike, 45 faculty members signed a petition calling for divestment—which in no way referred to the hunger strike. Yet there is some evidence that the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition used that petition as an indication of faculty support for the hunger strike. That 36, not 45, faculty members signed the subsequent petition in solidarity with the strikers makes it clear that WAAC misrepresented the views of those 45 faculty members.

Fearing that some faculty views were being misstated, Deans O'Connor and Roosenraad called some of the signatories to inform them of the way their signatures had been used. The Deans maintain that they meant these calls to inform, not intimidate, yet some faculty felt intimidated anyway.

We sympathize with the faculty involved. While we agree with the Dean that the faculty members should have been informed of the consequences, the Deans committed a great error when they personally called the faculty, some of them unentured.

Regardless of what exactly was said, certain facts should have, must have, been clear to the Deans. The Deans' Office exerts a significant amount of influence on the lives of both students and faculty. The first petition represented a position antithetical to that of the administration. Some of the signatories lacked tenure, and may therefore have felt unduly pressured by any call from the Deans' Office. Finally, and most importantly, whenever an administrator questions a political move on the part of a professor, regardless of the intent, he endangers the sanctity of faculty opinion and constrains academic freedom.

The Deans had some interest in persuading as many faculty as possible to withdraw their signatures. Whether they advanced this interest or the interest of information is irrelevant. A free exchange of ideas is vital to the liberal arts environment in which we live. When one voice is stifled, we all suffer.

Disappointed

To the editor:

We are disappointed by your lack of proper coverage of the men's squash team. While week after week we train hard and play numerous matches, we receive only an occasional blurb describing our fortunes. Many of us have been playing hard since returning to Williams in the fall in order to prepare for a season of competition against the country's top teams. There are no collegiate divisions by size in squash; we go head to head with the Ivy schools, the cadets and middies and the rest of the New England pack. Currently our record stands at 15-2, our only losses coming to second-ranked Princeton and third-ranked Yale.

This past week we trounced Stonybrook (9-0) and avenged two upsets last year by rolling over Dartmouth (8-1) and Tufts (9-0). Our goal this season is to retain our ranking as fourth in the nation. Our biggest challenge will come tomorrow from a young Trinity squad, so why not come down to the courts at 4:00 p.m. and cheer us on? And Record, why not send a writer down, too?

Respectfully,

Sacrifices

To the editor:

About divestiture:

The trustees say they have to think about the money that supplies the ongoing needs of the ongoing Williams community. This seems reasonable. Many students and faculty—probably by now most—say that an institution dedicated to the transmission of humane values must put principle first. This seems more than reasonable; it seems right. The hunger strike has served its purpose; it has shown that some of us are ready to make, and many of us to support, painful, if short-term, sacrifices to confront a web of outrage and injustice which all of us recognize but few of us allow to make us uncomfortable. But we are going to have to be made uncomfortable if anything is to be accomplished. Sacrifices are necessary; we cannot expect to make our contribution to justice in South Africa at no cost to ourselves. Can we not, as a community of teachers, administrators, and above all students, propose ways to answer the trustees' reasonable concerns, and to spread the sacrifices over the entire Williams community?

As a first step, we can ask trustees and administrators to estimate how much various degrees of divestiture will cost yearly, and for how long. We will then be ready to consider realistically the degree of discomfort we are ready to accept.

Curriculum Coherence? What's That?

Williams Professor explains philosophy of Liberal Arts

A glance at the history of undergraduate offerings indicates that cohesion was always an elusive element

by Frederick Rudolph

Frederick Rudolph is Mark Hopkins Professor of History Emeritus at Williams College. The preceding article, adopted from remarks delivered at the Wingspread Conference on the Undergraduate Curriculum, appeared in the New York Times on Jan. 9, 1983.

While pondering a possible strategy for this paper, I experienced something that had never happened to me before: my three grandchildren burst upon me and in a chorus asked, "Fritz, tell us—what was it like back in the good old days when there was coherence in the undergraduate curriculum?" I long ago learned how to answer a question with a question, and promptly responded, "And just what do you mean by coherence in the undergraduate curriculum?"

My grandson, Payson, whose father went to Middlebury College and whose mother went to New England College, is not yet a year old, but he told me recently that based on what he was hearing from the kids in his set he is applying for early admissions decision at Brown and he wonders if he is going to find coherence there. I told him what he would find in 1983: two systems of grading, a student option to be graded pass/fail even if the student's professor prefers letter grades, transcripts that do not record failures, individual course programs custom-designed by students with the assistance of a staff of counselors and by students ignoring that staff. We both wondered: Does coherence inhere in the Brown curriculum?

My granddaughter Jessica, a fourth-grader, whose father is an actor and whose mother is a weaver, both of them products of a liberal-arts college that was ambivalent about theater but confidently negative about weaving, asked whether a coherent undergraduate curriculum, whatever that is, represents a fixed moment in the definition of truth or can it, she asked, be receptive to changing needs, knowledge and interests?

I answered, at first, by being a historian. I surprised her by taking her upon my knee and telling her about birth, about how a liberal art is born. The history of the liberal-arts curriculum, I told her, is a record of accretion and adjustment, of the accommodation of new knowledge and new values to continuing purpose. College professors, her grandfather among them, have had no apparent trouble with the fact that they have succeeded in defining liberal arts in such a way that they today only remotely resemble the medieval quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, music) and trivium (logic, grammar and rhetoric).

Each subject that now seems so firmly lodged in our understanding of what constitutes the liberal arts, I assured Jessica, has had its own career. In his inaugural address at Williams in 1836, Mark Hopkins, for instance, regretted how little the college had done to encourage aesthetic sense and judgment; it was still doing little in 1870 when a student asked, "When is Williams College to have a professorship of the fine arts?" The answer came 33 years later with the appointment of Richard Austin Rice to a professorship of the art and history of civilization.

And then I assured her that whatever the coherent curriculum of the future happens to be, it will be receptive to much that is already old, much that she is already taking for granted—engineering, computing, applied mathematics—much that we cannot now imagine, and just possibly theater and weaving.

I went further. Not yet having defined a coherent curriculum, I suggested that it is necessarily an index to change. Otherwise, the curriculum would only be a sort of repository of exhausted ideas and practices, not the living, questioning organism that is necessary to nurture the development of an educated person. Women's studies, I proposed, may even succeed in revolutionizing what now passes as curricular truth.

Another granddaughter, Alexa, not yet 3, much to my chagrin had fallen asleep during my commentary. But as she rubbed her eyes and stretched herself back to consciousness, she asked: "Well, do we know what a coherent curriculum is yet? What was it like when everyone knew that that's why they had? How does it taste? How much of it is not good for you? Is there enough to go around?"

It was time for a definition.

A coherent baccalaureate curriculum is one of which it can be said that its parts have an orderly and logical relationship to one another, and of which it can also be said that the sum of its parts—the curriculum as it is experienced—is society's definition of an educated person.

My grandson is not yet a year old, but he told me he is applying for early decision at Brown.

Thinking it was time for some historical elaboration, I pointed out to my grandchildren that even when the classical course was in place, when coherence in curricular substance and style was most apparent, critics faulted that curriculum for being impractical and intellectually feeble. "Which would have advanced the most at the end of a month," Henry David Thoreau asked in "Walden," "the boy who had made his own jackknife from the ore which he had dug and smelted, reading as much as would be necessary for this, or the boy who had attended the lecture on metallurgy... and had received a penknife from his father? Which would be most likely to cut his fingers?"

In recent years as accelerating assault on the old curriculum has led to widespread loss of coherence. The breakdown of an elitist governing class of professionals, for whom the classical course was both a useful education and a certification of status, has coincided with the demands of an insistent egalitarianism and a dynamic industrial economy, both friendlier to technical and vocational training than to liberal learning. Since World War II higher education has developed into a vast safety valve for keeping the young out of the labor market and in a mood of sweet reasonableness: it has taken a great deal more than liberal education to do the job.

The impact of student consumerism and the professionalization of the academic disciplines on curricular coherence has been anything but salutary, and surely the degree to which TV has displaced the public school as the primary educator in American society has introduced a disquieting and immeasurable influence. The consequence of these and other developments is a confused, debased, and often incoherent curriculum.

Why, we wondered together, are there now so many people driven by the desire to put coherence back into the curriculum, persuaded as they are that indeed there were good old days when the curriculum was a model of order and cohesion. Surely one reason is the sense that society is not getting from the college-educated what it needs and rightfully expects: minds that jump, voices that speak with clarity and understand the purposes of language, people who move imaginatively and knowledgeably in a shrunken world.

That education would emphasize communicative skills—English, computer, foreign languages, their use and understanding. It would achieve a balance among general education (the core), concentration (the major), and electives (the rest), and it would do so not so much by dictating what everyone must know but by defining and delineating the intellectual, esthetic, and moral style appropriate to an educated person who is equipped to live and act effectively in the 21st century. Such an education would also acknowledge the relationship between liberal learning and the qualities and interests that advance careers.

Of course by now I had lost my young audience, I thought. But... Payson wanted to know how the curriculum at Brown and St. John's College could both be coherent. Jessica wondered if the liberal arts curriculum of the future would recognize artistic creativity as an aspect of being human. Alexa, on awakening once more, asked if I really thought that in this day and age, in this country, a widely shared coherent curriculum is possible. I sent them out to play.

situation than before. The hunger strike, then, on the level of the Williams community, was nonviolent in the best Gandhian sense.

On the level of the Trustees the hunger strike certainly was coercive in nature. The need for such coercion is justified by John Swomley in Liberation Ethics, "The intention of the coercion is not to break the opponent's will as violence does but to alter it by destroying his (sic) confidence and enthusiasm in the system he (sic) is defending. The fact of nonviolence permits negotiation and persuasion to continue during the conflict. The intention here is to persuade the opponent and at the same time permit him to demonstrate the rightness of his (sic) position if he (sic) can. The suffering is intended to win the sympathy and support of those who are sensitive to human suffering or who are similarly situated." An important aspect of nonviolent action is suggested in Swomley's passage, that of protesting against a system rather than the people within it. In this sense the hunger strike was not directed at the Trustees, but rather at the evil of apartheid which is acting through them.

The idea of not directing an action at particular people, but rather towards the forces acting through them, is important. If there was any lapse in the nonviolent nature of the hunger strike, it was when the Trustees began to be dehumanized in the eyes of those involved in the strike. Anger was directed towards the Trustees themselves, rather than keeping such anger pointed towards apartheid and the systems which support it. Given that the hunger strike was practiced and supported by human beings, such lapses from perfection are certainly allowable, and do not detract from the overall nonviolent nature of the hunger strike.

Given the frustration and feelings of helplessness, joined with a need to do something about apartheid, the members of WAAC feel, it is commendable that they devised an effective nonviolent campaign. The reward is a far greater base of support within the Williams community, and important signals to others involved in the anti-apartheid struggle, and even to the white government of South Africa itself.

the caller seemed uneasy," he added.

O'Connor said that he finds it hard to understand that people were intimidated, and that he regrets their feeling that way. He said that he did not get the impression while on the phone that anyone felt intimidated. "Everyone I talked to said, 'I'm glad you called,'" O'Connor commented.

Both O'Connor and Roosenraad said that the calls were to inform signers of the divestment petition that their support was being used to back the hunger strike as a tactic. "It was simply to provide information," said Roosenraad.

The situation has been brought to the attention of the Faculty Steering Committee, whose duties include looking into matters of faculty morale. Kozelka would not specify the number of complaints or the action which the committee is likely to take.

O'Connor described himself as "incredulous" that the matter was brought to the Steering Committee. O'Connor noted that he is as accountable as anyone else, so "if people feel a real grievance, they should use the grievance procedure."

Some faculty members were distressed that many of the calls were directed at untenured professors who feel particular apprehension when questioned by a Dean. "It is sadly ironic that tenure, instituted to protect academic freedom, has the net effect of precluding academic freedom," said one professor.

Professors deplore strike

by Jeff Bralnard

A group of 22 faculty members have signed a petition deploring as a "coercive tactic" the hunger strike for divestment from South Africa led by three student members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition this January.

The following is the text of the faculty statement:

"We the undersigned faculty wish to indicate our support for the principle of rational discourse as a means of conducting the business of the College. We, therefore, deplore the use of coercive techniques, such as hunger strikes, as totally inconsistent with the morality of process to which an academic community must consistently remain committed."

The faculty who signed the petition are:

Dudley Bahlman
David A. Booth
Russell H. Bosiert
Mac Brown
Arthur J. Carr
Paul Clark
Willard Dickerson
Charles Fugua
Neil Grabois
Fred Greene
John M. Hyde

Gary J. Jacobsohn
Charles Karellis
Joseph Lowman
George E. Marcus
Anson C. Piper
George Pistorius
John K. Savacool
Robert G.L. Scott
Irwin Shalman
Gullford Spencer
Fred H. Stocking

The petition was circulated by political science professor Gary Jacobsohn. He stressed that it should not be inferred that the individual signers hold any particular view on the question of divestment from companies doing business in South Africa, although he added that the group as a whole holds "a diversity of views on the subject."

"Everyone who signed the petition abhors the system of apartheid," he assured.

Inappropriate setting

Jacobsohn added that the group opposes the tactic of a hunger strike in the particular setting of Williams College. But he said he personally is not opposed to the principle of a hunger strike, and he thinks the rest of the petition's signers would agree.

"I support the hunger strike by Anatoly Scharansky, a Soviet dissident, as a perfectly appropriate response to his situation," Jacobsohn explained. "But there is a massive difference in the situation at Williams... this is a voluntary, not a coercive community. If you don't get what you want, you always have the option of removing yourself from this institution."

The purpose of the petition is less to criticize the hunger strike than to uphold the concept of "rational discourse" in the future, according to Jacobsohn. He worries that as a result of faculty support, the tactic of the hunger strike has been legitimated and given "the imprimatur of scholarly activity."

History of recalcitrance

Roger Doughty '84, a WAAC member and spokesman during the hunger strike, responded that "in and of itself, yes, you could consider the strike morally coercive. But given a history of continual recalcitrance by the Trustees, you perceive the necessity of going beyond rational discourse.

"Also, they're ignoring the fact that the strike was stopped before the strikers' health was threatened," he continued. "Along with our demands, our goal was to publicize the issue. We got movement on our demands, and now people are talking about the issues. So once we saw that the strike had outlived its usefulness, we ended it."

Doughty added that WAAC has not yet had a chance to discuss or respond to the petition as a group.

Irreparable harm

Jacobsohn said he felt all avenues of "rational discourse" with the trustees were not exhausted before the Finance Committee meeting with WAAC, at which the hunger strike began.

"The students involved seem to have inferred from the fact that the Trustees have not acted in a way that would incorporate their ideas on divestment that they haven't been listening," he said. "I fundamentally reject that."

Jacobsohn also rejected the notion that the hunger strike was not coercive but rather symbolic, designed to draw attention to the issue of divestment.

"The force of the hunger strike was in the knowledge that irreparable harm could have occurred to the health of the strikers," he said.

Other faculty agreed

Jacobsohn added that there were many other faculty members who agreed with the petition but who didn't sign, so it is misleading to compare the numbers of faculty signatures on the two petitions supporting different sides of the controversy as a measure of overall faculty opinion, he said. Also, Jacobsohn did not solicit faculty signatures, as did WAAC.

There were a number of reasons why these other faculty didn't sign, according to Jacobsohn. Some didn't want to polarize the issue further, and others feared their signature would be confused with opposition to divestment itself, he said.

Jacobsohn pointed out that there was a "significant" amount of peer pressure among faculty not to sign his petition, "which some could view as sucking up to the administration." But there was also peer pressure against signing the other petition supporting the hunger strike, he admitted.

Winter Carnival without snow?

by Blake Martin and Todd Morgan

When's Carnival? What's Carnival? Where's Carnival? Will we have Carnival. These are some of the questions put forth by the faithful as well as the unfaithful.

Time used to be...

- when people enjoyed the third weekend in February. Lately they sit around and lament the fact that there is no snow or use the extra Friday to study.
- when the faculty used to stomp the students in the championship game of the annual broomball tournament. (They forced us to say this.)
- when the winners of the annual trike race were celebrated national heroes—even if they were ugly.
- when underclassmen signed up to keep gates under the pretense of supporting their ski team, when all they really wanted to do was watch their favorite blonde bomber in a skin tight suite.
- when upperclassmen coolly avoided these "sophomoric" displays of affection and instead turned their energies to upholding their House pride at the Annual Winter Games.
- when a Williams student was not afraid to eat bananas for speed... and style—not to mention the semi-fluid grace of the jello-chugging contest.
- when rugby players came out en masse to vent their feeble efforts against Rich Weber in the annual beer-chugging contest.

Past Winter Carnivals featured both enthusiasm and snow—will Williams fight apathy and mud this year?

- when House unity meant something.
- when Dodd House held their infamous splunk tournaments.
- when the freshmen provided plenty of beer at the trike race and then submitted a well-primed group of freshmen for the tug-of-war. We will not mention that this group then proceeded to flat flat on their faces against a Greylock squad.
- when snow sculptures went on even without snow.
- when the Saturday night parties rolled around, anyone could do anything, anywhere, anyhow...

So what happened to Carnival? Perhaps it started when New England winters turned balmy and mild. This change in temperature has not only affected the amount of snow on the ground, but also nullified the Williams Winter Carnival spirit.

Are we not men? (women too... hope this one slips by the WFA!) Just because some of the last Winter Carnivals were characterized by a certain absence of the white stuff does not mean that Williams cannot throw a great Winter Carnival. In fact, this year's Carnival promises to be one of the best ever, even if our snow dances do not succeed. Brodie Mountain's new racing slope will host the downhill events and a whole new program of on-campus activities starting Thursday afternoon will guarantee plenty of fun.

Get psyched

So even though the first events do not begin for more than a week, start training for the citizen's cross country race, tune up your fastest three-wheeler, design your House sculpture, get psyched for the opening ceremony, complete with Renzi Lamb throwing out the first ski, but most importantly, get out and enjoy. The semester is barely underway, so take a break. We deplore you.

Dean sings Strauss, Mozart

by David P. McCabe

As a preface, let's agree that if having seen the operatic production of Hamlet (to the score of Carmen) that Harold Hecuba brought to Gilligan's Island constitutes the whole of one's experience with opera, then we may rightly deem such a person's knowledge of opera extremely limited; my knowledge of opera is extremely limited.

But I would also hope to find agreement, among at least a few readers, that an extensive understanding of the subtleties involved in some of the finer arts is not the sine qua non for enjoying what we somewhat loosely term "cultural events."

The experience of the benign and uninformed spectator may be, to him, as enjoyable as that of the most intelligent and historically-minded critic; the difference exists insofar as the levels of the two experiences are at variance. If we employ the phraseology of Aaron Copeland, and term the former "emotive", the latter "intellectual", then we must declare the musical program at Brooks-Rogers Hall last Saturday, with Daniel O'Connor baritone, Judith Reichert soprano, and Victor Hill on piano, an emotive triumph in every respect.

The program, entitled Duets, Solo Songs, Operetta Scenes, attracted a predominantly non-student crowd; roughly nine-tenths of the audience was composed of faculty and their spouses, to my admittedly untrained musical ear, the vocal performances by both singers were captivating. Perhaps Reichert did, as one of my friends well-trained in the study of voice mentioned, suffer slightly on the upper end of the scale due to an admitted week long bout with laryngitis. But any such ill effects appear both trifling and inconsequential in an overall appraisal of the energy and beauty her voice brought to the part of soprano. O'Connor, for his part, filled the hall with the sonorous depth and strength of his pure baritone voice.

Further, he quickly established a rapport with the audience through his often tongue-in-cheek descriptions of the songs, all of which were sung in German. By the end of the performance, O'Connor's raised eyebrows were earning chuckles from the majority of the audience; as he and Reichert waltzed across the stage, they had clearly won the hearts of the audience.

And of course, there was Victor Hill. As usual, Hill provided a virtuoso performance on piano. Never overpowering the singers, he nonetheless incorporated the keyboard sound as an integral part of the listening experience, and I often found myself mesmerized by the nimble quality of his fingerwork.

The performance consisted mainly of duets by Reichert and O'Connor, from the works of Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Mozart. The first half also saw O'Connor perform four solo songs by Strauss; in the second half, Reichert took her turn and rose to the occasion with six folk songs set to music by Brahms. During the finale, as the two performed several short operetta scenes from the works of Lehar, the audience, which had previously applauded strongly—but regularly—was clearly enthralled, as they broke into applause after each short song and succeeded in bringing Reichert, O'Connor, and Hill on stage for an encore.

The three composed an absolutely charming group on stage. While I cannot provide a more analytic and musically insightful commentary on the performance, I can speak for the entire audience, I am sure: if you were not at Brooks-Rogers Hall on Saturday, you missed what was simply a very professional and, more importantly, delightful evening of music.

Trike race recycled

This year, after a hiatus of several years, the Williams Winter Carnival Tricycle Race will run again. A featured event of the Carnival through the 60's and early 70's, the race combines speed, pageantry and a great deal of silliness. Racing from Chapin Hall steps and around the Freshman Quad, teams will consist of two pilots in relay with one trike and a pit crew. Though of course prizes will be given for the fastest trike-team, the most eagerly sought prizes will again be those awarded for considerations that transcend brute speed. Accordingly, a panel of judges will also select "most souped-up trike," "best dressed pilot" and "most outrageous pitcrew."

Veteran sports announcer Mike Nock's call "Gentleman, start your trikes" will be given at 1:00 sharp on Friday, February 18th. Ideal teams should involve entries, floors, upperclass and off-campus houses, though independents are welcome. Tricycles can be obtained throughout Williamstown, or pried away from reluctant professors with small children.

Entry slips will be mailed out this week and must be completed by Wednesday, February 16th so that heats can be drawn up. Spectators are encouraged to come out and root on the big day, and then move down to Cole Field House with the racers for the start of the Annual Winter Games.

Drinking problems draw attention

by Amy Doherty

The Williams College Health Service is offering a new Alcohol Awareness Program in which students will educate other students about alcohol through dorm presentations, radio spots, posters and other outreach methods. The program is partly a response to what members of both the Administration and the medical staff at the Infirmary see as a growing alcohol problem at Williams.

One of the Infirmary nurses estimates that during the school year 1981-82 the Infirmary handled seven or eight severe alcohol overdoses that required hospitalization, an alarming increase from the past. Both last year and this year, students have expressed concerns to the health staff about friends with drinking problems. Dr. Corkins, the head doctor at the Infirmary, and two of the Infirmary nurses, Mrs. Gangemi and Mrs. Corkins, began developing the Williams Alcohol Awareness Program (WAAP) after Dean O'Connor proposed such a program last summer.

8% will be alcoholics

"We don't delude ourselves that we'll prevent hard core alcoholics from being alcoholics," says Dr. Corkins, who estimates that forty students out of each class are or will become alcoholics. "And we're not trying to tell students what they should or shouldn't do... We're hoping to make life a little more pleasant for students."

Dean O'Connor encourages the program's emphasis on education. WAAP, he maintains, is part of a wider health mission at the college that includes educating and helping students in the areas of nutrition and stress management as well as alcohol awareness. "This program is educational—it has nothing to do with discipline," he contends, although he notes that "obviously if people drink less, a decrease in vandalism will be an unintended side-effect." He also notes that the alcohol education program is coordinated with a larger network of new policies concerning alcohol, such as the management of the Log and the supervision of parties.

... forty students out of each class are or will become alcoholics.

WAAP will also reassure students who feel obligated to drink "that it's o.k. not to drink," says Mrs. Gangemi, and to help students feel more comfortable putting pressure on others to control their drinking. One student who has voiced satisfaction with the program to the Infirmary staff confided that he had spent the first few weeks of his life at Williams taking care of his regularly drunk roommate.

In Other Ivory Towers

Middlebury

Two Middlebury town policemen were recently called into the Rosebud, a local bar frequented by Middlebury students, to maintain order. A friendly customer offered the officers a bite to eat—brownies, to be specific. The officers readily accepted the gift.

The Middlebury Campus reports that "the brownies were laced with some controlled substances, which set the policemen off and flying. One policeman drove his squad car into the woods, while the other tried to make it to the chief of police's house. He never quite made it to the door. Instead, he was found by the police chief, calling for help and pounding his fists against the walls of the house."

RPI

One-third of all freshmen who enter RPI do not graduate from there. Of the students who do leave Rensselaer, only one-third do so for academic reasons. The other reasons for the high attrition rate are the focus of a new investigation.

The Polytechnic reports that "financial hardship is a main contributor to the attrition rate." The administration plans to aim efforts towards retention at those students who leave voluntarily. These efforts will include "increased personal attention, more thorough advising, getting more students involved in campus . . . activities, and increased financial aid."

Bryn Mawr and Haverford

"Security incidents shatter winter calm," reports the Bryn Mawr and Haverford Colleges News. At Bryn Mawr, in early December, "six intoxicated men . . . from another college" stole a television from a dorm and sexually harassed one of the residents. Over winter vacation, furthermore, 19 rooms in one dorm were burglarized—primarily stereo equipment was stolen. Bryn Mawr Director of Security called the robbery an "in-house job."

At Haverford, an Apple computer was stolen from the computer center; the loss is estimated at $2,200.

Carson-Newman College

Four students at this small Baptist college in Tennessee set fire to a stack of girly magazines and ended up burning down a house.

The four entered a house near the campus expecting to find stolen stereo equipment. Instead they found a trunk full of Playboy and Penthouse magazines.

They set fire to the magazines because, their attorneys argued, the sight of nude women offended them. An unsympathetic judge ordered them to pay the homeowner $35,000 in damages.

Party Party is a party party

by Jon Tigar

From its infancy, the youth-oriented British progressive music scene has suffered charges by its critics of refreshing the simplicity, innocence and musical styles of late 50s and early 60s pop.

On no other album do youthfulness and innocence shine through so well as on the sound-track album to the film Party Party (A&M), a collection of proven British and American acts, many of whom contribute wonderfully original cover versions of previously recorded songs.

The album's many styles include ska, rockability, and pop, but in spite of its wide variety the album stays coherent, especially through the first side. Much of this coherence is attributable to Richard Hartley, the music consultant for the film and the producer of many of the bands included.

Visceral

Hartley's slick production style perfectly suits the bouncy, emotionally light themes of the album: romance, driving, socializing and gratification. Faced with these simple topics, the music must be and somehow is both glossy and visceral.

The first side is the better of the two. Elvis Costello fans will welcome his title track addition, a humorous look at the predicaments of those whose only concern is that "we're trying to have a party party party party."

The catchiest tracks on the side, however, are both remakes. Dave Edmunds' "Run Rudolph Run", the best Christmas song ever, transforms Santa and Rudolph into two of the coolest modern figures this side of James Dean. "Run run Rudolph, Santa's gotta make it to town/Got to make him hurry, tell him he can take the freeway down/Run run Rudolph, reeling like a merry-go-round." The playful humor of the lyrics fits the boogie-woogie rockabilly style like a glove.

Vicious

Also noteworthy is Bananarama's version of "No Feelings", originally a Sex Pistols tune. Listeners familiar with Bananarama's hit single, "He Was Really Sayin' Something", will recognize their style: airy, bouncy, very danceable. The style, in fact, is so captivating that some listeners may fail to see just how vicious the lyrics are: "I got no emotions for anybody else/You better understand I'm in love with myself . . . I kick you in the head, you got nothing to say/Get out of the way 'cause I got to get away." Bananarama actually makes these lyrics more than palatable—they make them fun.

The second side is moodier, but only slightly. This side also contains the album's only weak track, a remake of "No Woman, No Cry". There are too many other good cuts to review each in detail, but especially nice were Sting (of the Police) doing versions of "Tutti Frutti" and the bluesier "Need Your Love So Bad" and Chas and Dave's raucous version of "Auld Lang Syne". Even synthesizer fans get a juicy morsel in Midge Ure's "The Man Who Sold the World".

Many groups have tried to cut albums whose sole purpose was to have a good time. Most fail, even pros like Ian Dury, because one artist simply lacks the conceptual variety to sustain the good times through an entire disc. Party Party keeps the party going.

Williams Trio tempts listeners

by Greg Capaldini

Friday night's recital by the Williams Trio was both well-attended and well-received. Tasteful and entertaining performances were the rule on this occasion, and Trio members Julius Hegyi (violin), Douglas Moore (cello), and Paula Ennis-Dwyer (piano) were warmly applauded after each selection.

No twiddling

Highlighting the evening was Mendelssohn's Trio in D-minor. This is one piece in which the listener doesn't have to sit there twiddling his thumbs waiting for the good part to come. Each of the four movements could stand on its own.

The Trio played them all with an elegant, light touch, perfect for the composer's so-called "elfin" style. The overall effect of a very controlled melodic drive was as fulfilling as anything with thundering sonorities and wild technical displays.

Beethoven's Trio in B-flat, Op. 11 was granted an equally dynamic reading, with contrasts of tone and volume level perfectly placed. Particularly satisfying was the Mozartean simplicity of the slow middle movement.

Minor glitches

Here and throughout the evening, the Trio's overall sound seemed cleaner and more relaxed than it usually is. Of course, the playing still had its minor glitches—muddy runs, crunchily down-bows, off-center intonation—but the new clarity was entirely welcome.

In the company of such works as the aforementioned, any other is likely to suffer by comparison, and Rachmaninoff's Trio Elégiac #1 did. This early student work ambles from one ill-developed idea to the next, and the lack of effective transitions makes it sound too cut-and-paste.

It's all very pleasant to hear, mind you, but there's not much to listen to. Fortunately, professional musicians are less condescending than reviewers, so the performance was smooth and idiomatic.

RPI link aids exchanges

by Stephen Magnus

Two students from Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, New York, are currently attending Williams on a new student exchange, part of an effort to increase ties between the two institutions.

Williams has always allowed its students to enroll as visiting students at virtually any other college, including RPI. Now, however, the two schools have set up a formal exchange program like those Williams has with the Twelve Colleges, Howard, Cal Tech, and Fisk.

Under the new system, each school will more or less automatically accept any exchange applicant from the other, as long as he is in good academic standing, has good reasons for wishing to exchange and has the permission of his college.

Students will fill out simple exchange applications instead of the more elaborate forms for visiting students. In addition, students from either school can now receive full academic credit for a semester's work at the other institution.

Five-year double degree

Dean Nancy McIntire, who is in charge of exchanges, said the program with RPI will be "most beneficial for Williams students in the sciences and for RPI students who want more liberal arts."

In the recent past no Williams students have enrolled as visiting students at RPI, although a few have gone to MIT or Cal Tech. However, as mathematics professor Neil Grabols, a member of the committee which proposed the exchange said, "the convenience of RPI's nearby location and the excellence of its program made it the obvious choice [for an exchange program]."

According to Grabols, Williams hopes to organize visits to RPI to inform students about RPI's offerings and encourage exchanges. Faculty exchanges, a five-year double degree program (a B.A. from Williams and an M.S. from RPI) and a joint colloquium series are also under consideration as part of the overall effort to form a closer relationship between the two schools.

21st-century preparation

To fund these programs, Williams will draw on a $250,000 grant awarded in November by the Sloan Foundation. The foundation made grants to Williams and nine other liberal arts colleges for expansion of their offerings in "areas where technology and the liberal arts intersect" (e.g., computer art and music and applied statistics.)

According to Grabols, who also helped prepare the grant application, the Sloan Foundation awarded the grants in the belief that "an understanding of technology and applied mathematics are important in educating students for the 21st century."

"Liberal arts students should know how the technologist looks at the world and the modeling techniques that can be applied to interpret the world around us," he said.

CC Town meeting

CUL's efforts to limit these "foolhardy" transfers as "a consistent response" to the Trustees' original charge to the CUL to maintain residential house stability.

The role of the Housing Committee was the focal point of disagreement among the town meeting's speakers. The committee, which has been reporting directly to the CUL this year, was described by Ward as a College Council committee removed from the Council. He called for its return to a position subordinate to the College Council.

In response, Roosenraad noted that the Housing Committee was created prior to the College Council constitution which places it under the Council's jurisdiction. He also claimed that the Housing Committee had chosen the current situation by its own vote.

Although he went on to suggest that the role of the Housing Committee may be a non-issue, Roosenraad said he would not object to some type of Council role.

College Council superseded Kenyatta added that the Housing Committee has several members elected by the College Council, and that the Council is represented in this way. Sawyers responded by stating that in its current situation the Housing Committee has superseded the College Council as a student voice on housing issues.

"As far as student input, the College Council is designed to represent students, and I think it should be allowed to do that," Sawyer said. "When student influence is split up, then you have done the students a disservice."

Housing Committee chairman John Carlson, speaking from the audience, defended the present situation, asserting that the Housing Committee is at least as accountable to students as the College Council is.

The audience of about 70 did not appear impressed by the presentations. Jon Riecke '86 commented, "the College Council did not clarify their position at all beyond the newsletter."

One Housing Committee member in the audience said, "they shouldn't have been reading to us. It was an insult to our intelligence." He added, "People came to the meeting to learn about the system and the proposed changes. They left the meeting confused."

Stress

People can easily become obsessed with a particular facet of their life, Lowman observed. This is another form of anxiety which is just as dangerous. He referred to obsession as "super-concentrated attention" which makes it impossible for an individual to back away from his problems. "Obsessed people tend not to be sensitive to others," he said.

But in spite of our dislike for stress, we also thrive on it. "Human beings frequently seek challenges so that they can strengthen their self-conquering mechanisms, which provide comfort," he explained.

He speculated that life without stress of some type would be boring and uneventful. "There would be nothing but peace," he said.

Meditation, time alone

The compromise is to achieve a certain level of alertness in one's daily affairs, while also taking simple steps to minimize stress through greater relaxation.

Lowman said the reduction of external agitation in the physical environment can significantly reduce tension and anxiety. Pastimes such as sports, card games and crossword puzzles can relieve aggression.

He emphasized that getting time alone, whether driving somewhere or walking around campus, is important in establishing a less stressful life.

Other forms of stress reduction include meditation and progressive relaxation, Lowman said. Relaxation through "auto-hypnosis" can be a part of everyone's daily routine. "Meditation will relax both mind and body so that stress can be minimized," he claimed.

Muscle tightening

Lowman explained that muscle tension can be relieved in as little as 15 minutes a day. He described exercises involving progressive tightening and relaxing of the muscles, from the neck to the toes, accompanied by deep breathing.

One should sit in a comfortable chair with one's eyes closed while practicing this technique, Lowman said.

Administration and College Council representatives try to decide who should control the Housing Committee. From left to right: Dean Cris Roosenraad, Dean Mary Kenyatta, Bill Sawyers '84, Matthew Dodds '86 and Council vice-president Jay Ward '84. (Schell)

The results of a two-day, campus-wide referendum on housing system priorities sponsored by the College Council are in:

	Yes	No	No Opinion
Proposition #1: Should the Housing Committee return to the control of the College Council?	64.6%	15.3%	20.1%
Proposition #2: Do you think that a liberal House transfer system damages the Residential House?	18.8%	76.3%	4.9%
Proposition #3: Should Class Balance be a major priority in the Residential House System?	37.9%	51.3%	10.8%
Proposition #4: Do you feel that transfers for reasons of physical plant damage the Residential House System?	20.4%	65.1%	14.5%
Proposition #5: Do you agree with the CUL's decision to limit the size of House transfer groups to 2 students?	19.7%	67.9%	12.4%

These results are somewhat deceptive, however. Less than 400 students voted so only about a fifth of the student body was heard from. In addition, poor wording of proposals #3 and #4 may have affected their responses, claimed College Council Vice-President Jay Ward.

According to Ward, the primary purpose of the referendum was to educate students on the issues involved and give them a chance to voice their opinions. "I felt it was time for students to confront the issue firsthand," he said.

Ward hopes the results will guide the Housing Committee in the future. He said he intends to use students' favorable response to Proposition #1 in getting the Housing Committee back under the jurisdiction of the College Council next year.

One of the 340 students who bled for a good cause last Tuesday and Wednesday. (Scheibe)

Blood giving sets records

Williams students set a new record last Tuesday and Wednesday by giving 346 pints of blood to the Red Cross Bloodmobile. A total of 340 students turned out, one out of every six on campus, to contribute to the biggest haul the Bloodmobile has gotten in Williamstown.

Red Cross headquarters in Springfield, Mass., expressed their "enthusiastic appreciation for the tremendous student response to an urgent need."

As an impetus, the Bloodmobile sponsored a "Vampire Sweepstakes" for those houses with the largest proportion of its members donating blood. Mark Hopkins and Perry-Bascom-Chadbourne-Woodbridge tied for first place with 25.7% of its members contributing.

Oakley kicks off lecture series

Dean of the Faculty and history professor Francis Oakley traced the history of "the connection between throne and cal reverence . . . belongs unto them that sit on the throne of God," and that therefore he was accountable only to God. "The state of monarchy is the supremest thing on earth," he maintained.

In conclusion, Oakley noted that this century has seen the deposition of almost every king, emperor and dynasty, from the Russian Czars to the Shah of Iran. He theorized that this decline of kingship is directly related to the "demise of widespread religious vision" in the world today.

The 1983 Faculty Lecture Series will continue for five more weeks. The series will feature faculty members from various departments speaking on topics of special interest to them.

Lebanese war horrors described in film, lecture

The Palestinian Action Group screened the film "Report from Beirut: Summer of '82" and listened to political science professor Raymond Baker comment on his own observations in the Middle East at a meeting last week.

The film, produced by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, graphically depicted civilian casualties in war-torn Beirut. Several English-speaking medical personnel described the results of the Israeli bombing.

Many children were killed by anti-personnel bombs that resembled small toys, they said. Others were maimed by phosphorus bombs which burned through layers of skin. One doctor stated that 50 percent of the civilians arriving at hospitals were already dead or mortally wounded.

Hospitals were also bombed despite Red Cross efforts to make their locations known to the Israelis. Doctors complained of lack of blood, operating space and ambulance service.

War can be stopped

Interviewees blamed the United States for the war in Lebanon and accused Israel of "trying out" American weapons in a modern-day Guernica. One American doctor stated that she felt personally responsible for "a war that can be stopped," feeling that President Reagan could have stopped the war at any time.

Baker spoke on the state of the Middle East in the aftermath of Lebanon. During Winter Study, Baker visited Cairo and examined the effect of the war on Egypt.

He explained that Egyptians felt let down by the United States and considered Lebanon "a consequence of Camp David." The United States' blank check policy toward Israel has greatly endangered the peace process, he claimed. "Camp David has become a sham."

Baker also investigated the effectiveness of relief efforts in Lebanon. He explained that Oxfam seemed to have the best organization for deployment of collected funds, and that $2,700 has been collected on the Williams campus and distributed through Oxfam.

Massachusetts aids college financing

A new era in American financial aid opened in January as the Massachusetts College Student Loan Authority sold $20,200,000 of tax-exempt bonds to provide loans to help both in-state and out-of-state students attend private colleges and universities in Massachusetts. No federal or state tax money is involved.

This pooled financing, the first of its kind, will help more than 4,000 families meet the high cost of non-public education, which today ranges from $9,000 to $13,000 per year.

Arthur B. Specter, vice president of Goldman, Sachs & Co., which headed the underwriting group that purchased the education loan bonds, called the Authority's program "revolutionary" and the beginning of "a new way to finance higher education in America . . . what makes this program special is the extraordinarily low before and after tax cost to parents during the college years," he said.

15 years to pay

Qualified borrowers can finance up to 75 percent of the cost of education through the Authority. Loan repayments begin within the 60 days after a loan is made and extend over a 15-year period. Loans can be prepaid without penalty after five years.

There are about 90 independent colleges and universities in Massachusetts eligible to apply for participation in the Authority's education loan program.

Teachers and administrators can start discussing what proportion of the yearly automatic cost-of-living salary increase we would be willing to forego. (Now is a propitious time to do this, since for the first time in years the inflation rate has dropped below the rate of increase.) Other possible measures, none pleasant: heavier teaching loads, wider spacing of leaves, making do with existing facilities and equipment, foregoing new buildings and new programs. Etc.

Students can start discussing reductions in college support for student activities—athletic, social, and cultural—and the reduction of the activities themselves or making up of deficits by voluntary contributions. Would savings be significant? If meat were served in the dining halls only three times a week, or the number of choices reduced? Could a 10% "divestiture tax" be levied on all expenditures for liquor for college social functions? What would be the effect of the reduction of scholarship aid for students whose families make more than $30,000 a year? Etc.

Discussion, of course, should not merely start; it should end in proposals. Talk is cheap. It is also meaningless, unless we are willing to put our mouth where our money is. The trustees know this.

To the editor:

During the week of January 24th, a fund raiser was held for the Williamstown Youth Center (formerly the Boys' Club) in the lobby of Baxter Hall. The idea for the fund raiser was conceived and carried out by students who were enrolled in the winter study course Radical Economics. In addition to organizing the fund raiser, these students volunteered their time at the Youth Center during the month of January and attempted to recruit other students for the same purpose.

The Youth Center is extremely grateful, not only for the money raised and the time volunteered, but also for the interest which was shown by these students in helping kids who frequent the Youth Center. We would like to thank the students from the Radical Economics course, those students who donated money, and all the other Williams students who volunteer their time to help us run successful programs for local kids.

Housing

To the editor:

Once again, the time approaches for freshmen inclusion into upperclass housing and for numbers of upperclassmen changing their housing affiliation. And once again, various college committees and councils debate the merits of the current system which randomly assigns student housing affiliations. Moreover, debate extends to the broader question of the quality of undergraduate life and its influence on the collective collegiate experiences of over 1900 individuals.

As the Armstrong House representative to the College Council, I am disappointed that this debate has endured this long. If the current pace of activity continues, the question of housing affiliation could extend into another academic year. It is in hopes of quickening this pace that I write.

Let us remember that the quality of campus housing here is, if not the best, then certainly among the best in this country. What we are debating is how to insure that each Williams student has an equal chance to enjoy that quality. It is in this spirit that Paul Pomilla formulated his proposal, and that the College Council debated it. It was also in this spirit that an appointed committee of Council members presented the Pomilla Proposal to the CUL on November 2, 1982, and to the Housing Committee on November 15, 1982. Due to a variety of circumstances since then, a decision on the Pomilla Proposal has not been forthcoming.

It is now time to decide. The College Council has had student input through house meetings and now through a referendum. However, the issue of the housing system and transfer lotteries must be divorced from any other issues on the referendum. Important though they may be, they must not block progress on the issue of the Pomilla Proposal.

Rather, the Council members who discussed the proposal with the CUL and Housing Committee in November should submit it to those same groups now for discussion and decision. The three groups concerned must act on this Proposal, approving whatever alterations are mutually agreed upon, so that it will be in effect this year.

At the same time, the Council must devote as much of its energies as feasible to aiding freshmen in the inclusion process.

Settlement of the inclusion-transfer debate must, however, be viewed as a decision reached in the continuing drive for excellence in quality of undergraduate life.

It is not time for confrontation. It is time for positive action.

Awards

To the editor:

The Williams College Temperance Union wishes to congratulate Rex the Dog-Boy for his winning entry in the Favorite Ways to Destroy Large Amounts of Alcohol Very Short Essay Contest.

Rex's entry, "Make It Spontaneously Combustible," impressed our panel of distinguished judges with its comprehensive applicability, its superb destructive potential and its witness to the social benefits of selective breeding.

"Exterminate Yeast," from O.C. Oglivey, was shorter than Rex's but also only affected fermented beverages and therefore fails to produce the worldwide carnage we crave.

A last minute entry from Steve Farley in the wilds of California fell short of winning when it was discovered that he intended to destroy something other than alcohol.

Nevertheless, since all three entrants braved public ridicule to do their part for temperance, we will award them all suitable prizes sometime soon.

Provoked

To the editor:

Two articles appearing in recent issues of the Record have provoked my interest. As a product of the "Williams Experience" myself, I am not surprised by the attitudes represented by Brett McDonnell (Dec. 7) and Jennifer Swift (Jan. 11). Nor am I enraged by the existence of such views among liberal, intelligent Williams College students, for the possibility of a truly critical educational experience within the confines of an institution such as Williams is limited. As an elite enclave of higher education, Williams is a finishing school whose function is to prepare the economically and intellectually advantaged of us to assume our roles in the perpetuation of the present system.

This is not to suggest that the opportunity for a critical appraisal of the historical and ideological forces of a capitalist patriarchy does not exist at Williams. Rather, this is to emphasize that the majority of students, by virtue of the fact that we occupy a position within a hierarchical social order, are limited in the ability to imagine, much less observe, the oppressive and destructive nature of that social order.

Both McDonnell and Swift criticize Mary Daly's analysis of patriarchy in terms of the limitations of their own imaginations. McDonnell is obviously flustered by the concept of "God the Stud" and Swift is equally ill-equipped to cope with the "outrageousness" (sacrilege?) of Daly's critique of Christianity. By adherence to the doctrine of blind faith explicit in Christian dogma and implicit in the values and educational methods of our society, each reveals an inability to question the values with which we are all inculcated.

McDonnell concludes that Daly is not a "smart feminist" because her discussion of patri-

Professor describes remedies for stress

"Stress is a malady which comes from a successful civilization—we have it too easy," said Joseph Lowman, visiting professor of psychology from the University of North Carolina, in a talk about stress last Thursday night in Driscoll Lounge.

His talk, which was sponsored by the Peer Health Counselors, outlined some causes of and remedies for stress.

Lowman called stress a natural reaction common to all higher animals, resulting from "a built-in system triggered by nerves, glands and hormones." He explained that the "flight or fight reaction," which causes stress, is an evolutionary remnant which we no longer need because of the cushy life our civilization affords.

"Stress is caused most commonly by the physical environment," added Lowman. He cited climate, pollution, pain and children as triggers of stress. He also said that overcrowding was a primary source of stress in some people.

Fear of goals

"An individual will more likely be stressed by an intimate friend than by a complete stranger," he continued. Family problems such as divorce and generation gap difficulties can be extremely devastating.

He said that many students fear graduation and the prospects of finding a job in the real world. Rigid deadlines and strict schedules create stress for those still concerned with college life, he noted.

Recognizing stress in others is critical, Lowman said. Symptoms include sweating, upset stomach, rashes and sexual dysfunction.

Physical symptoms

"These symptoms are indicative of the body's reaction to stress and cannot be stopped," said Lowman. "The physical manifestation of stress is a dangerous sign, because it means that the individual is under severe stress."

GEEK OF THE WEEK

Awarded weekly to the Williams student who forsakes all else* in search of the scholarly ideal

This week's Geek is ALEX MUROMCEW, a freshman. "A freshman where?" you ask. No one really knows, but he was in the libes attacking a chem assignment Sat. night. Said Alex: "I blew off half the classes. I don't know why I took the course. I'm about to go out and rage." Rage? Uh-huh. For his "dedication" to his studies, Lite honors Alex.

the ice and deposit the rubber behind the netminder?

Blessed with growing up in the land of "pahk the cah", hockey has always meant to me the Bruins. The Beauty. Games played with the beauty of a parking space near the Garden. So my dreams were of the same grace. I had never even seen the chance for a dream to come true. So with three-quarters of this dream already reality, I assumed, dreams being what they are, that the rest would follow. Like most assumptions, this one simply increased the impact of the fall.

It was my first breakaway, ever. Big and tall, I was channelled to football and basketball before it was my decision to make. Street and occasional pond hockey merely plied my urge, until IM puck rose up in college to satisfy it. My first game, my first break to the net. My first humiliation on ice.

Better luck next time

But my next breakaway was a triumph. Once again cruising in with the puck, this time accompanied by a teammate and opposed by a foe, I chose the perfect moment and, to everyone's shock, fell on my face. But not for naught. The defenseman chuckled at my predicament and failed to notice the puck, which had listlessly abandoned me in my moment of distress, float to my teammate, who sizzled it past the distracted goalie (snickering) for a score. All is not lost when one gets to laugh last.

Since that premier evening, I have learned to accept my position as a one man Ice Folly. With the dismemberment of Junior Varsity hockey last year, IM became the showcase of the I-could-be-varsity players and a deathtrap for clunkers like myself. Most of my friends and foes have played organized hockey either in college or high school. The difference between them and me was plain from the start.

Canary-colored skates

Not even on the ice, I was an outcast because of my canary-colored skates. An undeniable throwback to my hockey skates. An undeniable throwback to my hockey Orr-Igins, my black and yellow Rally Bobby Orr signature model skates are a tribute to Boston Pee Wee hockey, something I cannot claim to be.

They are the only skates I've ever owned. Before them were hand-me-downs from my big brother Dave, and these have lasted me since I got them at about age fourteen. Both teams noticed my adornment and derision chilled the ice. My performance did little to change the situation. Placed in my role and accepted there, I go on.

Forgiving audience

Unflappable, although not particularly unflippable, I thrive on these weekly encounters with humility. They are not the outlet of my athletic drive; college football and heavy-weight crew do me for that. Hockey is my realm to try and fall and try again, never disappointed, always buoyed by my latest accomplishment and the anticipation of the next.

Hard-headed competitiveness has left a hole in me which only sheer fun can mend. With only myself to please, I have discovered an audience which is considerably more forgiving than any other I've ever battled to satisfy.

Now I have a few goals under my belt and my teammates even pass the puck to me sometimes. Pretty soon I'll stop missing the passes, then who knows what will happen. The possibilities are endless, the enjoyment pure. I'm a puck, and always will be pure.

Volleyball takes opener

The men's volleyball squad opened its season with a 15-10, 15-13, 15-10 victory over Little Three rival Wesleyan on Saturday.

"We simply overpowered them," said senior Paul Sabab. "Wesleyan plays gutsy ball, but our ability to take the offense was too much for them to handle."

The team's starting six, seniors Sabab, Bill Best and Bob Acasabas, juniors Vince Brandstein and Steve Brewster and freshman Chris Clary, all turned in steady performances, successfully blunting Wesleyan's sporadic attempts to spike past Williams' blockers. Reserves Mark Koenig, John Day and Marc Hummon were also impressive.

Brandstein was particularly impressive, setting superbly and putting away seven blocks. He also crushed two consecutive spikes at 13-13 in the second game to blow the match wide open at 2-0.

The team next sees action this Saturday at Amherst where they will attempt to win their third consecutive Little Three Title.

Squash your opponents

by Mark Averitt

Their record is only 5-4, their number one player has lost more matches than she's won—yet the Williams College women's squash team is among the six best teams in the country.

"The records are deceiving," reports fifth year Coach Renzie Lamb, whose squash squads have never finished lower than sixth in the season-ending national rankings, "because we're playing the very best teams in the country." Indeed, the Ephs have been defeated once each by Harvard, Yale, and Princeton, generally agreed upon to be the three top college teams in America. Williams looks forward to the chance to compete with the best once again in the Howe Cup competition on February 10, 11, and 12 at Yale. The winner of the top division (which will include Penn, Trinity, and Dartmouth as well as the Ephs and the "Big Three") will be crowned national champion.

Williams began its drive towards the Howe Cup by losing to Harvard on January 9 by a 7-0 score. The Ephs were indeed outclassed by a better-prepared team that day but they rebounded on the road to nudge Dartmouth, 4-3, in the match that Lamb considers "the most impressive victory of the season." Cassie Fisher, the Ephs' number two and sometimes number three player, shone brightly in Hanover at the team's only away meet all season by pulling out a five game victory to save the match. Next Williams destroyed Middlebury (7-0) and Hamilton (6-1).

Yale was the next opponent for Lamb's crew and although captain and number one player Barbara Riefler took her match down to the wire, the women lost to their top-notch adversaries. On January 28, Penn also took the Ephs' measure by a 6-1 score. Number two player Hilary Thomas was the lone winner.

Little experience

Thomas, one of two sophomores on the team which is numerically dominated by four seniors, has recently been moved to the number three position. She, Riefler and Fisher are the only Ephs who had any prior competitive squash experience before entering college, and indication to Lamb that Williams has an "amazing program."

Williams took on Tufts and Princeton the next day and although they beat the former by a 7-0 score, the Tigers whipped them, 6-1. The loss continued Williams' bad luck against Princeton, which is the only school besides Yale that the Ephs have never beaten in Lamb's tenure.

After an exhibition match against a talented group of alumni (which Williams' varsity lost by a 4-3 score), the Ephs creamed Vassar 7-0. Fisher and Thomas improved their records to 5-4 with victories.

A distinct pattern emerges from a glance at the Williams women's squash season results: the Ephs can beat most of their competition without really breaking a sweat, but they don't seem to be able to compete with the "Big Three." Does this concern Coach Lamb as his team practices for the Howe Cup?

"I think that we have the capability to beat those teams," he says, "but they are stronger at the bottom of the lineup than we are. Lisa Buckley (the number four player), Heidi Halleck (number five), Liz Cole (number six) and Amlina Mah-mood (number seven) have never been able to beat their opponents on the top teams, although it's important to remember that they had never played squash on a team before they came to Williams. And of course, playing seven matches in three days is very hard on a team's endurance."

The Howe Cup is hardly the final challenge for Williams. They are scheduled to play Trinity and Smith, as well as traditional rivals Amherst and Wesleyan, later in February. But right now all the Lamb can think about is a potential number one ranking, which is within the Ephs' reach if they can play an exceptional weekend of squash in New Haven.

Hockey falls flat

Men's:

The hockey team (3-14) lost twice again last week. Saturday, they lost at New England College 14-2, while Tuesday they lost at home to Army 10-2.

Bob Brownell and Scott Karamozyn scored the two goals Saturday. Rich Jackson '85 and Greg Pachus '84 scored the two goals Tuesday.

Dan Finn '84 and Steve Flaim '83 split the goalkeeping duties Saturday, while Flaim and freshman Marty Collins worked Wednesday's game.

New England was led by Jay, Joel and Jack Irving, while Army's Garry McAvoy scored four goals Wednesday.

The team plays Princeton at home Saturday at 4:00.

Women's:

The women's hockey team (2-4) lost to Wesleyan Saturday 8-7 in overtime.

The Cardinals jumped out to an early 4-1 lead, but Williams battled back to tie in the second period. Through the third period, Wesleyan would jump ahead, but the Ephwomen would tie it up.

The winning goal was scored with 31 seconds left in the overtime period.

The team was playing with only three defensemen, as Sue Schulze '85 was injured in the first period.

Despite the game, the battle of the fans was easily won by Williams, whose rowdy supporters out-shouted the opposition.

Ephman Paul Pomilla gains the upper hand on his Bantam opponent. (Lane)

Wrestlers squish Trinity

by Chris Clary

The Williams varsity wrestling squad raised its record above .500 for the first time this season as they downed a Trinity team featuring seven freshmen 27-16 on Saturday.

The Ephs held a slim 21-16 lead going into the final match of the day, Trinity needing only a pin to win, but heavyweight Gary Stosz '83 came through, pinning Bob Powell 5:42 into the match to secure the win for Williams.

Williams winners

Other victorious Ephs were junior Paul Pomilla, 7-0 over Pete Zimmerman, sophomore

Jeff May, who pinned Scott Gowell at 4:27, and tri-captains John Donovan, John Leahy and Chris Woodworth, who all won close minor decisions.

The star of this year's team has been May, a local boy who wrestled for Drury High School, and placed third in the New England Championships last year as a freshman. So far this season he is 10-1, with his only loss coming at the hands of Albany State's Div. III All-American, Andy Seras.

Williams is now 6-5 with its final regular season action coming this Saturday at the Little Three Championships in Amherst.

Skiers frolic at UVM carnival

Women and men triumph in Vermont

The Women's Nordic team skied to their best finish all season last weekend at UVM, with Ellen Chandler '83 placing second, ahead of several U.S. Ski Team members, and Sarah Bates '85 and Karla Miller '85 placing 13th and 14th respectively. Chandler is having her best season and seems to be skiing stronger every weekend. The relay was a little bit less successful but far from mediocre—placing fifth.

Heidi Knight '86 once again led the alpine team in both the giant slalom and slalom, finishing second and third in those events. Betsy Paine '85 was the number two scorer in Friday's race in 20th place followed by Kate Knopp '85 in 21st.

Scorers shuffled a bit in Saturday's slalom with Knopp finishing a good race in eighth place and freshman Mary Keller, soon to retire her alpine skis for "skinny skis" as she joins the Nordic team this week, finishing third for Williams. Both teams are gaining momentum and are training to peak for their performance at the Williams Carnival.

There was much handsome skiing this past weekend during Vermont's Winter Carnival as the men put in their finest performance of the year to place sixth, only two points out of a tie for fourth.

The alpine team were the stars of the weekend, finishing in second place.

The team took control in the giant slalom on Friday. Captain Crawford Lyons '84 took third, John Pier '85 was seventh, Tim Hill '86 ninth, Tuck Collins '83 13th and Chris Eagan was 19th.

Saturday, the downhillers continued the trend. Lyons took second in the slalom, making him the second-ranked slalom skier in the East. Pier took eighth and Hill was 15th.

Alpine Coach Ed Grees commented, "I'm too pleased for words. It was a pleasure indeed."

Saturday's third-place finish, coupled Horrific downhillers

The men's Nordic team, also skiing at Stowe, continued upon their plan of tenacious development and maturation. They were forced to deal with and overcome such terrifying obstacles as loose puddles of water on the course, rocks littering the horrific downhillers and next to no snow.

The team skied a tight race, taking 31st through 35th with Steve Johansen in the lead. The continued improvement of freshmen Morten Moehs, Chuck Mahoney and Fred Eaton was a pleasure to watch as they did battle with the course.

Ballyhooping in the snow

Unfortunately, the efforts of the Nordic team were not enough to catapult the team into fourth in the overall standings. St. Lawrence and New Hampshire tied in fourth, two points ahead of the Ephmen, while UVM won the race.

Next week's carnival is at Dartmouth, where there will be much ballyhooping in the snow and the pursuit of dynamic skiing.

Hoopsters nail Wesleyan to bring streak to six

Face Amherst to continue Little Three battle

by John Clayton

Saturday's 67-58 win over rival Wesleyan made it six in a row for the basketball team (8-6), as they also beat Brandeis earlier in the week.

On Saturday, Art Pidorianno '84 once again led Williams in scoring with 22 points, and co-captain Scott Olesen '83 had 21. Dave Krupski '84 added nine.

The Ephmen were down by three at the half, but scored the first three buckets of the second half to gain a lead they would never lose.

The lead was as great as 10 with 2:30 left, but Wesleyan was able to cut it down to three with 24 seconds left. At that point, Pidorianno hit the front end of a one-and-one, and rebounded the missed second shot for a lay-up to secure the win.

Defense confusing

"The game was much closer than the score indicated," said Head Coach Curt Tong. "They confused us in the first half by mixing up their defenses. Not only would they switch from man-to-man to zone different times down the court, but they would also switch from a box-and-one to a triangle-and-two, and switch in the middle of a play."

"At halftime," said Tong, "we decided to run our offense and not pay attention to what sort of defense they were in. It worked."

Bounce Brandeis

At Brandeis on Tuesday, senior forward Andy Goodwin hit a three-point play with 2:33 left to clinch the win.

Pidorianno once again led Williams with 18 points while Goodwin had 11, Olesen nine, and Dave Krupski '84 and Tim Walsh '86 eight each.

Tuesday also marked the return to action of co-captain Steve O'Day, who had been out all year with a knee (not an ankle) injury. O'Day scored four points on Tuesday and also saw action Saturday.

About the streak

About the winning streak, Tong said, "Basketball is built on timing. There is an intangible gel—something you can't put your finger on, but you know when it happens. You know that team is there."

"Actually, Tong continued, "we clicked before the victories. Our trip to Cuba was instrumental in establishing the gel—when we were down there everyone got a chance to play, and we found out what the lineups would be."

Tong said the team clicked together during a three-game road trip they had in mid-January. Although they lost all three games (to Dartmouth, Springfield, and Trinity), things fell into place, and they could play with confidence when they got home.

December problems

Although finals always make December tough for sports teams, this year had extra problems for the Ephmen. They had to adjust to a new team style without O'Day, and they had no scrimmages before the season.

The New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) allows only 24 games per season. With a 21-game season and three in Cuba, Williams could not schedule preseason scrimmages.

Little Three

Wesleyan (3-12) has already lost to Amherst and thus does not have realistic hopes of a Little Three title. Amherst is 7-5 this year, and although they are not as good up front as last year, they are still a balanced team.

"A Little Three title is very possible," said Tong. "It's definitely what we're shooting for."

The team plays W.P.I. tomorrow night at 8:00 in Lasell, then travels to Amherst Saturday.

After the Ephs beat Fitchburg State 72-55 for their tenth win without a defeat, this Fitchburg pole vaulter threw himself from the rafters and impaled himself on the pole. (Glick)

Upset keeps track unbeaten

by Mark Averitt

The winter track team is now 10-0 following its third upset of the season Saturday, over Fitchburg, Worcester, and Westfield State Colleges.

Saturday's win was remarkable because the Ephmen were without the services of star distance man Bo Parker, who was resting for a meet at Harvard for the Greater Boston Track Club Sunday.

With the match tied at 55 between Fitchburg State and Williams, juniors Bennett York and Brian Angle ran uncontested in the 1000 meter run, and Dan Riley '83 and John Nelson '84 finished one-two in the two mile.

These 17 points carried the Ephs to the 72-55 victory over Fitchburg, while Westfield had 18 points and Worcester gained five.

Williams winners

Undefeated Paul Toland '85

won the high jump, and Tomas Alejandro '83 won the 440 run and the sixty-yard dash (which he has not lost all year).

Other winners were Ted Leon '84 in the 600 yard run and Angle in the mile.

Work horses

Coach Dick Farley said, "I've had more talented teams in the past, but this group just doesn't seem to want to lose. We may not have a lot of guys who will qualify for the top individual races (like the IC4A Championships later this month), but we have the workhorses who can pick up second and third place points and win meets for us."

Williams faces arch-rivals Amherst, Wesleyan and Trinity at 1:00 Saturday at home. Their goal is an undefeated season and a high ranking as they enter the Division III Championships the next weekend at the Coast Guard Academy.

Puck

Blaze of glory

by Dan Keating

I stalk furtively. My prey flits in ricochet as I glide closer. Drawn to this black prize, I await my moment. Walt. Glide. Stabbing with the stick, I pluck it from the crowd and turn up the ice. The goaltender is now my quarry, the puck my weapon.

Challenged, the goalie hunches on his hind legs, peering unseen through his impenetrable mask. The air stiffens as if frozen with tension while the blue, then red, then blue lines give way. I face the test of one on one, man vs. goaltender, do or die.

Rising to the challenge, moving like a cat on ice, at the critical moment of decision and action, I fall directly on my face. The puck limps aimlessly to the corner with my belly skirting the ice in docile pursuit. Of course—cats can't move on ice.

The crowd titters, both of them. For this is Intramural hockey (better known as IM puck, an acronym which always struck me as "I'm a puck"). My chagrin is tempered because most of our opponents don't know me. Unfortunately, most of my teammates won't admit that they do.

No dream come true

My icequatic belly-flop was the ornery gnat foreclosing on my dream. How many childhood hours were spent watching Orr, Esposito, and, yes, even Cashman saunter coolly over

Parker breaks record

Junior Bo Parker broke the school record in the mile at the Greater Boston Track Club race held at Harvard Sunday.

Parker ran the mile in a 4:09.6, doing the last quarter in 60.6. His efforts qualified him for the Division I New England and the IC4A competition later this month.

Head track coach Dick Farley said, "I was amazed. I wasn't shocked—I know he's good—but he had very limited training for this race. It was basically background strength."

Parker's time also would have qualified him for the outdoor Nationals this spring, but those times must come from metric races. However, Farley said Parker should have no trouble duplicating Sunday's effort on a metric course in the future.

'Amazing' relay team spurs swimmers

by Andrew Garfield

In the last home meets of the year, the men's and women's swim teams overpowered Springfield for their seventh consecutive victories. The men won convincingly 86-25 while the women barely edged the vocal Springfield women 78-71.

Rob Sommer '84 led the Ephmen, winning the 200 IM (2:00.1) and the 200 back (2:01.0). Sommer qualified for the nationals in the 200 IM as did

Bill Couch '86 in his 200 fly victory (1:59.1).

Seniors Rob Bowman and Jim Stockton also had two victories apiece. Bowman won the 1000 free (10:11.4) and the 500 free (4:55.0), and Stockton won both the required and optional diving events. The 400 Free Relay team of Jeff Mills '84, Mark Weeks '83, Sommer, and Will Andrew '86 broke a four-year-old pool record with an amazing time of 3:14.0.

Other winners included Weeks in the 50 free (22.3), Andrew in the 100 free (48.07), Rob Kirkpatrick '85 in the 200 breast (2:17.7), and the 400 Medley Relay team of Couch, Kirkpatrick, Andrew and Dom Kulik '86 (3:47.3).

Psyche-up

Before the women's meet began, the Springfield team engaged in a lengthy series of "psyche-up" chants designed to intimidate the Ephwomen. Although Williams responded with their own lyrics, it was ultimately their swimming abilities which quieted the Springfield women.

Led by co-captain Liz Jex '83, who had three victories, the women splashed to a close but sound win. Victory was never in question after the early stages of the meet.

Jex won the 100 IM (1:02.8), the 50 free (25.6) and the 100 fly (1:02.7). Kim Eckrich '85 and Kathy Kirmayer '86 each had two wins: Eckrich in the 200 breast (2:31.0) and the 100 breast (1:09.9); Kirmayer in the 100 back (1:04.5) and the 200 back (2:20.3).

Katie Hudner '83 won the 100 free (55.7), Dina Esposito '83 won the required diving event and Colleen Murphy '86 won the 50 back (32.12). The team of Hudner, Eckrich, Kirmayer and Ann Tuttle '83 won the 200 Medley Relay (1:56.4).

Junior Rob Sommer plows his way through the water in the breast stroke leg of the 200 IM in Saturday's meet against Springfield. Sommer swam a season-best time in the event.

(Lockwood)

Kim Eckrich '85 finishes the last lap of the 200 breaststroke in the women's swim team's victory over Springfield. Eckrich and teammate Kathy Kirmayer '86 were double winners Saturday.

Controversies spark faculty meeting

by Jeff Brainard and Jon Tigar

The faculty was sharply divided over the question of whether the eleven phone calls made by the Deans to faculty, during the January hunger strike, could be seen as intimidating at its meeting last week. The faculty also debated whether or not the hunger strike was moral.

"Rumors of my powers have been greatly exaggerated," said Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. "I have some power, but it mostly lies in persuasion." O'Connor said the need to call faculty arose after a discussion he had with members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC). O'Connor said that he asked WAAC people how they presumed to have support to endanger the health of the strikers, and they responded by citing that a large number of faculty had visited them in Hopkins Hall. O'Connor also noted that WAAC's press kit mentioned that fifty faculty had signed a petition that supported its goals.

Grievance procedure

But the petition in question supported divestment, not a hunger strike per se, O'Connor said, and he feared that the faculty who signed were being deceived. "There was only one way to find out," he said, "and that was to call them and ask, 'did they know what use of their signatures was being made?'"

O'Connor added that the College has specific grievance procedures to which faculty members can resort if they wish to bring charges of intimidation or infringement of academic freedom.

"I wonder why it is so difficult for you to understand why some faculty members might consider the call intimidating?" asked political science professor Kurt Tauber. "I think it would be useful to enlarge upon your role, which is currently a confused perception, as an old friend and colleague as professor of philosophy on the one hand, and as Dean of the College on the other."

Moral courage

Dean Cris Roosenraad, who made five calls to faculty, explained that he "in no way interrogated any of the people called. All five are personal friends of mine. I volunteered no suggestions as to what those faculty should do," he said. Roosenraad said he has since talked to the five again, who said they did not feel intimidated. "It's hard to conceive how these calls could be seen as intimidating," he concluded.

Tauber suggested that he was not addressing the question of what reasons the Deans might have had for making the calls, but was merely stressing that the administration's goal should be "to bend over backwards to avoid giving the impression of intimidation. I agree it's highly subjective," he admitted, "but the important fact was that it was perceived that way."

Political science professor Gary Jacobson objected, saying that signing a petition is a political action for which the signers should be accountable. "How lacking in moral courage can one be, to sign and then in the face of a phone call to whine about intimidation?" he demanded.

The intimidation is present "a priori" in any such call, according to religion professor Nathan Katz, who helped organize the hunger strikers. He said at least half a dozen people he contacted said, "I would love to support the hunger strike" but did not because of feelings of intimidation. Taking a position not held by the administration is viewed by many members of the junior faculty, for realistic economic reasons, as dangerous," he explained.

"Smearing" claim

English professor John Reichert pointed out that O'Connor has "less to say about anyone's future than any senior faculty member of a junior faculty member's department."

Dean of the Faculty Francis

Oakley complained about the lack of evidence in the case.

"The officers of this institution properly are held accountable by this institution—that is due process," he said. "But no due process is open to an officer if no complaint is lodged . . . we are left with what in effect is a smearing of an officer."

But that there was a lot of fear of intimidation was proved by the calling of a faculty meeting to discuss the issue "so that people don't feel singled out," according to English professor David L. Smith. "The question here is not about trust but about the right to not feel set upon."

Federal law

Aid tied to draft registration

by Ned Ladd and Brett Green

Proof of draft registration or exemption is now required for all federal financial aid recipients, according to new federal legislation. The 1983 Defense Authorization Act, signed by President Reagan in September, directly affects students and administration.

A rider to the Defense Authorization Bill called the Solomon Amendment requires "the withholding of all Title IV federal financial aid funds from students who are required to register for the draft but have not yet done so."

The regulations regarding how to administer this amendment were proposed January 27 by the Education Department. They require that each student file a document with his college certifying his draft status, when applying for federal financial aid. Applicants will not be considered until they fill out the form and, if eligible, register for the draft.

The Williams Committee Against Militarism (WCAM) is protesting the regulations on the grounds that they are discriminatory. Spokesman Jeff Sultar called the law "totally discriminatory, as well as in violation of several other laws, such as the Privacy Act."

Unfair to the poor

Low income groups are hit hardest, according to WCAM coordinator David Yaskulka, because they must file for financial aid to afford college tuition. The law also discriminates against men and minorities, the group maintains.

Administration reaction to the law was Fraternities threatened at Trinity

by Tim Johnson

A Trinity College faculty committee has demanded the abolition of the school's five fraternities and two sororities. The seven-member Faculty Committee on the Fraternity and its alternatives concluded last November, after an intensive year and a half study, that "the fraternity system is inherently divisive and therefore damaging to the social egalitarianism that is the bedrock of democratic policy."

The Trinity Tripod, the college's student newspaper, termed the fraternity debate, which has scorched the Hartford, Ct., campus for more than a year, as "the biggest issue since the inception of . . . co-education over twelve years ago."

In late November, the college's faculty voted 69-33 in favor of the committee's resolution to phase out fraternities over the next three years and to suspend rushing and pledging practices forthwith. The fate of the fraternity system now lies in the hands of a seven-member trustee committee, which, in turn, is waiting for a recommendation from the college's president, James F. English.

The trustee committee is expected to reach a conclusion by April, according to David Winer, Trinity's dean of students. The trustees will treat both the president's recommendation and the faculty vote only as advisory opinions. "At this point, there is simply no indication one way or the other how the conflict will be resolved," commented Winer.

"The trustees still consider the issue a jump ball," admitted one of trustees, Kari S. Scheibe, a psychology professor at Wesleyan.

The faculty committee was formed in May 1981, in response to events that took place in

The Williams Record

A fairer price

The recent legislation linking federal financial aid to draft registration puts the college in a delicate position. Should the college pick up the difference in financial aid for those who stand to lose money because of this law?

Civil disobedience is an important right and an important means of effecting political change. It carries with it costs and penalties appropriately suited to violating the law. In this case, abridging the right to equal education regardless of economic status is not an appropriate penalty for evasion of draft registration.

The solution, however, cannot be subsidies from the college to students who have not registered for the draft. The inherent increase in tuition would make the problem worse. The penalty for disobedience would then be shifted to those who have elected to obey the law.

Some people argue that if the college does not make up the difference, civil disobedience will become a privilege of the rich. Many of the people paying the extra tuition are no more wealthy than those who did not. In fact, some people have registered or would register rather than risk their education. Would it be fair then for those people to pay the increased tuition?

And it should be noted that if this law is ruled Constitutional and remains on the books, and if Williams becomes known as a college which subsidizes in its entirety the violation of the law, then not only will future Williams students feel less inclined to register, but Williams may attract non-registrants. The resulting cost could be large.

There is an alternative which removes the threat of automatic loss of education and still places the weight of the penalty on those who opt for civil disobedience. The College can make loans available at commercial rates to those who would normally have federal financial aid in their package but cannot because of this law. Yale has already announced a similar policy.

This option would not cost the College anything because it could take the loans out and pass the cost along automatically. But it is important to offer these loans because banks are hesitant to make uninsured loans to college students.

Non-registrants would still bear the cost, without the threat of losing a Williams education.

Williams will not be advocating violation of the law because a penalty will still be incurred by the violators. But Williams will also be protecting the right to education regardless of political stance.

Faculty freedom

To the editor:

In view of the disturbing news reported by Dan Keating in the February 8 issue of the Record, and given the measure of confusion evident in some of the remarks he attributes to members of the faculty, I ask that you reprint in its entirety the following letter which the Faculty Steering Committee and the Committee on Appointments and Promotions wrote to the Record on April 28, 1978.

While that letter focuses specifically on the reappointment and promotion process, one of the crucial points it makes is certainly germane to the present discontents. Namely, that the College has long since established procedures to ensure that all officers of the College (whether administrators or tenured members of the faculty) be held accountable for any element of "improper consideration" they permit to influence faculty reappointment decisions. Such grievance procedures, however, can come into play only if would-be complainants believe they can indeed identify some concrete evidence of "improper consideration" and are also willing to do so, thereby permitting themselves to be held accountable by their peers for the accuracy of the allegations they choose to make. To refuse that willingness is, of course, to deny due process to those being placed under accusation—whether in the columns of the press or through the dissemination of damaging and demeaning rumor.

Francis Oakley
Dean of the Faculty

(Eds. note: The following letter was signed by Gary Jacobsohn and Francis Oakley for the above-named Committees.)

To the editor:

In a letter appearing in the April 25 issue of the Record, Augustin J. Hinkson '80 gave voice to the fear that "the administration" may have "subtly threatened the reappointment of junior faculty members because they support the movement for the withdrawal of U.S. corporate involvement in South Africa."

It was with the deepest concern that we read those words. It is in the hope of putting to rest the fear they express that we make this response. Academic freedom, as the American Association of University Professors' (AAUP) 1940 Statement of Principles indicates, extends not only to what is said in the classroom but also to "extramural utterances." Williams College is fully committed to the protection of that freedom. Any allegation that it was being infringed would call into question the very integrity of our whole educational enterprise. Such allegations, therefore, ought not lightly to be made; nor, once made, can they lightly be dismissed. Because of this we have had in place for some years a formal set of procedures available to any faculty member who believes that considerations violative of academic freedom played a role in his or her reappointment or promotion decision. The intrusion of such factors would constitute "improper consideration" and the evidence that such improper consideration had occurred would be weighed by a formally constituted panel composed of David was my baby. It was kind of funny because he was 32 and I was 16, but he never complained. We spent one summer together and a good part of the next.

During our first summer we were inseparable. He was the troublemaker and I was the troublemaker—takercareof, so we were a natural pair. He behaved for me, because all he had ever wanted was attention. When happy he'd laugh and laugh, never a belly laugh or a guffaw, just a titling he-he-he while staring me in the eye and clucking my name (at least I thought so) and leering with his crooked teeth and slanted jaw. I just wanted to hug him tight.

Most people thought David was unbearable, a cur whose only purpose was to be wretched, but soon I knew better. I didn't value David simply because he was retarded and thus "special". I loved him when I found the unique, beautiful qualities which made him loveable.

When you love someone like David you can't help but put yourself in his position. Is his happiness worth his misery?

Would he be better off if he had none of the happiness and none of the misery? Alive or dead? I spent hours with him, holding him, looking into his eyes when he laughed and cried. And I couldn't decide.

My reaching him and making him happy proved to me that the value of someone's life can't be judged from a distance. You have to be up close to see what's inside.

One day I worked with a profoundly retarded, physically deformed resident whom I felt was beyond the limit of someone I would consider better off never alive. Then the woman who works regularly with that resident came in, picked her up, and said, "Don't you love my baby? She's being a good girl today." I repeated to myself that I'd better get up close before I judge a life next time.

But many people feel no obligation to get close before making a judgment like that. The newspapers have stories about severely handicapped babies whose parents ask that the child be killed immediately after birth. Or, being sanctimonious, they just "let it die", saying they let it fend for itself (as if any baby left alone would not die). This happens despite the known presence of people who have pledged their lives to adopting and caring for these "special" children.

An article in the November 11, 1981 New York Times pointed out that Down's Syndrome, a chromosomal disorder detectable through amniocentesis, "many times results in severe retardation."

A baby must now be judged fit and worthy of living in order to have that opportunity.

It also said that "parents... 'inevitably' choose termination of pregnancy" when Down's Syndrome is detected.

Many of these kids may be severely retarded. Many may not. Even for those who are retarded, who can say that they would be better off dead?

A baby must now be judged fit and worthy of living in order to have that opportunity. These "terminations" started with aborting fetuses whom people claim aren't alive yet; they now involve selecting at birth which babies deserve to live. This trend would not be so frightening if history had not shown how poor our judgment is in deciding who deserves to live and who does not.

This civilization considered blacks sub-human animals for hundreds of years, genocidally exterminated six million Jews while most of the world looked on, and, after deploying the atomic bomb on helpless, unarmed, unwarmed civilians—did it again just to drive the point home.

I've seen retarded people whom I've thought would be better off dead. But who am I to decide? Do you trust me? I don't trust you. Are you going to trust the society that burned women as witches, set people on fire for not being Christian, and used cluster bombs?

These developments worry me especially with the children whose handicaps aren't noticed before birth. What guidelines do we have for deciding which babies can be terminated and which cannot? What guidelines will there be for how long after birth parents still have the right to decide that their child does not deserve to live? One day? Two weeks? Three years?

I don't think that ruthless, baby-killing parents exist. But the standards our society is erecting may undeservingly put many lives into the "no value" range. Will we eventually believe that all retarded children are not fit to live? "It's really in their best interest," people will say.

Will the people who've seen the happiness and productivity that many retarded people enjoy speak up to defend those lives as worthy? You have to be with a profoundly retarded person when he learns something or begins laughing—which even the profound sometimes do—before you can decide that all people in his condition do not deserve to live.

Then, how retarded will retarded be—profound, severe, moderate, mild, a bit slow? Where will life-judging stop?

Is his happiness worth his misery? Would he be better off if he had none of the happiness and none of the misery? Alive or dead? I spent hours with him, holding him, looking into his eyes while he laughed and cried. And I couldn't decide.

You have to be up close to see what's inside.

The straight story on the trustees

by Geoff Mamlet

"The Trustees have never shown any reticence in the past in discussing these questions quite openly," said President Chandler at last Wednesday's Faculty Meeting. With these words he tried to rewrite the entire history of the South Africa debate at Williams. It is because I believe history should not be revised but preserved that I write this column. It is not an exercise in triviality; one must know where we have been in order to see how far we have progressed in this debate—and how much farther we have to go.

Although the College community had, since 1977, been actively discussing the propriety of investment in South Africa, it was not until the end of 1979 that the Trustee Finance Committee first met with the Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) to address the issue. Since then, WAAC has met with the Finance Committee every year. This spring Williams shall witness another "first": for the first time, the Trustees will publicly defend their anti-divestiture stance. Contrary to President Chandler's statement and to similar assertions made by Dean O'Connor later in the Faculty Meeting, the Trustees have never before agreed to a public meeting. WAAC's policy, however, has always been that this issue should be addressed by the Trustees in public forums. In fact, WAAC has felt so strongly that the whole campus should hear these discussions that WAAC has twice, on its own initiative, turned closed meetings into public meetings by inviting students and faculty to attend and hear both sides present their arguments. The first occasion was in April 1980, when 60 students and faculty listened to a WAAC-Trustee exchange; the second was last month, when over 150 people listened to a limited and cur-

Mr. Mott broke his commitment . . . without explanation.

discussion of the issues. By way of historical note, it should be added that the Chairman of the Finance Committee, Charles Mott, did agree to participate in a public forum on the costs of divestiture. That promise was made in WAAC's meeting with the Finance Committee in January 1982. However, when WAAC later tried to set up a panel discussion with investment experts who could present a strong case for the negligible cost of divestiture, Mr. Mott broke his commitment to participate without explanation.

So how should we interpret the history of the Trustees' participation in the South Africa debate? The Administration would have us believe that the Trustees are reasonable people who have always been willing to discuss the issues openly and publicly—people who feel the need to educate a Williams public which has been sadly misinformed and misled on the issues. I interpret this history very differently. In the past, the Trustees have always been reluctant to discuss the issues openly and publicly; a closed meeting is their preferred method for sheltering their views from public scrutiny.

The about-face they have performed is most welcome and we can draw two lessons from it. First, the Trustees do care about public opinion; second they are feeling the heat of that opinion right now. The Williams community, including the Trustees, has come a long way in its discussion of South African investments since the question was first raised here in 1977; all of us, especially the Trustees, have a long way to go.

elected faculty members, non-tenured as well as tenured, who had had no part in the original decision but who would have full access to all information used in arriving at that decision.

Such procedures, modeled upon the AAUP's 1972 Recommended Institutional Regulations on Academic Freedom and Tenure, affirmed by the faculty and approved by the Board of Trustees, are designed to prevent any erosion here at Williams of that commitment to academic freedom which, in the country at large, has been one of the hard-won achievements of the American academic community. That no one is the past has found it necessary to invoke those procedures protecting academic freedom should not lead us in the present to forget that they do in fact exist.

Bad journalism

To the editor:

I think a lot of us who know and respect Dan O'Connor and Cris Roosenraad had a difficult time matching the image of arm-twisting that emerged from Dan Keating's story, "Faculty distressed over iniquities," with what we know about the two men.

It was interesting to me that phone calls were made to faculty members who had signed the first WAAC divestment petition. And I was as concerned as anybody else that the rumor mill had swung into action about the nature of those calls. A story in the Record could have cleared the air. But instead it muddled it.

Mr. Keating got off to a good start doing a wide range of interviews, but he fell into a trap in his excessive reliance on anonymous sources. He had people on the record describing the nature of the calls as "an opportunity to share some ideas with the Dean," and "perfectly sensible." Beyond that, he had the people who made the calls describing them in exactly the same way. Yet he chose to build the story around anonymous people who chose to describe those calls in the most sinister possible way. It's good controversy but bad journalism.

From my point of view, there is absolutely no reason to believe that Deans O'Connor and Roosenraad were doing anything more than trying to give and receive good information by turning to their colleagues. I think they showed tremendous strength under the pressure of three students saying they were willing to starve to death and a WAAC media committee calling every news outlet they could find to spread the word.

Dan and Cris deserve our thanks, not a blind-side attack by anonymous sources.

Record's dubious opinions

To the editor:

The latest editorial in the Record managed to continue the string of dubious opinions and reporting concerning WAAC and the hunger strike which, unfortunately, has graced its pages for many weeks.

While the editorial's criticism of the Deans for making ostensibly informational phone calls to faculty signatories to the divestment petition is justified, it misses the point. The point is not whether the Deans themselves should have made the calls, but rather the shaky premise on which the calls were based—namely, that WAAC regarded faculty support for divestment to be support for the hunger strike as well. The Record seems to accept this rationale, even though doing so requires an extraordinary leap of logic: from indicating that "some evidence" exists that WAAC misused this petition, the Record declares that WAAC "clearly misrepresented" these faculty. The editorial offers no substantive support for this charge.

There is good reason for that—the fact is that WAAC did not misuse the faculty divestment petition. Certainly we publicized that support, but as agreement with our goals, not our tactics. If we were indeed wrongly using those 53 faculty, then why would our Faculty Support Committee start—from scratch—a petition specifically in support of the strike? The Record's apparent eagerness to portray WAAC as dishonest and manipulative is more than a little incongruous in light of its stated support for divestment.

A couple of comments are also in order regarding Professor Jacobsohn's petition opposing the strike. First, WAAC did not solicit faculty signatures for our faculty support petition; that was the project of the Faculty Support Committee. Furthermore, only about 50 faculty members were asked to sign, of whom 36 did so. Second, it is indisputable that a

While onlookers concentrate on the score, crew captain Scott Schweighauser sprints to the finish of his 15-minute piece which began the 36-hour ergathon in Baxter Lounge. (Scheibe)

Crew rows to raise money

Coach Peter Wells estimates that the crew teams raised $2000-$3000 in last weekend's Ergathon. The money will go to supporting the crew's trip to Washington in March for their Spring training.

The Erg totals surpassed last year's by 30,000 points, said Wells. Scott Schweighauser '83 got 10,076 points to lead the men, and is only the second Ephman ever to break 10,000 on the Erg machine. Hope Bigelow '84 led the women with 9035 points. The novice teams also contributed consistent performances.

The sponsorship of local businesses was a key factor in raising the money.

Dewey explains book prices

In response to several complaints about book prices at The Williams Bookstore, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor issued a statement regarding bookstore policy last Thursday. He explained that "the understanding between the College and Mr. Dewey (Williams Bookstore owner) is that textbooks will be priced at no more than 27 percent over the invoice price."

He said that there is an ad hoc Users Committee which oversees bookstore prices, and that students can direct gripes to it through him. However, he cautioned students from complaining, saying that Dewey's prices are "at the low end of the national norms for college bookstores."

Dewey explained that steadily rising wholesale prices have forced his prices up. He explained that materials prices have not gone up significantly, but that delivery prices have skyrocketed.

Copying entire texts

He suggested that faculty could keep prices down by considering costs when choosing texts. Many of the standard textbooks cannot be replaced, Dewey explained, but supplementary texts can be chosen using cost-based guidelines.

Many faculty members have made use of copying to reduce book costs. Many courses use only parts of books, so professors copy these materials and distribute them to the class. Some professors have gone further. Physics 202 uses a completely copied textbook. As a result, the book cost for this course has been reduced to $5.50.

CUL discusses housing lottery, French house

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) reviewed the recent town meeting on housing and the status of the French House planned for next year at their meeting last Tuesday.

CUL chairman Cris Roosenraad, a main speaker at the town meeting, noted that the meeting had focused on the Pomilla (prioritized lottery) proposal and the status of the Housing Committee.

Roosenraad said that he came away from the meeting with the impression that "if we end up adopting something that looks like the Pomilla proposal, that will be seen favorably."

While he emphasized the advantages of the current structure with the Housing Committee under the CUL, Roosenraad said it would be "foolish to hold on to the Housing Committee if it becomes a sore point politically."

Roosenraad also stated that the town meeting was "shallow," adding that he had had much better discussions with those interested in the situation in the past.

Commenting on the restrictions of the format, he said "It would be awfully nice if we could share a microphone sometime." The CUL met with the College Council to discuss Housing Issues on Tuesday February 15.

The committee also discussed the French House which is being planned as a co-op for next year. In spite of considerable pressure for the establishment of a French House, only eleven applications were received for the House, only three of which were received prior to the deadline. Tentative discussions were held to determine at what number it would become necessary to cancel the House.

Psychology Prof traces study of the brain

A three-pound mass of soft, grey jelly, about as large as an oversized walnut, is the seat of all of our movements, emotions, desires, and sensations, according to Paul Solomon, assistant professor of psychology. In his lecture "Memory and the Brain" last Thursday, Solomon called the brain basic to any behavior—"from a knee jerk to the creation of a poem."

The brain is composed of approximately three to four billion cells called neurons. The number of connections between neurons is thought to be greater than the total number of atoms in the universe.

Solomon noted that the study of the brain has not always enjoyed the sophistication of the scientific method. In the 1860's Franz Gall advocated phrenology—the study of bumps on the skull in order to determine personality and behavior.

Even with the advent of the scientific approach, psychologists discovered the correlation between the brain and memory quite accidentally. During an operation to limit a patient's epileptic seizures doctors removed a portion of his temporal lobes and, inadvertently, a portion of his hippocampus.

The patient, H.M., was cured of his epilepsy but lost all ability to learn new information. He had to be re-introduced to people he had just met twenty minutes ago, and could read the same magazine again and again, each time with the same novel interest. H. M. described his own life as "always waking from a dream and never knowing what just happened."

Solomon and several psychology students are presently using stereotaxic surgery, the implantation of electrodes in the brain, to record the neural activity of learning. An electrode is planted in the hippocampus of a deeply-anesthetized rabbit, who is then conditioned to blink at the sound of a tone followed by an air puff.

Research has noted a fifteen-fold increase in neural activity during the rabbit's learning period, thus indicating a role of the hippocampus in learning.

Solomon asserted that for every question researchers have answered, ten more are yet unsolved. Nevertheless,

Solomon finds the work "exciting, intriguing, and fun." Like Woody Allen, he claims, "The brain is my second favorite organ."

Need for Black colleges addressed

Black colleges are instrumental in providing a "congenial psycho-social environment" for blacks, according to Clark University vice-president Gloria Scott. Scott spoke at Wednesday night's lecture, sponsored by the Black Student Union.

Scott explained that "Black colleges were created in response to the exclusion and neglect of blacks in white schools." She spoke of the history of black higher education as a struggle for access into white institutions. A landmark in black history, she said, was the establishment of land grant colleges for blacks in southern states in the 1890's.

Black colleges have a multi-fold purpose in a modern society, according to Scott. She stated black colleges provide a "resource for political awareness as well as a high quality education." They become the center for Civil Rights and other black issues, Scott said.

In addition, black faculty provide "credible models for emulation." Scott said that "Black colleges give blacks real insurance against the death of access to white institutions."

New Security Supervisor hired

Charles W. Smlarowski took office as Security Supervisor last Monday. He has been for the past six years Chief of Police in Sunderland, Massachusetts.

During that period, Smlarowski was involved in several controversies relating to his job as Police Chief. In his 1981 annual report to the town, he blamed a series of house break-ins on "a band of 15-20 Puerto Ricans from the Holyoke area."

"In retrospect I see very clearly that it was unnecessary to include any mention of ethnic identification in my public report," he said.

When he was hired, he was Sunderland's only full-time policeman. In his six years, he developed a force with two full-time and seven part-time officers. The Springfield Morning Union said of his efforts in Sunderland; "Smlarowski is generally credited with bringing the town into the 20th century as far as police coverage is concerned in a town that formerly had only part-time officers."

Ransom H. Jenks, Director of Security, said that the promotion was not made from within the ranks of the College Security force because minimum qualifications were set by the Deans' Office, the Office of Personnel, and Jenks, and no one at Williams could meet them.

Newly appointed Security Supervisor Charles W. Smlarowski (Pionsker)

Scientific equipment fund established

Williams has received a $100,000 grant from the W. M. Keck Foundation of Los Angeles to establish a permanent fund for scientific equipment. The grant is the first step in raising $1 million in endowment for scientific equipment.

According to Russell F. Carpenter, associate director of development, the endowment, when fully established, will provide about $50,000 in annual income for maintaining and upgrading equipment in the science laboratories and classrooms.

In the last decade, the college's budget has been hard pressed to meet needs brought about by the tremendous growth in scientific knowledge and advances in equipment. The Bronfman Science Center in particular, which was completed in 1968, still has much of its original equipment which now needs to be modernized or replaced.

Indicative of the growth in the sciences in the last ten years, the number of students taking science courses at Williams has increased by 90 percent while the number of science faculty is up by 35 percent.

College provost and professor of chemistry J. Hodge Markgraf believes that the new endowment will "benefit current students and faculty while helping to attract promising young science faculty and future undergraduates."

History Prof to study in Russia

William Wagner, assistant professor of history, has been awarded three fellowships for research in Russia and the United States during the 1983-84 academic year.

He has received a Fellowship for College Teachers from the National Endowment for the Humanities, a Faculty Exchange Fellowship from the International Research and Exchanges Board and a Fellowship for Recent Recipients of the Ph.D. from the American Council of Learned Societies. He was also given a Special Assistant Professor Leave from Williams.

Wagner plans to use the grants for work on his project, "The Courts as an Instrument of Progressive Reform in Post-Emancipation Russia: Property, Inheritance, Women, and the Family."

He will spend the fall and early winter in Russia, mainly in Leningrad and Moscow, and will complete his research at the Russian Research Center at Harvard University when he returns from the Soviet Union in January 1984.

Wagner said his study "represents the first systematic analysis of the reformed courts' impact on social and economic relationships," in particular the ways the courts used their power to pursue social reform and economic development in 19th century Russia. Wagner's conclusions will be published in the "Oxford Monographs" series.

Coops offer independence, responsibility 69 students enjoy alternative lifestyle

by Vernon Squires

Some students claim that Dodd House serves the best meals on campus.

Others support Driscoll or Greylock. For at least sixty-nine people, however, it makes no difference. No, these students are not just indifferent. They are the residents of the college's seven cooperative houses, where meals are planned and cooked by the students themselves.

From the seven member Lambert and Milham member to the 13 member Dewey and Doughty residences, "coops" offer students a chance for an alternative lifestyle in which group planning and responsibility are the law.

"Coop housing is nice," explains Giulia Tortora, who lives in Doughty House. "It's more open and tends to bring us closer together through cooking and eating." Like many coop students, Tortora entered the house with a group of friends who were eager to spend a year away from campus housing.

All fun and games?

Life in a coop house is not all fun and games, however. Students inherit responsibilities not found in regular housing arrangements, particularly in the area of dining.

"Students are responsible for planning and cooking their own meals," explains Dean of Housing Mary Kenyatta. "Usually they prepare a budget and then a menu, and generally wind up saving money."

Dean Kenyatta also revealed that in coop housing students are expected to deal with minor maintenance and cleaning. Since the coops are like large houses rather than dormitories, these responsibilities are at times quite demanding, but students shrug them off as only minor drawbacks.

"Are there disadvantages to coop housing?" muses Donovan. "Not at all, really. Sometimes the cooking is a hassle, but overall it's nice."

Coaches claim coop

To the dismay of future coop prospects, the number of spaces will decrease next year, just as it did this year. For the 1983-1984 school year, Dewey house will become an experimental "French House," and Rice House, another coop, will be converted to use for athletic coaches.

John Kowalik, a senior who lives in Dewey House, and who was on last year's Housing Committee, expressed disappointment at the shrinking number of Coops, but added that the system is still a good part of Williams housing.

"Sure, it's a good idea, an opportunity to live away from campus without really being off-campus. The best part about

While students have found that off-campus rents may be slightly higher, most save significantly on food costs. (Glick)

It is definitely the freedom to do what you want," Kowalik enthusiastically remarked. He also believes coops are a frugal form of housing.

"It's much cheaper than living off-campus. And with our meal system, I pay only about half the regular board price," he explained.

Cheap food

Students who do wind up living in a coop house are not offered the board options of other students. Coop residents can only receive a limited board plan, with many students choosing to forsake college food altogether in order to eat more cheaply.

Brahms sonatas tantalize audience

Johannes Brahms wrote three sonatas for violin and piano, all so technically and emotionally demanding that it is a challenge to play one of them well. It was therefore an unusual and courageous decision that Williams College violinist Julius Hegyl and world-famous pianist Garrick Ohlsson made, to present a program of all three Brahms sonatas last Friday evening in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

The first thing one noticed upon walking into the hall was the odd arrangement of the stage, with the performers placed in the corner of the stage to the audience's far left—probably for acoustic purposes.

... incredibly precise, at times almost brisk, but thoughtful or emotional when it should be.

tical purposes. The second immediately noticeable factor was the obvious camaraderie between Hegyl and Ohlsson. Hegyl seemed very happy to have the opportunity of performing with Ohlsson, and both seemed to enjoy playing together.

The program order, interestingly, was not chronological. Instead, the sonata of 1887 opened the program, followed by the sonata written in 1880, and closing with the most mature work, of 1889. This order worked well, for placing the earliest sonata between the two later ones showed what a difference a few years can make. Although written fairly late in Brahms' lifetime, in comparison with its companions the 1880 sonata is a little less deep, a little more flourishy, with fewer of the profound changes in mood and less of the meditative, brooding quality that characterizes the later works.

The balance between violin and piano was generally good throughout, in keeping with the idea of the Romantic violin sonata as a duo rather than a piece for violin with piano accompaniment. Each performer was willing to step back at the appropriate moments and give the other the limelight.

However—and this was not due to insensitivity on Ohlsson's part—Hegyl occasionally suffered in contrast with Ohlsson's consistently strong, confident pianistry and the rich sound he evoked from the piano. Hegyl's string sound was sometimes skittish and lacking in intensity. But this showed noticeable improvement, perhaps as he relaxed during the course of the performance.

For his part, Ohlsson is obviously a first-rate pianist, and a pleasure to listen to. His playing is incredibly precise, at times almost brisk, but thoughtful or emotional when it should be. He was able to bring out all the multiple melodic lines than make Brahms interesting. He also made use of a broad range of sensitive rallentandos that Hegyl was able to follow as easily as he followed Ohlsson's graceful settings of the tempo.

Although it was nice to be given the chance to hear the Brahms sonatas, one wonders why Ohlsson was not invited here to just give a solo recital. World-acclaimed classical musicians so rarely come to Williams that it is a shame not to have had the opportunity of hearing Garrick Ohlsson perform alone. To hear him as one of a duo was more tantalizing than satisfying.

"July" brightens winter

The Fifth of July, Williams' theatre's most recent production, was written by American dramatist Lanford Wilson and has not yet been made into a movie or HBO presentation. It is therefore an unfamiliar work to most of us.

While it has its faults, Wilson's play itself is fine. It might be, however, to reach some unfair conclusions about the original work because of the weaknesses of director Jill Nassivera's production.

In Fifth of July, Wilson examines with humor the ambivalent feelings of hope and despair experienced the morning after a "revolution." Specifically, he focuses on several members of America's most recent "lost generation"—the sixties radicals. The setting of the play is a Fourth of July rural Missouri reunion of sorts among a group of ex-Berkeley activists, in their mid-thirties.

Wilson creates a fine gallery of off-beat yet sympathetic characters. He also, unfortunately, throws in two predictable and tired stereotypes—the hippie musician, and the precocious thirteen-year-old. Still, these two have more than their share of funny lines, and don't seriously blemish the work.

The major problem with the Williams theatre production of this play is that Wilson's focus, on this group dispossessed of an era, is not clearly rendered. Nassivera tries to evoke the proper tone by using Simon and Garfunkel "searching-for-America music" before the play begins. But during the production itself, the missing focus causes us to become more interested in the peripheral characters. When the reminiscing talk about the sixties comes up, it feels almost arbitrarily added.

International Club

Talented show holds audience

by Marc Mazzone

Last Sunday's International Club Talent Show included acts ranging from Dorothy Scullin's delightful mariettes to Dean O'Connor's worthy renditions of "The Minstrel Boy" and "Londonderry Air." All in all, a receptive audience seemed to find it very entertaining.

The Octet was the first of many musical groups to sing. As usual, their mock sincerity and understated humor penetrated the hearts of their audience, which was therefore all the more disposed to overlook some of the faults in their performance. The group as a whole had some difficulties staying in tune. It seems that as they become more solo-oriented, they sacrifice some of their credibility as an ensemble. Nevertheless, they were enjoyable, and their soloists were as strong as ever.

But Essence really brought down the house. While they did not exhibit the polished rehearsal of the Octet, they sang with conviction. And although their male vocals were weak at times, the female voices were precise and resonant. Alison Ashley's performance was particularly noteworthy. With a little more rehearsal, the group may well settle into a musical niche on campus equal to that held by the Octet.

If I had to choose a first-place winner, though, the prize would have to go to Professor Joseph Lowman for his wonderful story about Wicked John and the Devil. Mr. Lowman is a first-rate storyteller, and for the twenty minutes he spent on stage, he held his listeners captive. At times, the laughter was so loud that he almost could not be heard. At other times, when he dropped his voice down to a whisper, the entire audience seemed to hold its breath.

But perhaps more important than the quality of the individual acts is the fact that the proceeds of the talent show are to go to needy children in the Third World. Nearly $850 was raised, and thanks to this, the Club will be able to sponsor at least six children for a year.

While all of the performers ought to be commended for giving their time to this worthy cause, some credit should also be given to the capacity audience. The $2.50 donation paid by each person will help the International Club's fund drive.

Students learn to save lives

by Lucy Lytle

For the past six weeks a number of Williams students and town residents have been rolling bandages, splinting broken limbs, and perfecting their CPR technique as part of the Emergency Medical Technicians (EMT) course being offered at the college.

Bruce Homestead and Dave Tauber, two paramedics from Northampton, are preparing the class to take the Massachusetts State EMT Exam this spring.

A proposal to instate the EMT course as a recognized Winter Study project has been submitted to the Winter Study Committee. Currently, interested students must take EMT in addition to their regular projects and courses. The class met six hours a day twice a week during Winter Study and now meets once a week for six hours.

At three o'clock every Friday afternoon, EMT students walk to the Bronfman Science Center to watch movies and slides on topics as diverse as childbirth and communicable diseases, listen to medical lectures, and practice the many skills—such as CPR—which they must master in order to pass the course.

The class runs until six o'clock, breaks for dinner, then reconvenes at seven for another three hours of instruction. There are frequent quizzes on the assigned reading material, a midterm exam, and a final.

Fieldtrips to a junkyard to practice "auto extrications" (safely removing victims from a car crash) and to the Muir pool to practice water safety techniques are also planned. In addition, students are required to spend at least ten hours doing emergency room observations and sixteen hours riding in an ambulance.

EMT students understand the need for such practical experience. Nate Lebowitz '86 explains that "We're dealing with people's lives—we have to be perfect." He admits that "the hardest parts of the course are the practical parts: doing secondary surveys, CPR, bandag-ing and wound care, splinting, working with oxygen and suction equipment, and backboarding." Dave Scheibe '86 agreed, saying that "assessing symptoms and giving the right kind of treatment is difficult."

All this is done in preparation for the state EMT exam. After passing the course, students will get cards for CPR and advanced first aid but, as Homestead points out, "most students will go on (to get state certification). After all their work it would be foolish if they didn't."

Even after passing the state exam, EMTs are limited in what they can do for a victim. According to Homestead, "EMTs can do basic level treatments but not invasive techniques—which include anything that goes inside the body, such as an injection or an I.V. Although they can't diagnose, they can do things like CPR, splinting, stopping a wound, and treating shock." He added that students doing emergency room and ambulance observations "have to be asked by the attending authority to help before they can do anything."

In fact, certified EMTs have explicit legal responsibilities towards victims they encounter. "In Vermont, for example," notes Homestead, "if you have an EMT emblem on your car and you don't stop at an accident, you are guilty of abandonment." According to Lebowitz, "there are Massachusetts general laws involving 'duty to act' and 'duty to continue.' EMTs can't diagnose the victim's problem but we can assess their symptoms; and once we have started treating them we must continue." Don Hovey '86 points out another restriction: "We can't give victims medication unless they have it with them." Homestead summarizes, "The general rule is: 'Do no further harm.' As long as that is followed there should be no problem with lawsuits."

Given such legal responsibilities and considering the time commitment involved, why take such a course? Don

Feeling young again

To the editor:

Subscribing to the Williams Record makes me feel young again.

As an undergraduate I went to every conceivable rally, met with radical spokesmen, helped organize Lecture Committee conferences with leftwing writers and commentators. I think that's what you should do when you are young.

All too soon, most people seem to find out the many fallacies of the left, but you have to have been there first.

I love the Record, even though it doesn't seem interested in providing much of a log or journal of what's really happening on the campus.

Edgar T. Mead '44

Historians congratulated

To the editor:

I would just like to express my congratulations to the Center for Environmental Studies Winter Study Group under the leadership of Professor Hank Art for their presentation Friday at the Log of "The Changing Face of Williamstown." The coordination and blending of slides and taped voices of various residents of Williamstown was very nicely accomplished. It gives a very vivid feeling for the history, and because of the taped voices—each telling his or her share in this history—the 100 years become very much alive. Many comments captured on tape are so descriptive that they could easily become classic quotes from a time that has passed. It was so well presented that I would encourage everyone to watch for the time and place of the next planned showing—rumor has it that it may be shown on March 17. Heartiest congratulations to the group for a job well done!

Sincerely,

Mrs. Carl Samuelson, Chairman

Hoven '86 explains: "A lot of people are taking it to see if they want to go further in medicine. Others are doing it because it is something that interests them or to fill the first aid requirement for ski patrol."

Scheibe added, "One reason was because I intend to get a job working in an ambulance next year. Also it's just a good talent to know." Lebowitz sounded the general theme when he said, "We're out there to save lives—that's why we're doing it. We want to help people."

Homestead believes "Everyone can benefit from EMT training. It teaches you to maintain a good attitude towards safety at home and in the work environment. You learn how to take care of yourself if you're ever in an accident."

Some of his students, however, are not convinced that this is the type of course that everyone should take. Scheibe feels that CPR training might be more appropriate for the average non-medical person and Hovey agrees that "It's intense. You should be highly motivated and dedicated. Interest is a very important part."

Homestead emphasized that "It takes the motivation to be with and to help other people" and admits that he would prefer potential students to have some experience with comparative anatomy, physiology, or biology.

Rich Levitan '84 was instrumental in bringing the EMT course to Williams and particularly instructors Homestead and Tauber, who he considers "among the highest in the field."

He explained that "I'd like to see more awareness of health at this college. The Infirmary does a good job but they are not in the dorms. They have started an alcohol-awareness program here. Well, this course teaches you how to take care of your alcoholic friends."

W. S. Course

A proposal, sponsored by Professor Lawrence Kaplan, to make EMT training a regular Winter Study course was submitted to the Winter Study Committee in early February and he and Levitan are confident that it will pass.

Levitan explained that "We're aiming for a class size of about fifty. The same instructors will teach the course and I will be a teaching assistant. The classes will be held during January and additional practical work will continue in February—probably on the weekends."

The following is a comparison of costs between living on and off campus:

	OFF-CAMPUS			ON-CAMPUS STUDENT HANDBOOK

Rent	180	76	125	136
Utilities	50	10	28	-

tioned were the privacy of living in one's own "home" and the assumption of responsibilities that go with paying bills, dealing with landlords and maintaining a liveable house.

At the same time, isolation, full garbage cans and pesky landlords were also complaints. Students seemed to find that being removed from the mainstream of campus put them out of touch with many of the daily goings on that used to be a part of dorm life. Yet all the students that mentioned this felt that the benefits of "living-off" far outweighed the costs, even though many of the points noted were the same in both the benefits and drawbacks categories.

Social life off campus, although different, doesn't seem to suffer. From the majority of the people interviewed came the feeling of a strong off-campus community. On-campus activities still seem to be part of the agenda, but most of the socializing occurs off campus. This led to some complaints of always seeing the same faces, but for the most part people seemed more than happy with off-campus social life.

The overall impression from the people who live on the fringe of the Williams College community is very positive. The off-campus students feel they are saving money and enjoying Williams from a different perspective.

energy prices do not make a sharp climb in price and inflation stays at its present level, the College can then tolerate any other problems.

According to Food Service Director James Hodgkins, basically, fifty percent of any personal student's Food Service fee goes toward paying food costs; the rest obtains supplies, repairs, labor, janitorial services, supervision, etc. In a typical school year (222 days this year) the cost of living on the 21 meal plan is approximately $7.20 per day, or $50.40 a week. This means that the cost of the food is $3.60 per day or $25.20 per week. Although $25.20 might not sound like a tremendous amount to spend on groceries per week per person, consumers should remember that by buying in mass quantities the Food Service benefits from discounts on certain foods.

Since the Food Service deals with such large quantities, students receive benefits that are not represented in the board fee.

For example, students are able to pick from no less than three choices. Another important aspect to the meal plan is its nutritional value.

Finally, not only does the meal plan provide good meals at a reasonable price but it allows students to spend time on their academic or social activities rather than cooking.

OFF-CAMPUS

After interviewing 30% of the 124 students living off-campus, who represent 40% of the off-campus households, we found that both in fact and in the students' opinions living off campus is cheaper than living on campus. The average cost of living off campus is $1,850 per person for the school year. This figure includes rent, utilities and food expenditures. Comparing this to the figures presented in the Student Handbook we calculate an average savings of $1,000 from living off campus.

Examining the figures above we find that average off-campus housing costs are slightly higher than on-campus housing costs, (off-campus average $153 per month, vs. on-campus $136 per month). Apparently, most of the savings experienced by off-campus students result from buying and cooking their own food. Students' savings for food alone have ranged from a low of $690 a year to a high of $1,260 a year depending on their personal eating habits. In general, any additional housing costs paid by off-campus students are more than off-set by their savings from food. Is the extra expense of a college meal plan worth having one's meals planned and prepared by the college food service? Obviously, this is a question which can only be answered by the individual. We found, however, that when asked to name a benefit of living off campus most students cited the ability to eat what and when they wanted as one such bonus. Further advantages of living off campus ranged from the ability to walk around nude without fear of exposure to the fresh air on the walk to class. The most common benefits men-

Chandler announces new gym funding

President John Chandler informed faculty recently that he has raised more than $3.5 million toward the cost of new swimming and basketball facilities to be housed next to Lasell Gym. He estimated the total cost of the project will be $9.5 million.

"We have needed new athletic facilities for many years," said Chandler. "The basketball team enjoys a significant home court advantage in Lasell Gym, which is almost 100 years old. But the facility has long outlived its usefulness as an intercollegiate basketball court."

"And the popularity of swimming coupled with the enormous success of our varsity swimming program has strained our 50-year-old pool beyond its limits," Chandler added.

"The need for more adequate space for athletics has been recognized for a long time," he noted, "and it seems to me its time has come."

Court, pool

Preliminary plans for the new facility provide for 44,000 square feet of space, including a basketball court with bleacher seating for 1800 spectators and a two-court area. The building would also house a 50-meter pool, which could be divided into smaller sections so that practice, diving and recreation could go on simultaneously.

$3.5 million has already been raised among a very small group of donors, Chandler reported, and there is a strong possibility of substantial foundation support, with contributions from alumni and benefactors making up the balance.

Trustees decide fate

He added, however, that it would be impossible to estimate a timetable for the project, and cautioned that the encouraging start to the fund-raising effort is no guarantee that the new facilities will actually be built. "That is a decision for the College Trustees," he said.

Chandler hopes that the new swimming pool and basketball courts can be built close enough to Lasell Gym that additional locker facilities would not be necessary. Along with the new construction, Lasell itself would be undergoing a few changes, including converting the current swimming pool to a new use.

Although a feasibility study was authorized and completed last year and fund-raising has now been authorized, decisions involving design and construction hinge on commitments for funding, Chandler added. At least $6 million will have to be raised before the final decisions are made, he said.

Faculty meeting

Reichert expressed concern that caution by the administration could increase the distance between it and the faculty. "The College works best when the administration can call colleagues they need to talk to in a crisis situation," he said.

Many faculty members expressed dismay that the current atmosphere on campus is not, as they see it, conducive to communication between faculty and administration. Political Science professor Raymond Baker said having faculty meetings run by faculty would be one solution to the problem.

Morality of process

A number of faculty condemned the tactic of the hunger strike while others, who claimed that history and the goals of WAAC justified the strike, approved it.

"The principle of rational discourse in debate is central to the morality of process for which this institution stands," Oakley said. "That morality of process is not open to qualification."

Katz responded to Oakley, saying, "The world I know is not a world of sul generalis values... but a world in which various values must compete for our approval. The nature of values is conflictual and not superordinate." Oakley rejected this as contradictory. "It is difficult to adjudicate competing moral claims if one group forecloses on rational discourse by reference to coercive techniques," he said. "The value of moral process lies at a deeper level than the competing values to which Nathan [Katz] referred."

Stalling tactic

Smith described the student dialogue with trustees before the strike as "a moral process that had broken down."

"The [students] tried to use ordinary means, but what does one do when faced with a kind of stalling tactic?" he asked. "They were trying to restore the moral process we're committed to."

Baker praised the strikers for "providing an opportunity for communication and bringing the issue back to our attention."

"What are you talking about, breakdown of communications?" asked O'Connor. "Every time anyone has asked for a meeting, the trustees have given one."

Chandler reported that a report is being prepared which explains the trustees' position on the endowment, the actions of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, and the limitations and possibilities surrounding divestment.

Chandler also said there has been progress in promoting "a higher level of understanding on these issues." WAAC members will meet with trustees in New York City "in the next few weeks," he said, and the trustees "are eager to have an open meeting in April."

The long meeting was so taken up with the hunger strike issues that a scheduled vote on the proposed Women's Study Concentration had to be postponed until tomorrow's faculty meeting.

Trinity frats endangered

Alpha Chi Rho House during the spring term of the 1980-81 academic year. In the "Crow Incident", four members of the all-male fraternity allegedly forced a female Hartford native to engage in sexual activities.

Winer, who conducted the investigation, explained bitterly that no charges were filed against the students at the time because there was no proof that the events of the "Crow Incident"—which was called a "brutal gang bang"—occurred without the woman's consent. The Alpha Chi Rho House was placed on probation for a year, however.

"In many ways, the issue transcends the 'Crow Incident'. The committee was formed because we saw some weaknesses in our entire system", remarked Winer.

The committee directed its attack not only against the school's four all-male fraternities, but at its coed fraternity and two sororities as well. George Higgins, a psychology professor who served as the committee's chairman, commented in an interview with the Hartford Courant, "There is not a speck of difference between fraternities and sororities... they're divisive, they have exclusionary practices, and in our judgment, they don't fit into public and collegiate life."

The issue did not have to go far to meet heated opposition. Acting as spokesman for the minority opposition within the faculty itself, Clyde McKee, a political science professor,

"You can go to any party here and harassment will happen."

argued in a New York Times interview, "There's an issue of freedom involved here. We have young adults and we say to them, 'Be responsible, vote your mind, make your own public policy decisions.' And yet there's a segment of the faculty that says 'When it comes to social choices, we'll make up your minds for you!'"

McKee, in other comments to the Courant, pointed out that there are also many practical concerns that the faculty ignored. The fact that the national fraternity corporations, and not Trinity, owns the fraternity and sorority buildings presents the major obstacle to abolition of the system. McKee estimated that the cost to purchase the buildings and their property would total several million dollars.

"Abolishing fraternities would hurt student life, hurt the admissions prospects, hurt the fund raising from the old grads. It would be a catastrophe," said G. Keith Funston, former president and trustee, in a Times interview. According to Schelbe, mail received by the trustees from alumni is running five to one against abolishing the fraternities.

In an effort to gauge student attitudes toward the fraternities, the faculty committee distributed a poll throughout the student body.

The poll stated Trinity's official definition of "sexual harassment" and asked students whether or not the fraternities fostered such actions. Seventy-five percent of the men and seventy percent of the women said that fraternities condoned such actions. The same proportion of women also said the fraternities promoted sexual harassment, while only thirty percent of the men thought so.

Supporters of the fraternities and sororities contested the poll's implications. "You can go to any party here and harassment will happen," said Chandler Johnson, the president of the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority in the Times.

No freedom on West Bank

by Mark Averitt

How would you like it if a soldier were to stop you after a class and take you to a "detainment compound" for questioning that could last as long as 18 days?

How would you feel if the government were to ask you how you were going to vote in student council elections and how you felt about national political issues?

What would your reaction be to soldiers approaching your college and screaming obscenities at you and other students with a megaphone?

This is the state of affairs, according to Dean Mary Kenyatta, at the five institutions of higher learning on the West Bank in the territory that once belonged to Jordan. It is now under military occupation by Israel and Kenyatta, speaking February 9 in a lecture sponsored by the Committee for Palestinian Rights, said that Palestinian educators and students are really feeling the difference.

Kenyatta recently took a trip to the Middle East with a group of administrators from other colleges in order to see whether academic freedom as we know it in America is protected by the Israeli government, and she concluded that, despite her desire to remain intellectually detached to a certain degree, she found the situation "horrendous and appalling."

Obstructions to learning

Palestinian universities have many disadvantages. All of their books are censored and any judged to be anti-semitic or inflammatory are destroyed. Foreigners (including those from Jordan) are not allowed to teach.

The colleges are surrounded by walls in an attempt to prevent exchanges between students and soldiers. The students often throw rocks, but the soldiers have a more powerful weapon—bullets. The army can also close the roads when it is judged appropriate and thus effectively prevent classes. The Palestinian semester often runs on for an entire year or more because students can't get to school.

In addition, professors are required to sign a "loyalty oath" which forbids them from supporting any organization which is hostile to the state of Israel in any way.

The Israeli government believes that the Palestinian universities are being used to serve the interests of the PLO and Kenyatta agrees that their purpose is to "train the future leaders of the state of Palestine." However, "the Israelis have made it almost impossible for a Palestinian to get a coherent education on the West Bank," said Kenyatta, claiming that the only reason Israel allows the universities to exist is because they wish to annex the land later and want to avoid world uproar against them.

Kenyatta compared the loyalty oath to similar American policies during the McCarthy era, but Prof. Larry Kaplan pointed out that our American ideal of academic freedom may not be realistically possible in the Middle East. He claimed that the human rights of Palestinian professors are not violated.

Cornell West

Black middle-class must act

by Stephen Magnus

"The sixties are to Afro-American history what the French Revolution was to French history," said Dr. Cornell West, Professor at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, at his Friday night lecture.

The sixties saw a revolt of the masses, and shifting relationships between the black middle, working, and under classes, West explained.

During the first stage of the sixties, middle-class blacks led the resistance movement "within liberal capitalist bounds," and Dr. Martin Luther King consolidated this group with working- and under-class blacks.

King's Christian outlook helped the movement form ties with progressive non-black groups. By 1960, 50,000 people—white as well as black—had participated in sit-ins.

Reliance on this support, however, led to the formation of a rift between middle-class blacks (allied with the white liberal Democrats) and the more radical lower-class blacks. The more revolutionary groups rose to prominence around 1965 and launched the second stage of the movement, in which extreme tactics were advocated instead of peaceful protest.

Malcolm X symbolized the second stage, articulating the "underlying visceral feelings of black urban America."

West pointed out that the major task of the new black middle class should now be to "repoliticize" lower-class blacks and set up meaningful alliances with them; the groups must unify if further progress for blacks is to be achieved.

During a discussion period following his lecture, West praised the recent hunger strike at Williams, and said the college divestiture movement is likely to improve race relations not only in South Africa, but also within the United States.

Dr. Cornell West discussed the sixties and Afro-American history. (Schell)

Draft and financial aid

cool. "It's an administrative burden that falls on 100 percent of the students," said Financial Aid Director Phil Wick. "As of now," he continued, "we can only hope to influence the implementation of the law, and the regulations won't be known until late spring."

WCAM has distributed a leaflet published by the National Lawyers Guild and the Berkeley Draft Counseling and Resource Center which outlines the regulations and explains their allegedly discriminatory effects. According to the leaflet, these regulations violate the Privacy Act of 1974, the Fifth Amendment, and the right to due process.

Not a burden

Rep. Gerald Solomon (R-NY) authored the legislation. According to Gary

Holmes, one of Solomon's aides, Solomon "wanted to get the people who have not registered yet to register. The amendment is necessary because it's not fair that some just don't register."

Holmes also explained that Solomon wasn't concerned about the burden placed upon the college saying, "It's just one more little thing that they have to deal with."

Yale will subsidize

Other colleges have reacted to the legislation in various ways. Middlebury College will comply with the legislation, but its president, Olin Robinson, has voiced opposition to the amendment, according to the Middlebury Campus. Because of financial considerations, Columbia University is being forced to accept the regulations.

Middlebury Director of Financial Aid Patricia Jamison explained that "financial aid officers should not become agents of the federal government."

Her counterpart at Columbia, Ted Stock, voiced opposition to the law. "It's not the right way to go about it, to put the burden on the schools to weed out the objectors. There should be a better mechanism to deal with those people, not bludgeoning them by holding up financial aid," he said.

Only Yale University has stated that they will fund non-registered students. However, the loans will be at commercial rates, not government-subsidized ones.

The future of this legislation is still in doubt. A California judge has declared the law unconstitutional and the legal battle is continuing. In addition, concerned individuals can protest the wording of the regulations by writing to the Education Department before February 28. Massive opposition could force public hearing on the regulations, which could delay or even nullify the law.

Women's squash

Although they won only two of the six matches that they played last weekend in New Haven, the women's squash team earned a ranking of sixth in the country among the thirty schools which competed in the most prestigious of the sport's tournaments, the Howe Cup.

Williams arrived on Friday with a 5-4 record and a seed in one of the two top divisions at the tournament.

Williams was shut out 7-0 by Harvard, the eventual champion, for the second time this season on Friday. Trinity also sent the Ephs reeling to a 5-2 setback. Penn beat the Ephs 7-0 on Saturday. Williams rebounded to trounce the University of California at Berkeley and then to win a dance contest at a New Haven bar that evening against their squash rivals.

Williams breezed past Middlebury 6-1, but Brown was too much for the Ephs in their second Sunday match. Williams dropped a 6-1 decision despite a heroic five-game effort by number one player Barbara Riefler.

Williams earned the number six ranking mostly due to their early season victories over several top teams, including Dartmouth.

Although he had expected to win more matches, Coach Renzie Lamb was proud of his women racketeers. "The kids were great, simply tremendous," he lauded. "I'm very happy with them, but our season's not over yet—we still have Smith and Trinity to play."

Women's hoops

Poor shooting from the floor led to two losses for the women's basketball team last week. On Saturday, they lost to Amherst 69-35, and last Wednesday they lost to Mt. Holyoke 54-37.

Tracy Burrows '84 led the team with 12 points and 14 rebounds on Saturday. An effective Lady Jeff press sent them on a 14-2 run before the half to make the halftime score 30-18. Two more buckets after the break gave Amherst a big lead, and 27 chances at the foul line in the second half insured that they kept it as they beat the Ephs for the first time in seven years.

Williams plays at Trinity Wednesday, then Wesleyan at home Saturday at 2:00.

Wrestling

The wrestlers lost to both Amherst and Wesleyan Saturday at the Little Three Championships. Wesleyan, New England's number one ranked team, beat Williams 43-5, and Amherst downed the Ephs 37-13.

Senior tri-captain John Donovan was a bright spot as he won both his matches at 134 lbs. Jeff May '85 won one and tied one match at 158 lbs.

Women's hockey

The women's hockey team lost 6-0 to Middlebury Friday night.

Once again playing with only three defensesmen, the Ephs were unable to avenge an earlier loss to the Panthers.

Williams plays Wesleyan Saturday in a rematch of the 8-7 thriller at Wesleyan two weeks ago. With their home ice and possibly even rowdier fans than those that traveled to Middletown, the Ephs expect another great game.

Miller 2 on 2

Sunday Night League sharpshooters, Intramural all-stars, and just plain hackers will take to the hardwoods for basketball action this Friday at the Towne Field House. For the third consecutive year, the Miller 2-on-2 basketball tournament will give Williams students and faculty the opportunity to compete for $300.00 in scholarship prize money.

The tournament will once again feature men's, women's and co-ed divisions. The only players ineligible for the tournament are current members of the men's varsity or junior varsity basketball teams. All other players, including women's varsity players and faculty members are welcome. Co-ed division competitors are also eligible to compete in the men's and women's divisions. Fifteen teams must enter in each division, so that prize money will be awarded.

All entrants receive a T-shirt and an invitation to the wrap-up party at the Log simply for participating.

Squash edged by Trinity

The men's varsity squash team came into last Wednesday's match with Trinity sporting a laudable 15-2 record. Both Williams and Trinity are vying for the number four position in the final national nine-man rankings, and have prepared many months for this all important showdown. In a very close 5-4 match before a sizeable home crowd, the Ephs lost to a strong Trinity squad.

The high points of the day were impressive 3-0 wins by number one All-American Greg Zaff, number two junior Tom Harrity, and number nine sophomore Ben Thompson. Junior Bill Nau continued his winning ways manhandling his opponent 3-1 at the number four position, giving the team their fourth win of the day.

Hard fought close losses by Jamie King '84 (3-2), Doug Robie '86 (3-2), Marc Sopher '83 (3-2), Matt Lynch '83 (3-2), and Bill Little '84 (3-1) kept the Ephs in the match until the final ball was struck. Little and Sopher especially have improved their games with determined effort.

Coach Steve Heath was not disappointed with the hard fight his team posted against their experienced arch-rivals Trinity. The team looks optimistically to a successful defense of the Little Three Title next weekend at Amherst while number one and two players Zaff and Harrity compete against top national amateurs at the Nationals in San Francisco.

Men glide to fifth

The men's ski team turned in excellent performances this past weekend at the Dartmouth Winter Carnival.

The results are a definite improvement over last week's sixth-place finish, especially for the Nordic team, who beat Bates in Friday's individual competition for the first time this season.

The Alpine team (finishing in fourth overall) was strongly in second place after Friday's giant slalom. Captain Crawford Lyons '84 skied off with fifth, while John Pier '85 and Tuck Collins '83 shared the joys of tenth place, probably assuring their places at the nationals in the GS.

In Saturday's slalom competition, Lyons won the second run to place eighth, followed immediately by Pier in ninth, giving the Alpine team fourth for the day.

Coach Ed Grees commented, "Stupendous! I can't even believe we're skiing this consistently."

X-C improved

Captain Steve (Lars) Johansen led the cross-country Eph stylists with his best race of the season, a 25th place finish, with Spencer Jones '85 close behind in 26th and Ragnar Horn '86 in 31st.

The second day's relay competition was a seesaw battle between Williams, Dartmouth, and Bates. The seesaw frustrated the Ephs as Bates gained the lead in the last kilometer, leaving Williams in a close seventh place for the day.

Coach Bud Fisher felt that the team was "certainly improved. We're looking for a fourth-place finish next week at our own Carnival."

Next week is the Williams Carnival, where Head Coach Fisher is looking for continued strong Alpine performance, and a sixth-place Nordic finish in the hopes of placing fourth overall.

Hockey sticks it to Tigers

by Dave Woodworth

In one of the most stunning upsets in the recent history of Williams hockey, the men's puck team downed Division I Princeton 4-3 at Lansing Chapman Rink on Saturday.

Ed Finn '83 skated the Ephs to a 1-0 lead early in the first period when he drilled a slap shot from the left point past Tiger, goal keeper Wally McDonough. Co-captain Bob Brownell '83 and Dick Gallun '85 assisted on the goal, which came at the 2:10 mark.

The one-goal advantage lasted through the first period and most of the second, though each team missed several good scoring opportunities. Brownell scored what appeared to be the second goal of the game at the 6:50 point, but the tally was disallowed.

Then, at 15:32, the Tigers' Ed Lee evened things up with a follow-up of a rebound from the left side of the crease. The tie did not last long, as Mark Wysocki '83 stapled a Tiger defenseman to the boards in the Princeton zone, knocking him off the puck. Brian Rutledge '85 gathered it in and wristed it home at the 17:30 mark, giving Williams the 2-1 edge as the second period came to a close.

With both teams playing a man down, Finn gave the Ephs some breathing room at 4:19 of the third frame, knocking home Brownell's missed shot. Princeton closed the gap at 9:05 of the period, when Rob Scheuer's slap shot was deflected by a Williams defender past goalie Dan Finn '84.

Nullified goal

The key play of the contest came with 7:48 left, when the Tigers got the equalizer, only to have it nullified by the referee, who claimed (arguably) that the puck had been kicked in.

At 15:25, Greg Pachus '84 got what proved to be the game-winner, with assists going to Rich Jackson '85 and Peter Dombrowski '85.

Of his squad's miraculous win, Coach Bill McCormick said, "We looked so much better than in recent weeks; they played just the way I told them. Danny (32 saves in the game) did a terrific job on the net. And the most important thing was that we worried about who won the game, not who got the credit. With all our injured players starting to come back, I look for us to finish real strong."

Worthy of mention

Two outstanding individual efforts seem worthy of mention, as they typified the spirit of the team. The first came midway through the second period, when Rutledge, beaten by a Princeton forward who was bearing down on the goal, dove for the puck and with his outstretched stick just managed to poke-check the puck away from his man.

The second came at the end of the period, when the Ephs were trying to kill a penalty to Paul Coleman '85. Junior Dan Finneran made the most of his only shift of the night, throwing his body on the ice to stop a slap shot from the left point. Still in the prone position, Finneran reached out with his stick and cleared the puck out of the Williams zone.

Beat Wesleyan

Earlier in the week, Williams earned a share of the Little Three title by defeating Wesleyan, 7-5, on Friday night. Goals in that game were registered by Brownell (2), Finn (2), Jackson, Pachus, and Rutledge.

The Ephs missed a chance to win the title outright when they lost to Amherst, 7-4, on Tuesday night. Brownell, Jackson, Wysocki and co-captain Sam Flood '83 were in the scoring column for Williams.

Goalie Dan Finn had 32 saves to lead the hockey team to a 4-3 upset over Princeton Saturday. (Plonsker)

Women ski unparalleled

The Women's Ski Team got off to a slow start this weekend only to come back and win the second day event.

In the Nordic individual, held at Dartmouth amidst a crowd of spectators, Ellen Chandler '83 once again finished first for Williams with a solid fourth place. The team total put them in sixth place after that event. The relay team, consisting of Chandler, Bates, and Beth Schmidt '86 skied to another sixth on Saturday.

Knight wins Alpine

The alpine events, held at Loon Mt. and Cannon, N.H., were filled with expectation.

Heidi Knight '86 skied with grace and precision to capture the win by a full second in the Giant Slalom. Williams next scorer, Kate Knopp '85, placed eighteenth followed by Betsy Paine '85 in 28th.

The team total after that event put Williams in a disappointing sixth place. Saturday, however, brought new hopes and the team came through with incredible determination. The Williams women pulled out all their stops and cruised to place three finishers in the top twelve.

Slalom first

Knight, sitting in second after the first run, took revenge and won the second run by an amazing 1.4 seconds to secure her victory overall. Knopp, after an aggressive first run skied to her best finish this season—placing third overall.

Marcy Rubinger '85 came back after a couple of disappointing weekends to finish twelfth and wrap up enough points to put the team in first place in the slalom.

The four event total put Williams in fourth place despite the win in the slalom. The women are expected to peak this weekend at their home carnival, so come on out to Brodie to cheer them on.

Lord Jeff shoots down hoopsters

by John Clayton

Shooting the lights out from outside, Amherst beat the hoopsters 75-61 at Amherst Saturday night to break Williams' seven game winning streak.

Shooting 67 percent from the floor, the Lord Jeffs built up a fourteen point lead in the second half.

"They did not miss from long range," said Coach Curt Tong. "We were never really in the game. We were always playing catch-up; we were behind by four to six in the first half, and the closest we got was three in the second half."

Freshman sensation Tim Walsh led the Ephs with 19 points, while junior guard Art Pidori-ano had 15. Leo White had 25 for Amherst and Dana King added 15.

"It was one of our lesser defensive efforts," Tong said. "But it wasn't necessarily the players' fault. We may have had the wrong defense. We just couldn't stop them."

Williams is now 1-1 in Little Three action, and will face both teams at home in the next two weeks. Amherst, with their two home games behind them, is 2-0.

Whap W.P.I.

Earlier in the week, the team won its seventh in a row, 79-70 over W.P.I. at home Wednesday.

"(Senior co-captain Scott) Olesen's three-point play was the turning point of the game," said Tong. Olesen hit a twisting reverse lay-up with 2:27 left to bring Williams from a 66-64 deficit to a 67-64 lead.

"You can't count on a three-pointer, but Scott got one in a crucial situation," Tong said. "It's a great benefit to play with a one point lead instead of a tie."

Pidori-ano led the team in scoring with 18 points. Junior forward Dave Krupski scored 15, senior forward Andy Goodwin had 12, and Olesen added 11 for the Ephs.

The game had been a seesaw battle until Olesen's play sparked Williams to the game-winning spurt.

Together team

"This is a together team," said Tong Wednesday. "We may lose some this season, but we do we'll go down fighting. This team works hard, because they know that if they don't extend themselves, they're just an average ballclub."

Men lose

Women float to victory

by Andrew Garfield and Chris Harned

Kathy Kirmayer '86 and Katie Hudner '83 led the women's swim team to a 93-42 romp over Mt. Holyoke Friday, but the men lost to Colgate Saturday 67-66.

Kirmayer qualified for the nationals in the 50 free (24.8) and the 100 free (55.7); Hudner qualified with a time of 30.0 in the 50 back. The Ephwomen are now 8-0.

The Ephwomen won 14 of the 16 events of the night.

Senior co-captain Liz Jex and sophomore Kim Eckrich picked up two victories apiece, Eckrich in the 50 breast (33.57) stroke and 100 individual medley (1:04.27), and Jex in the 200 butterfly (2:28.85) and the 200 breast stroke (2:46.34).

Sophomore Jonna Kurucz outdueled teammate Anne Melvin '85 in the 1000 free (11:22.1); Sue Knapp '85 fought off a Mt. Holyoke challenge to win the 500 free (5:28.41), and Rachel Stauffer '85 won the other freestyle event, the 200 (2:02.48) over teammate Knapp (2:03.48).

Sophomore Peg Thoman won the 50 butterfly (28.65); Cecilia Clepiela '84 won the 200 individual medley (2:22.81), Laura Henriques '85 won the required diving event and Emily Parker '86 won the optional diving.

Men lose

The men had a tougher time on Saturday, losing to Colgate 67-66. Bill Couch led Williams with two victories: the 400 IM (4:20.1) and the 500 free (4:52.9).

Williams led for most of the men's meet and was ahead 66-60 with only the Medley Relay left to swim. Colgate, a Division I team, got 7 points for their victory in the Relay.

Although the Ephs lost, Coach Carl Samuelson was "pleased" with his swimmers. He said that they "swam quite well" and that this was the "closest we've ever been to Colgate".

Other winners for Williams included Will Andrew '86 in the 100 back (55.8), Rob Bowman '83 in the 1650 free (17:19.0), Ben Aronson '83 in the 200 fly (1:58.8) and Dave Johnson '83 in the 200 breast (2:16.0).

The Ephs have had little competition from their Division III opponents this season. Samuelson pointed out that this is because they have been unable to schedule stronger teams such as M.I.T., Coast Guard, and Tufts. Samuelson expects, however, to have plenty of competition from teams like Kenyon, Claremont and University of California at San Diego in the Division III National Championships.

ACSR investigates non-compliance

by Ned Ladd

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) announced an investigation of four companies that have not complied with the Sullivan Principles at its meeting last Monday night. College Treasurer William Reed also reported that holdings in two other companies cited for non-compliance were liquidated.

The companies under investigation include General Electric, American Home Products, Warner Communications, and International Telephone and Telegraph. ACSR Chairman Richard Lamb stated that the other companies cited for non-compliance would be investigated as time permitted. The ACSR will meet for one hour every two weeks until all of the companies are investigated.

Holdings in Upjohn and Air Express International have already been sold, according to Reed, because of economic considerations. The Upjohn stock was sold in the course of normal investment planning, he said. Consolidated Freightways, a privately-owned corporation, bought Air Express International and all AEI shares were liquidated.

Committee members displayed most dissatisfaction with American Home Products. According to Lamb, this corporation does not comply with the Sullivan Principles because it has its own system for counteracting apartheid. As a result, AHP will not cooperate with the Arthur D. Little Company, which officially monitors companies' compliance with the Sullivan Principles. AHP was once a signatory to the Sullivan Pact, but in 1981 withdrew in favor of its own program.

"Not satisfied"

"I'm not satisfied with their program," Lamb stated. Political Science Professor Vincent Barnett echoed Lamb's scepticism saying, "How do we know what kind of internal auditing procedures they have?"

The committee decided to send a letter asking for more specific information regarding American Home Products' policy in apartheid South Africa. The letter would contain demands for wage rates, envi-

Women's Studies voted by faculty

by Jim Peak

The college faculty voted almost unanimously for the establishment of a women's studies concentration at last Wednesday's meeting. There was only one dissenting vote to the proposal put forth by Committee for Educational Policy chairman Lawrence Graver.

The proposal, as submitted by the Women's Studies Advisory Committee, calls for the completion of five courses to receive credit for the concentration. The introductory course, Women Studies 101, will be based on Professor Rosemarie Tong's current philosophy course, Foundations of Feminist Thought.

There will then be three electives selected with the approval of the Advisory Committee. A required senior seminar will complete the concentration, which will be offered beginning this September.

"A sound proposal"

Several faculty spoke in favor of the concentration. History professor Dennis Dickerson called it "a sound proposal" which gives faculty and students an opportunity to explore "the other half of the human race." Francis Oakley, Dean of the Faculty, felt that the proposal would "enrich and vitalize our curriculum in ways we may not be able to appreciate today."

However, but there were some reservations. Economics Professor Kathleen McNally worried that female faculty members might be "expected" to teach women's studies courses, regardless of their other interests and responsibilities.

Also, some faculty were worried that by forcing discussion of women's issues into courses designed specifically for that purpose, the introduction of these topics into the mainstream curriculum would be delayed.

Members of the Advisory Committee admitted that these were very real concerns, but felt that these problems could be resolved. Tong said that she hoped that "no faculty member would ever feel tied down to a course," and that each year the required courses would be alternated among members of different departments. She also expressed her wish that the subject material eventually become incorporated into the traditional curriculum, stating "If the program is truly successful, I hope it will self-destruct."

Amherst president dies

by Ned Ladd

Julian H. Gibbs, fifteenth president of Amherst College, died of a heart attack Sunday night at Bay State Medical Center in Springfield. The 58-year-old physical chemist suffered a heart attack while on a ski trip to Charlemont, Massachusetts.

Amherst's Dean of the Faculty Mary Catherine Bateson has been named acting president.

Gibbs had been president since July, 1979. During his tenure in office, Amherst required all fraternities on campus to admit women. This step led to a strong reinforcement of coeducation at Amherst.

Gibbs attempted to expand Amherst's curriculum, especially in the math and science departments. He fostered efforts in applied mathematics, non-Western and third-world studies, molecular biology and the visual arts. Two professors of molecular biology were tenured while Gibbs was in office and the department of Asian Language and Literature was developed. In addition, construction on the $3.1 million Seeley G. Mudd Math and Computer Science complex began.

Endowment upped

In 1979 when Gibbs took office, Amherst was a small college of 1500 undergraduates and had an endowment of $114 million. During his term, he added more than $23 million to the endowment and laid plans for a goal of $43 million by 1984.

Gibbs was born in Greenfield in 1924. He grew up in Albany and attended Albany Academy. He graduated from Amherst in 1947 after serving in World War II in the Naval Reserves.

After marrying Cora Lee Gethman, a 1946 Smith graduate, he earned his Ph.D. in chemistry from Princeton. He then took a teaching position at the University of Minnesota.

In 1960, Gibbs took a chair in the chemistry department at Brown University. He served there until his appointment.

Applicants plummet for '87

by Lucy Lytle

Early decision applications for the class of 1987 reached a total of only 321 compared to 430 last year, a reduction of over twenty-five percent, according to Director of Admissions Phil Smith.

Regular applications also dropped almost ten percent from 4,400 last year to approximately 4,000 this year, said Smith.

Of those who applied under the Early Decision Program, 139 were admitted, 9 were rejected, and 173 were deferred. In addition, twelve students who previously postponed admittance will be attending Williams next year. The entire group of those admitted so far will comprise approximately thirty percent of the entering class of 1987.

Smith revealed that the number of applications was "the lowest it has been in a good long time" but noted that "the quality range was good" and blamed the drop, in part, on increasing competition as other colleges initiate early action-type programs.

Demographics, money

He added that the number of applications is "down at most competitive colleges," explaining that "it's demographics and money and the fact that we [the admissions committee] were so doggone tough last year."

One bright spot on the otherwise lackluster applications horizon was a slight increase in the number of minority applications and admissions. This year three of the four black students who applied under the Early Decision Program were admitted compared to last year when neither of the two blacks who applied were accepted.

Regarding minority recruiting, Smith explained that Williams "practices affirmative action and every year conducts

Action speaks louder

The recent hunger strike heightened our awareness of the role the College should play as a responsible investor. The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) is supposed to oversee that role. In fact, the Administration promised to try to accelerate the review process at the conclusion of the hunger strike.

Yet, of the 15 companies cited in the Arthur D. Little report, the ACSR has reviewed only four responses to the College's initial inquiries. Why? Due to a lack of time—the ACSR only meets for one hour every other week.

The ACSR seems to be moving, if slowly, on the question of compliance with the Sullivan Principles. This is noteworthy. But to devote so little time to so weighty an issue is to ignore the College's stated commitment to responsible investment.

Endorsements

Any newspaper has the right to endorse political candidates within its readership community. In fact, when a paper feels that the victory of one candidate would significantly benefit its community, that right becomes an obligation.

However, before we will advocate a choice, we need to feel that the candidate we have chosen stands head and shoulders above the others. For the College Council President's and Vice-President's posts, none meets that criterion. We cannot endorse for the office of Treasurer because of conflict of interests (a candidate on the Record staff).

Many of this year's candidates have expressed a strong interest in increasing the visibility and credibility of the council. Many have also expressed frustration at the council's lack of power. We applaud these initiatives and sincerely hope that next week's victors will make good on their promises.

Student finds answers, questions in Sri Lanka

by Mark Averitt

You build the road, and the road builds you." That's what they told us when we went to Sri Lanka. Although our group was ready to listen to almost anything, this was just a bit disturbing. Indeed, we had come to build roads for a development project which espoused the philosophy that countries are built one road at a time; but as for building ourselves—we thought we had a better way in America. Why else were we investing time and money in a college education? Could a road build as sturdy a person as an institution like Williams?

It was immediately obvious to us that roads needed to be built in Sri Lanka, whether or not we did. People drove on the left hand side of the street (the island was once a British colony, and many colonial customs like this one are still observed) at speeds as fast as sixty miles per hour, and on narrow dirt roads full of potholes. We travelled from "moment-to-moment," as the Buddhists would say, never quite sure what would happen next. Richard Dodds and I once passed the scene of a collision between a car and a dump-truck, and one of our group members was involved in a motorcycle accident. Nor will any of us forget the time that our bus hit a cow. Thus it was with an eye to the practical value of labor that we patched roads, and gardened, and farmed.

Yet in most cases, our portion of the work (for which our payment was simply a sense of communal effort, known in the ancient Sinhalese tradition as "Shramadana") was minimal. There is a fantastic romance among many wealthy Americans about becoming one of the "common people," about abandoning accustomed luxuries in order that they may live the morally pure life of the soil. To rush in and contribute, however, is not quite as easy as one might think at first—Williams students just don't have the skills or experience to be of much use in an Asian agrarian society. Thus we did what we could as best we could—which wasn't very much, and wasn't very good.

But even though we knew that we were merely dabbling in a foreign culture for a month and were not actually integrating ourselves into it, some of us began to forget that we had come to Sri Lanka as a Winter Study project through Williams College. As the month went on, the "resplendent isle" seemed more like a native environment. We stopped making jokes about eating with our hand (not the left one, for that is the Sri Lankan substitute for toilet paper), and we scooped up our hot rice and curry with gratitude. Our standards of cleanliness and comfort changed; a bath in the lake seemed perfectly sufficient, and I heard a few of us say that wooden slats are more comfortable to sleep on than mattresses.

Ben Olshin told me he would rather live as a rural villager than as a materialistically satisfied American. Tim Inch during a three-day Shramadana in a Muslim village. We awoke at five to the bleating of a tractor horn, and after the usual prolonged organization period (Sri Lankans don't have the American penchant for efficiency, but on the other hand they also have fewer nervous breakdowns and divorces), we set out to move dirt in order to build a smooth road. Villagers and members of the Sarvodaya development group, our host in Sri Lanka, also participated. The labor was difficult, and despite the many tea breaks, the days seemed very long. We

We realized that we were Westerners in a land where we had no real business.

meditated with such enthusiasm that I feared he might stay behind to become a Buddhist monk. We had planned to take Sri Lanka back with us to the United States. Instead, we found ourselves swallowed up in new and appealing traditions, and we almost abandoned ourselves to asking, with the thatch-hut dwellers, "America? Where is that?"

We did return to Williams, however, and I think the road-building was partially responsible for that. The turnaround in our attitude towards the trip occurred were all beginning to feel a bit sick and fell to complaining. Our frisbee-playing and other Western ways served as entertainment for the villagers, and although we were treated like brothers and sisters, we began to perceive that enormous cultural rifts existed between ourselves and the islanders. It was important to ignore differences of values so that we could learn from the Sri Lankans, but nonetheless, we had to acknowledge that they did exist.

From that point on, which occurred about the middle of our trip, we began to evaluate the ways of the Sri Lankans with a more objective, Western eye. Many of us began to tire of being conversation pieces to children and receiving continual invitations to private homes for tea. We did not want to take any more pictures of people, nor did we want their addresses. Whereas we had once revelled in cultural exchange, we were now reluctant to talk about America or to take part in the fine points of the daily ritual that is such a vital aspect of religious societies like the Buddhist and Hindu ones. We realized that we were Westerners in a land where we had no real business—where our ancestors, who also had no business, had been exploiting natives for centuries. We were in a strange land, and all that we could do for consolation was to pretend that it was not so.

Then one day, much later in the trip, we passed over the road that we had built in the Muslim village. Tourism had zapped our energy, and the bus was like a tomb. We had been much more lively when we were working hard every day. But suddenly, on that bus, we were biting into the fruit of our labors. We had built that road. It was bumpy and sloped, an inexact job—yet our sense of accomplishment was mighty. Our road only carried us about two hundred yards, but the confidence that comes from knowing we had the power to contribute carried us through the trip and is probably still carrying a few of us through the second semester at Williams. Our road was a symbol of the fusion of two completely different cultural traditions. It was the work of visitors, but welcome ones. The road gave us a reason to be in Sri Lanka—and the feeling we had on the bus gave us a reason to bring Sri Lanka back to the United States.

So when people ask me what I did in Sri Lanka, I say, "I helped to build a road." Does that imply that I am a changed man from the one I sent out to Asia? I would answer "No," that there is a distinction between building a road and possessing the humanitarian good will that can go into building a road. The Buddhists would say that you can build both a road and yourself with whatever materials and in whatever shape you choose. In Sri Lanka, I found out they were right about the road. Back at Williams, I'm still trying to decide whether they were right about me.

Gargoyles propose improvements in hiring and tenuring

by Richard Henderson

It is no secret that aside from our comments on the evaluation sheets completed at the end of the semester, students have little involvement in the decisions of whether to promote junior faculty to tenured status. In response, some suggest that a student be elected to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), the body that makes the final tenure decisions. This suggestion partially stems from a common misconception among students that the tenure process consists mainly of a yea or nay from the CAP.

In actual situations, however, the vital advisory committees, one in each department, which have evolved in a haphazard variety of forms over the years.

A survey conducted by the College Council last year determined that most department chairmen felt student input from these committees was very valuable in hiring decisions. "Students often bring insights that we have overlooked," observed Department of Physics Chairman C. Ballard Pierce.

Indeed, students and faculty are often looking for different qualities in the candidates. The faculty tend to be concerned primarily with finding a candidate who complements the needs of the department and the research background of particular members of the department. Students, on the other hand, tend to focus on the candidate's ability to communicate ideas in an interesting and challenging way. Combining the reactions and responses of both students and faculty is, therefore, a logical, compelling, and workable basis for choosing the best candidate.

Unfortunately, this valuable exchange occurs more frequently and effectively in some departments than in others. With this understanding, the Gargoyle Society has developed a set of guidelines that all departments could follow to strengthen considerably the advisory committee system.

Suggestions

At minimum each department should have an advisory committee composed of four to eight students, depending on the size of the department. This committee should be invited to attend the formal presentations that each candidate makes to the department. A number of departments currently invite all their majors to attend these presentations; should, however, select for each group one or two non-majors who have taken a number of courses in the department in order to provide a valuable interdisciplinary view to each committee.

The committee should have informal contact with each candidate at a time

Combining the reactions and responses of both students and faculty is a logical, compelling, and workable basis for choosing the best candidate.

clearly, this policy could work well in all major fields. The advisory committee should then be invited to share its impressions of the candidates at the meetings in which the department decides which candidate(s) to hire. This face-to-face exchange between students and faculty is crucial to selecting the best candidate. Gargoyle feels that this is strongly preferable to the dominant current practice of having the department chairman relay student opinion to the rest of the department.

Proven measures

Beyond these minimal guidelines, we suggest the following practices that have worked well in some departments and could easily be adopted by others.

Department majors should elect fellow majors to the advisory committee; members of the committee should not be department-appointed. The department when no faculty members are present. This should take the form of a meal in a dining hall. Students could also be enlisted to help in the transportation of candidates to and from Williams, and to give them a tour of the campus.

Students should also be involved in the promotion of junior faculty to tenured status. The faculty member being considered should choose a few students that he feels know him best. The department would then speak with these students and with two or three students suggested by the advisory committee before reaching a final decision.

The widespread adoption of the guidelines will result in improved communication between faculty and students, and—consequently—the hiring of new faculty in tune with student needs and interests.

Robert Stiglicz: Struggling for faith in human dynamism

Robert Stiglicz has been an Assistant Professor of Political Science at Williams since 1980. Since that time, he has been an outspoken and provocative spokesman on issues of campus and world politics. RECORD editors Michael Govan and David McCabe recently interviewed Stiglicz for the RECORD's newest feature, Profiles.

Robert Stiglicz: You know what Stiglicz is like; Stiglicz says dumb things that incriminate him . . . See the problem is, what is surreal philosophy to me is psychosis to other people.

Williams Record: What are you doing with philosophy now?

It's a subtext of all my work. It's deep inside everything I do. I'm not allowed to use it anymore. I can't. I'd never get tenure doing what I really want to do.

You've been a full professor since 1978. Can you think of any way in which your opinion towards teaching or academics has changed in those five years?

I had a lot more dreams in the beginning about what I could do. And I was much more naive, thinking that people would be interested in learning for its own sake and would be excited by ideas, and that I could share in that excitement with them. I found out that most people aren't in school out of a love for ideas, but they're there to use the schooling to get someplace else. That is disappointing.

Do you think that's particularly true of this place?
I think it's very true of this place. This is an extremely anti-intellectual place.

In what sense?

I've never seen such a breach between brightness and creativity, a lack of creativity, in my life. Being creative means taking risks, and many of the people here are profoundly risk avoiding. The natural instinctive creativeness that I had, this place killed it. I have no doubt about that.

But while Williams has killed that creative part of me, it's also given me something else that I probably couldn't have cultivated elsewhere, an appreciation for the need to integrate material and not simply to break ideas apart.

In what other ways, if any, have you changed since coming to Williams?

Before I came here, I was interested in God and existence, in death, in suffering, in transcendence, in freedom, in all sorts of weird expression and experimentation. And since I came here I've become even more interested in them, because none of those things can really be contemplated here. This place is about as far away from the questions that really matter as you can get.

But my big gripe is not with Williams: there are better things to gripe about. My big gripe is with the world, and beyond that with existence . . . So let's start talking about existentialism. I want to talk about that because this place doesn't lend itself to anything interesting . . .

Like love and death?

Like love and death . . . and existence and suffering and all the things that really matter. We have to come to terms with the notion of God. It's as if this place, more than any other I've encountered, makes it "God, what's that?" It's atheistic humanism. This place reeks of atheistic humanism.

God isn't an issue here, and for me I don't think there's a more important issue: either the notion of, or the problem of dealing with a universe without. If we disregard the question of what is the nature of the universe and whether or not there is a God, I think we're not living life fully. The secularization of learning is now nearly complete, so that even a large number of subjects in religion treat the universe as though the question of God doesn't even matter.

What should the role of the "self" be in the classroom?

The personal is inherently ambiguous. It's dynamic, it's explosive, it's overwhelming, it's filled with contradictions. I don't think the personal and the professional can be truly separated. I've gotten in trouble here mainly because I've tried to let the personal invade the professional, the personal invade the theoretical.

The best way to capture the world is to reveal the depths of the self. But that's not allowed because it's seen as psychotic to reveal the true depths of self. I'm not saying that every class should be where the professor comes in and explodes with these contradictory ideas. But shouldn't the professor have the opportunity at the end of class for ten or fifteen minutes to let the depths of self come out—the contradictory, ambiguous, deep, irrational self that probably, because it is all those things, will capture better the heart of what history is all about.

What do you think will happen to students who come out of our strict system of learning?

They're going to aid and abet systems of domination, exploitation and dehumanization. Probably unknowingly. One doesn't have to be consciously imperialistic to be aiding and abetting empire—empire involving patterns of exploitation and domination where you systematically dehumanize other people by reaping too many profits out of them.

Where do most of the people who come out of here go to work? This is not a liberal arts school; it's a prep school for New York banks.

To me, the definition of being human is to wreak havoc with the personal system and with the social system. What good is productivity and profit, what good is one-dimensional success? I see an enormous number of "well-educated", "successful", "profit-reaping" zombies who are about as far from being human as any creatures I could encounter. I don't want to look at thirty zombies in my class who have stripped themselves of unconscious desires, who have stripped themselves of thinking in truly creative terms of what they might become.

But as I engage in daily activities in the classroom and as I go to faculty meetings, I will be the public self who is just as much a zombie as the rest of them. Because you have to be, and part of me has become that in my heart.

Williams is like an emotional black hole.

At Williams, there are those who would say that a liberal arts education enable individuals to face the existential questions you've raised.

How are you going to make people think in that creative fashion when they have to spend most of their time cramming to learn so much. The demands on students here in terms of mechanical knowledge are so great that they have no time or energy left for being truly creative. It may not be that these people are uncreative, it may be that the system here demands so much in the way of mechanical learning that their creativity cannot show itself.

How Williams-specific is this problem?

(pause) O.K. Let me put it this way. Williams is not all that different from the world, but it's only at Williams that I've truly looked into the abyss.

Of what? "The abyss."

Of existence.

Williams is like an emotional black hole. It sucks in all people's emotions. It leaves them with one-dimensional instrumental rationality. One-dimensional desires. It says, There are a few people you can be yourself with around here, and the rest, you really have to put on an act, at least give the impression that you're perfectly rational, that there's nothing wrong with you, that you're entirely pleased with the setting. If you dig deep enough you can see a certain kind of anger here that I wasn't ready to get out.

I just want to clarify one thing. You said a minute ago that Williams is like the real world, and you also said that you'd never felt so detached from the real world here.

O.K. Well there are bound to be contradictions in great thinking, isn't there? (all laugh) Look at it this way. Look at this interview as more . . . This interview is going to have the intellectual merit of a Woody Allen movie. Absolutely none. (laugh) I'm not striving right now to be an intellectual. I could sit here and pontificate about the origins of war for the past two thousand years, and I could go on and on about this and pontificate about my latest research and how I'm dealing with multiple regression models and using path analysis and it's interesting because it allows you to look at direct and indirect casual connections in complex multivariate models and this type of thing . . . that's my intellectual world.

But I'm more than an academic, I'm more than an intellectual, and there is no chance to express it here and beyond that I don't want to. Williams has made me appreciate keeping myself, that is my true self, to myself.

What do you think you'll be doing five years from now?

I hope I'm doing something where I can challenge culture and maybe transform it.

I'm talking about the agenda of someone who feels that culture is essentially dehumanizing rather than liberating. Even though one can't predict what the impact will be of attacking the culture, do it anyway—in the service of inspiring people to be self-critical, to be critical of their institutions. That's it. I'm talking about permanent revolution in the realm of culture, applied to all aspects of human life.

That's what I've learned I have to keep completely to myself here; I can't talk about that nihilistic apprehension and relation to the universe.

"Think big ideas, think great transformations. Challenge yourself constantly—that's what I'm talking about. We have become far, far too comfortable as a civilization to think that this civilization can truly survive. This transformation is not towards some final endpoint, this is an indefinite human project as long as we're less than angels and more than beasts.

What do you mean specifically when you use the word nihilism?

I'm not saying nothing matters, I'm saying everything matters. I'm saying saving every human life is absolutely essential. The nihilism I'm talking about is not to kill human bodies, and it's not even to damage property in the interest of making a political statement; my nihilism is cultural nihilism: to attack ideas.

That is precisely what sub-cultures do. I'm interested in liminal people, I'm interested in outsiders. I'm interested in people on the fringe who don't quite fit in and aren't quite sure whether they'll be re-integrated or not. You don't find many of them around here. You find them in big cities. You find many Jews who are like that, many women who have embraced feminism, many Blacks. And you certainly find them in gay culture.

The more people try to maintain static culture in the face of what are essentially dynamic human beings, the more it will aid dynamic human beings, the more it will aid eventual transformation. Sometimes the best road to revolution is to make more visible the counter-revolutionaries.

So you have a great faith in an inner human dynamism?

Yeah, that's it. And society has tried harder and harder and harder to kill that faith, and they've come very close.

Who's winning, then?

Well, I am now.

COLLEGE COUNCIL ELECTIONS

As a public service to the Williams College community, the Record is printing these election statements from candidates for the offices of College Council President, Vice-President, and Treasurer.

The elections have been moved to next Monday and Tuesday, February 28 and March 1.

The statements represent the views of the candidates themselves, and are not necessarily those of the Record.

PRESIDENT

Joseph Beach

The council defines its role as "the official forum for student opinion and the representative thereof." As a house representative to Council this year, I have participated not only in the workings of the forum, but also in taking one product of those workings, namely the Pomilla Proposal, to the CUL, and discussing the proposal with them. While I feel the Pomilla Proposal is an excellent solution to the question of house transfers, I feel there are other problems whose solutions Council could at least help formulate. As council President, I would actively work for such solutions.

In order for there even to be solutions, though, students must be informed about the problems being addressed. Towards this end, I would enforce Council constitution Amendment VI, section B regarding expulsion of members for not meeting stated attendance requirements, and would strongly urge Council members to speak at house meetings at least once a month. Also, I would regularly meet with the Council's Information Committee to prepare a monthly newsletter, as well as determine other ways, for example town meetings and participation on newsview 92, to keep students well-informed about Council activities.

Additionally, I would meet regularly with the chairmen of Council Standing Committees and students on faculty-student committees to determine what matters being debated in those committees we feel we can bring to the attention of students for their opinions. I would also meet regularly with members of the Administration and Faculty to obtain their input into matters of concern to the college community.

Some specific issues I would address as President include a more active Council role in freshmen inclusion; a co-op representative to the Council; an increase in the Student Activities Tax, or alternate method, to better finance those organizations who solicit funds from the Council; and improvement of some of the physical conditions of Prospect House.

The ideas of cooperation, representation, and information are paramount to whatever issues Council addresses next year. Without them, I doubt the Council can effectively govern, and represent the opinions of the Student Body of Williams College.

Tom Paper

The direction of the College Council needs to be changed.

This past year the Council allocated money to student groups, appointed students to committees, and debated various issues and proposals. In addition, two major actions were attempted: first, a Williams athletics club; second, the town meeting and referendum on housing system priorities. On many topics proposals and resolutions were passed. However, here Council action stopped.

College Council can be a powerful forum of student opinion only with a strong interplay between itself and students. The actual powers of the Council are limited, as well as the time and interest students can devote to Council. Yet with strong leadership, the Council can overcome these limitations. I have three objectives for directing College Council.

First, organize the operation of the Council. The President must run Council meetings, coordinate events, and maintain channels of communication between Council, students, and important decision making groups on campus (CUL, Housing Committee, CEP, Deans, faculty). The President's organizational ability is vital to the strength of the Council.

Second, students and Council members often only have a vague understanding of campus issues. For those interested, the fundamental points of the issues which pertain to them must be clearly summarized.

Finally, students must be informed of what the Council is doing and how to become involved. To better inform students, I would revive the College Council Newsletter; also, the College Council bulletin board must be continually updated with Council minutes, agenda, and notices of all important upcoming meetings.

An effective Council can initiate specific actions which will enhance the quality of student life. I would like Council to sponsor a mini-convention the day before classes start each semester where majors from every department will be available in one setting to help students choose classes.

Some students may know me through The Juggler's Vein. This past year I have been an at-large Council representative. I believe I can provide the leadership, ideas, and energy which the students need in order to have an accessible and effective College Council.

Michael Sullivan

The students have the right to know precisely what functions the College Council President carries out and the candidate's ability to perform them. Three roles the president must execute are those of a listener, a mediator, and a motivator. This council is our forum for ideas. It is essential that the president listen to the concerned student who not only might be critical, but informative as well. But these "ideas" do not exist in a vacuum and a mediator necessarily works towards voicing every opinion, not simply the most popular view. The president's role as motivator arises in times of apathy or frustration when stagnance has resulted from an overworked proposal. I cannot discount the importance of creativity in this emphasis on active motivation.

As a Junior Advisor, I have been witness to each student's wealth of ideas and the consequences of student coexistence. It seems that the wealth of ideas that springs from student coexistence is enhanced by the encouraging environment of expression. The Council is no different. It should encourage those who seek an improvement of our life here to criticize and create. For if the Council refuses to listen, it is self-defeating.

There are several goals which I think are important. These goals include house unity, student awareness of administrative activities, and student presence in aspects of the school's enhancement. These goals would present themselves through particular issue directives which I advocate. First, I support a housing policy creating appeal to remain in the house of one's choice and a prioritized house transfer system. Second, I advocate much more student communication and representation in the Trustee decision-making process. Third, I advocate the establishment of an Arts Forum to attract speakers of renown.

Yet these concerns will come to fruition only if they coincide with student interest. Therefore, my goal is not to push Council-specific interest, but to make certain all views are given a fair hearing, and to carry out the wishes of the students through consensus. This Council cannot work for the demands of its officers, but must work for the goals of the students.

Jay Ward

Accountability to the Student Body. Legitimacy in the eyes of the Student Body. Efficiency in College Council operations. These are the goals of the Jay Ward-Bill Sawyers platform. Through a series of programs, we hope to realize our objectives.

Before I begin to outline why you should vote Ward-Sawyers, let me comment on why Bill and I are "running together". Since my freshman year as a member of Council, I've observed or have been a part of three Administrations. It struck me that in each of these Administrations, tensions between the President and the Vice-President were apparent due to the fact that they were elected separately. They came into office without the same ideas or same philosophy about Student Government. By running and, hopefully, being elected with Bill, we plan to minimize the ideological differences between the incoming President and Vice-President. Though I will work with any Vice-President that the Student Body selects. I have made plans with Bill Sawyers which I strongly desire to see through.

Why should you vote for Jay Ward for College Council President?

Experience: I've served on Council for three years, a year more than the other candidates combined, as a Freshman Council Rep., Minority Rep., and Vice-President. I've also served as the College Council Rep. to the C.E.P. and participated on the Financial Committee Guidelines Review Committee.

Leadership: Freshman year I was a Freshman Co-ordinator of the BSU. At WCFM I served a year as Personnel Director, and recently was elected Program Director. As Vice-President, I've led Council meetings in the absence of the President and chaired the Elections Committee which appoints student representatives to various committees.

Ideas: Under a Ward-Sawyers Administration, College Council will become a strong, effective representative of student opinion. We will minimize internal inconsistency and friction which has plagued the Council. The specifics of our ideas will be outlined in an all-campus mailing, but briefly they include: 1) reliance on small ad hoc committees to accomplish the work of Council, 2) more emphasis on Parliamentary Procedure in Council meetings, 3) distribution of more information on Council activities, 4) Accountability. Legitimacy. Efficiency. Vote for responsible Student Government. Vote for Ward-Sawyers.

TREASURER

Benjamin Bahn

The year in perspective

This past year the Finance Committee experienced an incredible increase in requests, with demands exceeding funds by 40%. Our job was difficult; many requests were cut. Nevertheless, we managed to fund many new groups, including the Republican, germinal, and the Committee for Palestinian Rights. Two groups folded, and two ceased requesting funds. We increased funding, however, for many others including Club baseball, Crew, Central American Concern Committee, men's and women's waterpolo, rugby, and the Record. We also funded several one time events such as the Jazz Ensemble and Comedy Show.

The job of Treasurer

The treasurer works with the Finance Committee to assess the needs of student organizations, insures adherence to funding guidelines, reports Finance Committee activities to the Council, and presents the budget to them for approval.

The treasurer combines both the qualities of a diplomat with those of a pragmatist in funding groups while maintaining the sustaining fund necessary to meet unforeseen requests and opportunities (i.e. concerts or speakers). My experiences on the Finance Committee have prepared me well for such a role.

Looking ahead

Due to increases in requests, number of groups and the Student Activities Tax (S.A.T.), which has not been increased in three years, I propose to increase the S.A.T. from $66 to $75. This would increase by $18,000 the total of $125,000 now spent on student activities. I also propose to synchronize the academic and fiscal years. Currently, the budget is passed during the fall, and has historically delayed groups activities due to delays, budget cuts and changes. I want to see each budget passed in the spring before that year, so groups could begin work in September.

The sufficient and timely funding of student groups is of utmost importance. Social/cultural events, political expression, sports and service groups provide opportunities beyond the scope of the academic, maintaining a balance essential at Williams. The commitment to the non-academic, is important to fostering a complete learning experience. As treasurer, I will remain committed to these goals, expanding and diversifying the depth of student experience on campus. Thank you.

Hamilton Humes

Working on the Finance Committee I was disturbed by several problems of the budget process. The first was the difficulty of communication between the Finance Committee and the applying organizations, with the added obstacle of finding who was responsible for the finances of different groups and then contacting them. The second was that the lack of understanding of the budget process. The length of the process wore out many members of the committee with other responsibilities which made it hard to get the committee together.

I see the major way to solve these problems is to intensify and greatly accelerate ate the budget process. The first step would be to hold a large meeting this year with the Finance Committee and the people who will be responsible for the finances of the different organizations in the following year in order to explain the procedure and logistics of the budget process. Secondly, only these people would fill out the budget requests, so we know whom to deal with the following year.

On the first day of classes in the fall another large meeting would be held to explain any new problems and allow scheduling of meetings between FinCom members and club representatives. After a week to allow for these individual meetings a blitz of six straight FinCom meetings would bring the completion of a preliminary budget. In the following week, groups could be contacted again if the points need to be clarified. The Finance Committee could then finalize the 1983-84 CC budget by September 30.

Such an acceleration would create a clear period when the budget would be structured, allowing the FinCom members to fix a schedule and focus their energies on the budget. The large meetings would clear up the basic questions of the budget process with the added benefit of allowing an easy method for FinCom members to contact the club representatives. The acceleration would allow organizations to know their finances and to challenge the budget without delaying the final budget past Christmas.

I believe this will greatly accelerate and make more efficient the financial procedure of the College Council

The College Council meets weekly in Griffin Hall.

VICE-PRESIDENT

Bill Sawyers

It is the College Council Vice-President who, along with the President, is most responsible for the success or failure of College Council. I believe that during 1983-84 we can turn College Council into a truly representative student government which the entire college community will respect.

Many students at Williams feel that the administration and faculty have made certain decisions (e.g. refusal to allow pets on campus, discontinuation of row house dining, and most recently the limitation of inter-house transfer groups to two people and freshman inclusion groups to four) against the vast majority of the student's wishes. This, in my opinion, is partly due to the absence of a strong and unified body which can vocally represent the views of the students.

As a Student Assembly representative at the University of Utah, I saw what an effective student government can do. As the Chief Justice of the University Judiciary there, I also saw the problems that a student government can face, and how those problems can be solved. As a College Council representative from both Armstrong and Dennett houses, I've gained experience in dealing with the issues which College Council must face. As College Council Vice President I would work to give the Council legitimacy in the eyes of the students, the faculty, and the administration.

This year, Jay Ward and I have decided to campaign together. We have outlined a few of our plans for improving College Council and you will be receiving our platform in your S.U. Boxes in the next few days. Jay and I have the ideas, the experience, and the good, working relationship needed to make College Council what it should be. We would appreciate your vote in the upcoming primary elections February 28 and March 1, and the final elections March 7 and 8.

Only College Council can guarantee that students will be heard on campus issues. A responsible Council must keep the students informed, gather their ideas, and then effectively work to protect student interests. The Council is purely representative, compared with other campus groups which indirectly interpret the needs of the students—from the Trustees to the Housing Committee. The College Council must force student input into the decision-making process of the college.

But don't the students on CUL, CEP, and the Housing Committee represent the students?

Not necessarily. Rarely do CEP and CUL candidates or House Presidents issue platforms before they are elected. Students often don't know what sort of "representation" they're voting for. Further, when was the last time your CUL or CEP representative asked you for your opinion on any issue? Ending row-house dining? Limiting transfers?

Only College Council has a direct and ongoing mechanism for soliciting student opinion—the C.C. house representatives.

Why are you so wary of these committees?

Last year, the CUL mandated that "the current system of house transfers would not be continued"—despite numerous Record editorials, Council objections, the Gifford Committee report, and the wishes of most students. Further, the CUL usurped the Housing Committee from the Council and claimed it as a sub-committee—without consulting the Council and contradicting the Council's constitution.

So what can the College Council do?

Linking the students and the college's decision-makers, College Council must lobby the ruling bodies while remaining accessible to the students. Unless council uses its representatives more effectively, the students will lose their opportunity to monitor and affect the decision-making process.

My commitment to College Council goes back over a year and a half. Since that time I co-authored new funding guidelines which regulate our $120,000 budget. I am a member of the Elections Committee, which I would chair as Vice-President.

Jan Van Eck

What is College Council?

College Council represents the student body. The Council distributes over $120,000 to all types of student organizations. For me, College Council acts as the voice of the students.

Jamboree jumps with variety

by Amy Doherty

Last Friday night, the Williams Springstreeters hosted a Winter Carnival Jamboree featuring Williams vocal ensembles, singing groups from four other colleges and a Williams juggling act, all interspersed with "commercials" performed by members of the Williams groups.

The visiting singers offered a wide variety of music, ranging from the very short rendition of Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" sung by Matthew's Minstrels from Vassar to the Wellesley Tupelos' spunky "Stray Cat Strut."

Golden retriever

The all-female Yale group, Proof-of-the-Pudding, gave a confident and sophisticated performance. During one of their songs, they refused to be daunted by a series of spontaneous stage appearances from the wings by Balloo, Squash Coach Sean Sloane's golden retriever, who had a squash racquet in his mouth. And Bowdoin's Whatfour sang with spirit, maintaining well the careful harmonies characteristic of barbershop quartet music.

The Williams groups were equally enjoyable. Euphoria donned shades and removed skirts for one of their livelier tunes, Bruce Springsteen's "Fire."

The traditional rivalry between the Octet and the Springstreeters was alluded to frequently during the evening, but the evening's performance demonstrated that the two groups are equally endowed with plenty of musical talent and stage presence. Both groups are sweet and precise rhythmically and harmonically.

Only ovation

Once again, Essence was one of the highlights of the evening. The fact that they were a little sloppy hardly detracted from the rich musicality and feeling of their singing. In their last piece, Chaka Khan's gospel-type "Roll Me Through the Rushes," soloist Allison Ashley sent tingles down the audience's spine with her incredibly powerful and flexible voice, and afterwards Essence received the only standing ovation of the night.

Tom Paper and Tim Sedlock's juggling act provided an entertaining interlude. They joked with the audience, juggled around a nervous Vassar man's head and tossed six juggling pins back and forth with their backs turned toward each other.

The entire evening was extremely enjoyable, and the good-sized audience was very appreciative.

"New Order" releases lively synth-pop EP: FACTUS 8

by Brett McDonnell

One of the latest New Things in music from England is electro-pop, made popular by bands like The Human League, Soft Cell, and A Flock of Seagulls. Another band of this type, New Order, has received less widespread attention, although they make much better music.

A recent New Order EP, which for want of a better name I'll call Factus 8, shows why they deserve more notice and airplay. Their recent singles, gathered together on this EP, mix a disco-like beat, synthesizers, and the energy of punk to create joyous, uplifting music.

This should amaze anyone who knows New Order's background. Three-quarters of New Order used to be three-quarters of Joy Division, by far the most depressing rock group I have ever heard. The second and final Joy Division album, Closer, effectively draws the listener into its own world of despair.

Joy Division ended when the lead singer, songwriter, and creative spirit of the group, Ian Curtis, hanged himself. With a past like that, one would not expect much in the way of joy from New Order.

Such is not the case. Last summer's single "Temptation" best illustrates the New Order sound. Sometimes soaring vocals, a constantly bubbling synthesizer, and a crisp rhythm section led to urgent, danceable music.

Unlike Joy Division, the lyrics in New Order do not matter too much. The most affecting lines in "Temptation" are "Up, down, turn around/Please don't let me hit the ground. Tonight I think I'll walk alone/I'll find my soul inside no hole." But it is the musical context that gives these lines power.

The new EP contains "Temptation", but in a longer and watered-down version. It also contains "Temptation's" flip side, "Hurt," also in a lengthened version. "Everything's Gone Green" and "Procession," the two songs on a single released before "Temptation," are also on the EP. The three latter songs are similar to "Temptation," but not quite as good.

The other song on the EP, and the only one previously unavailable as far as I know, is "Mesh." "Mesh" is more low-key than the other songs, but good. Especially enjoy the quirky piano and horns (at least they sound like horns—they might be synthesized).

Vacuous lyrics

Even though this music is high quality and right on the edge of some of the most exciting things happening in rock today, it might appeal to many Williams students (imagine that). The upbeat sound and unimportant, vacuous lyrics make just the right combination for musical taste in the Berkshires.

New Order has not created much music so far. Curtis died in 1980 and New Order's first single, "Ceremony," came out in 1981. "Ceremony," originally meant for Joy Division, removes the gloom of Curtis and puts in its place the bright sound of New Order at its best. Their only full album, Movement, has two great songs—"Dreams Never End" and "Denial." The rest sounds like a shallower, more synthesized Joy Division.

CUL, CC fight over Housing Committee

by David Kleit

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) and a delegation from the College Council discussed the issues of the recent Housing controversy at a meeting last Tuesday.

While there was general agreement about the merits of the Pomilla proposal, disagreement over the role of the Housing Committee and the validity of the recent referendum on housing issues sponsored by the College Council dominated the meeting.

The value of the referendum, which was criticized before voting had even started by CUL chairman Cris Roosenraad as "vague," was questioned by several of those present who pointed to very low voter turnout, poorly phrased questions and a lack of student awareness of issues. Less than 400 students voted.

College Council President Stuart Robinson '83 admitted that the "overall turnout was disappointing." He also noted that the questions could have been phrased better.

Referendum was valid

Roosenraad then asked if that means the referendum should be disregarded. Council Vice President Jay Ward '84 responded that the referendum was valid. He argued that the turnout should be ignored and the percentages on each question be considered more important.

The dispute over the Housing Committee was argued at length. Ward stated that the Housing Committee should be under the control of College Council. He said the Council should be consulted by and have approval over the committees. The participants then debated which group represents student opinion better.

Ward claimed that the Housing Committee, once formed, becomes a collective body removed from student opinion. He said, "They are answerable to no one as the Housing Committee." The solution would be to make it accountable to Council, he said. One student member of the CUL stated that "the Housing Committee has a stronger claim to legitimacy than the CC on that particular issue."

Housing Committee Co-chairman John Carlson '83 sharply disagreed. He argued that the committee is a representative body. He noted that the "house president certainly goes back to the House" for input.

Faculty meeting

In other business, the faculty continued to discuss issues related to South African apartheid and divestment.

ACSR representatives

One of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition's (WAAC) January demands was that the College reconsider how the members of the Advisory Board for Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) were selected.

In the past, both student and faculty representatives have been selected by the president of the College.

In compliance with WAAC's request, Dean Daniel O'Connor introduced a motion which provided for the election of faculty representatives by the faculty themselves.

Personally, the Dean said he did not favor the motion, for he believed that it "implied that past faculty members did not do a good job" even though the majority of both student and faculty members selected by the president had been "sympathetic to divestment."

As a counterproposal, Steering Committee Chairman Robert Kozelka introduced a motion that his committee study the various ways by which faculty members could be appointed to the ACSR. Kozelka said that the Steering Committee's options included faculty elections and the present system of appointments, as well as other alternatives. He stressed that his committee would "solicit student and faculty input."

The faculty approved Kozelka's proposal by a 49-19 vote.

History professor Robert G. L. Waite said that although he felt that WAAC's confrontation with the trustees was "regrettable and reprehensible," it is still absolutely vital that the Williams faculty not be silent, but continue to speak out against the evil of apartheid.

a minority search to help identify strong candidates nationwide."

Assistant Director of Admissions Mike Reed '75 commented "I don't think that we are suffering [from negative feelings generated by the cross burning] any longer. I didn't encounter any questions about it when I was travelling."

Concerns about money

Another issue of concern, particularly in the wake of the Reagan cutbacks in federal student funding, was the question of financial aid. Although Smith admitted he encountered "more concern about money and financing" he did not speculate on the effects of the recent economic situation on the number of applications received because the figures for the financial aid candidates have not yet been processed.

He asserted, however, that "Williams is in great financial shape—everyone who needs funding can get it," a message emphasized in a letter sent to prospective students in December. In addition, the college continues to practice an aid-blind policy in admissions.

Smith also reported a temporary drop in the number of applications from women. Only 42 percent of this year's early decision applications were submitted by women, a fact which may be related to the alleged attacks on campus women reported last winter.

However, applications have since been "even keeled," according to Smith, and "for the entire applicant pool the ratio bounced back to forty-five percent women and fifty-five percent men."

Smith also mentioned that more time has been devoted to travelling in the South and in California in an effort to attain a greater geographic distribution.

Phil Smith can still smile even though applications are down by more than ten percent. (Schell) dence of non-white leadership and timetables for further reforms. Also included at Lamb's request was an inquiry into why they withdrew from the Sullivan pact in 1981.

Provost Hodge Markgraf explained that the letter would be similar to one sent to Newmont Industries in 1981. The committee recommended divestiture for Newmont two years ago after several letters were sent to the management. "We became frustrated with the management," said Markgraf, "and recommended divestiture to the Trustees' Financial Committee." The Newmont stock was then sold.

Correspondence from Warner Communications indicated that it could not comply with the Sullivan Principles due to the small size of its operation in South Africa and "the unique nature of its business." Warner also claimed that it had received a satisfactory rating but that it was not included in the most recent Arthur D. Little report.

Markgraf suggested that the ACSR call ADL to confirm Warner's claim. The motion passed without objection.

ITT subsidiaries fail

The committee considered action against International Telephone and Telegraph because one of their subsidiaries, Supersonic Industries, failed to comply. Lamb pointed out that other companies connected with ITT had also failed to comply, but that ITT owned less than a 50 percent interest in these groups. He advocated dealing with Supersonic first since it was the only wholly-owned subsidiary that had failed to comply.

Markgraf pointed out that another South African subsidiary, Tevis Engineering, had received exemplary marks in the Sullivan report. Reed said he felt that ITT was making an honest attempt to comply, stating that a senior vice-president had recently been sent to South Africa for on-site inspections.

The committee decided to send a letter demanding wage scales and timetables for reform, as well as the reasons for the discrepancy between the practices of Tevis and Supersonic. Barnett asked that the letter also mention the unsatisfactory rating of the partially-owned subsidiaries.

GE action postponed

Markgraf pointed out that the same minority-interest problem occurred with General Electric. He explained that Defy Industries, a GE subsidiary, received an unsatisfactory rating and caused GE to be labelled a noncomplier.

"GE owns less than 30 percent of Defy, and otherwise, they received top ratings," he said. The committee decided to postpone discussion of GE until other more flagrant violators had been dealt with.

Barnett also spoke of establishing contact with the European Economic Council to see if they conducted any monitoring of European companies in South Africa.

African civilization, Egypt's roots revealed

by Tim Johnson

Was the ancient Egyptian civilization—considered the cradle of Western civilization by many historians—a derivative of a black African empire?

Rutgers anthropologist and linguist Ivan Van Sertima attacked the allegedly racist attitudes he had encountered in contemporary anthropologic circles towards the African-Egyptian link theory and other topics in African history, in a lecture last Thursday in Brooks-Rogers.

"The exclusive focus of anthropology is on the peripheral tribes in pre-colonial Africa," he explained. "It would be as if one chose to study the northern European barbarian to gain an understanding of the Roman Empire."

Egyptian roots

Van Sertima explained the theory that the ancient Egyptian civilization had its roots in black African history. He described the Nubian Empire—which thrived in the regions of the southern Nile centuries before the first Egyptian dynasty—as a society that used the same complex mathematics, efficient architectural planning, and hieroglyphics, which modern history has labelled as Egyptian advancements.

Van Sertima theorized that the Egyptian people were products of the Syrian invasions into the Nubian kingdom. He asserted that most anthropologists rejected this theory, which was first proposed over ten years ago, until recent satellite photographs revealed the indisputable marks of a civilization buried under the desert sands to the south and west of present-day Egypt.

Van Sertima also described evidence of an African presence in Central and South America well before the Spanish explorers encountered the flourishing Inca Empire in the fifteenth century. He rendered an account of an early episode in Ecuador history in which 17 shipwrecked Africans were defiled and appointed governors in the society.

Racist Intellectuals

He referred the audience to evidence of various navigational advances—such as compasses, maps of ocean currents, and sturdy boats—that would have enabled the African peoples who inhabited the Niger River area to sail the Atlantic in that era. He added that, for the last century, anthropologists have blamed the statues' African features on blunt tools used by their ancient American sculptors.

The Rutgers University professor related shocking encounters with racist intellectuals while he was researching the subject of African navigation across the Atlantic. He overheard one renowned English scholar remark, "first, we had to hear ridiculous stories about flying saucers, and now we have to bear the tale of the trans-Atlantic Negro."

On another occasion, he received a letter from a noted South African anthropologist—who mistook him as a white because of his Dutch name—which read, "I cannot understand how these items [black Africans] came over to cross the ocean. Surely they must have been transported by some human being [white European]."

Van Sertima asserted that such attitudes have turned the world's eyes away from recent evidence that attests to the existence of several technically-advanced African cultures in pre-colonial eras. He related that most educated people stereotype all pre-colonial Africans as barefoot, jungle-dwelling savages.

Yet recent archeological discoveries show otherwise. In 1978, a 2,000-year-old iron-smelting furnace was unearthed in Tanzania. The ancient furnace was proven to once have been more efficient than its late nineteenth century German counterpart, he said.

Van Sertima claimed that the Western world closes its eyes to the wealth of these African cultures.

The European imperialists landed on the African continent at the bleakest moment in that continent's history, according to Van Sertima. The innovative Songhai Empire in Eastern Africa was decadent—without the fruits of its many technological advances—when the British arrived. And the militant Shona Empire in Southern Africa was locked in a destructive civil war when the Portuguese set foot on their land in the eighteenth century, Van Sertima said.

Alumni give two million

President Chandler announced that this year's Alumni Fund raised $2,349,537 for the college endowment and operating expenses. He explained that this was "remarkable in several ways."

First, he said that all gifts were made in cash. During previous drives many alumni pledged money and paid later.

In addition, the goal for participation was exceeded. Chandler noted that 65.44 percent of the alumni contributed to the drive. This year's goal was to involve 65 percent, he said.

While the results were gratifying, Chandler added that for the first time in a decade, the Alumni Fund failed to reach its target, which this year was $2.4 million. However, he expressed gratitude toward the alumni who contributed.

"The drive solicits all alumni, even those who we know are angry," Chandler explained.

Critic eyes 'cheap thrills'

The popular culture, according to English professor Morris Dickstein of Queens College CUNY, is distinctive from any other period in history. His lecture "Cheap Thrills: The Criticism of the Popular Culture" dealt with the "new criticism of popular culture."

Until recently most critics simply wrote off popular culture as trash, Dickstein said. They felt only "high" or accepted culture was worth their attention. Dickstein pointed to the 1960's as the prime reason for the shift in attention. At that time, the line between popular and "high" culture began to blur as all artists began to use elements of popular culture in their work, he said.

The real problem, according to Dickstein, is that there is no language of criticism for the popular culture. He explained that the standard language of criticism doesn't work. He used the example of a colleague who, in writing a book on television, tried to compare Kojak to King Lear. It didn't work, he said.

Separate out non-art

Dickstein gave three basic guidelines for criticism of the popular culture. First, he stated that the critic must divide the art from the non-art in popular culture.

Secondly, Dickstein said that the unit of study must be determined. For example, a television show can be studied as an entity unto itself or as a part of a season series.

Finally, Dickstein cautioned critics to be aware of what role commercial pressures play in popular art. Time, he explained, seems to be one of the most important elements to the study of popular culture, "for today's trash may be tomorrow's popular classic."

B & G promotes

Winthrop M. Wassenar, Director of Physical Plant at Williams, has announced two promotions and one new appointment in the College's department of Buildings and Grounds.

David Westall of Williamstown was appointed to the newly-created position of Assistant Director for Architectural Services. He is a registered architect in Massachusetts and Vermont and a former town building inspector.

Norman Quinn, also of Williamstown, was promoted to the new position of Building Trades and Grounds Supervisor, and Lawrence Luczynski of Readsboro, Vermont took over his former position as carpenter Foreman.

Wassenar commented on the appointments: "I'm particularly pleased to be able to promote within our ranks for two of these positions, and that the new member of our team (Westall) has lived in Williamstown since 1961."

Frogs fascinate faculty

Professor David C. Smith discussed the importance of "a balance of nature" in an ecological environment and its relation to his research in frog populations at last Thursday's faculty lecture. This was the third in a series of lectures given by Williams faculty designed to promote greater awareness of faculty research.

Smith presented highlights of his research on how frog populations are controlled. Smith pointed to a frog's interesting ecology, including its various lifestyles, sizes and breeding characteristics, as reasons making the frog worthy of study.

"If you go out and look at a frog species, you will find each one has a characteristic breeding place," he said. "If you go back to the habitat year after year, you will find it remains constant."

"Complex lifecycle"

Smith noted that frogs have a "complex lifecycle" and called a frog "two different animals rolled up into one," because the frog has two stages in its development and lives in two different places during its development.

Smith concentrated on tadpole development because mortality occurs at this stage. He stressed that population control occurs in the interaction of three conditions—the location of the pools where tadpoles live, predators, and competition for food within the pools.

Smith reached the conclusion that understanding mortality is key to understanding the control of the life-cycle. "There is a lot of death among frogs," stated Smith. "Five or six out of 1,000 eggs usually make it, and of 1,000 eggs only half last as larva," he continued.

Capitalism condemned

"There are three basic problems with capitalism: inequality, inefficiency, and constraints on the government's ability to act democratically," argued economics professor Juliet Schor in her Thursday night lecture, "The Economics of Socialism."

She explained that inequality results from the private ownership of companies. Because people have varying degrees of access to the means of production, she said, they therefore develop unequal power.

By threatening to withdraw of capital or investments, firms have power over employment which challenges the ability of the government to carry out the will of the people, she contended.

As Schor sees it, socialism would promote equality and efficiency through collective ownership of the means of production at either the national level (by the government) or firm level (by the workers); centralized planning for the allocation of goods; and greater democracy in both companies and the nation as a whole, including worker self-management and increased use of referenda by the government.

Worker control

An alternative form of socialism, Schor conjectured, would maintain the current economic system, but require collective ownership of each company by its workers. She feels, however, that such an economic arrangement would still possess most of the problems of capitalism.

Schor pointed out that traditional anti-communism in the United States and notions of "human nature" have created powerful resistance to socialism.

She contended that "Social structures form human nature," and that there is no innate materialism in people that would prevent socialism from working.

Teams line up for 24-hour race

24-Hour Relay? What's this crazy notion?

Well, it not only is crazier than dance marathons, ergathons, etc., but is the oldest of these campus fund-raising events, entering its 12th year in 1983. The relay holds an amazing track record in the first 11 versions, both in terms of campus participation and donations. And now is the time to prepare for both.

Saturday, March 12 at 10:00 a.m. approximately 15 teams

Set" Doucette wore out their Lord Jeff opponents at the number five and nine positions respectively in winning 3-0. Rob Kent '84 posted the team's eighth victory at the number eighth position in a hard fought 3-1 victory.

The only loss of the day came in the number one match. Junior Jeff Sultar was edged out in the final point of the fourth game after a relentless comeback effort against Amherst will toe the line in Towne Field House to commence 24 hours of continuous running—one mile at a time by team members in rotation. Official teams that will attempt to break the Williams RoadRunners (1975 squad) world record of 278 miles can have no more than 10 members, but most teams are of the 'unlimited' variety, including spots for guest milers. Housing units, club, sports teams, and friends have formed teams in the past. If interested, start organizing (and training) now, stalwart Steve Gordon.

The Ephs' win over Amherst is even more impressive given that they were playing without the services of aces Greg Zaff and Tom Harritty, who are at the Nationals, as well as junior Bill Little, who is sidelined with an ankle injury.

The team is confident that they can complete a Little Three Title sweep when they face Wesleyan at home next Saturday.

Hoopsters split week

by John Clayton

"We played fat and sassy," said Coach Curt Tong of the basketball team's 68-60 loss to Wesleyan Saturday night.

"We played like we'd beaten them before and now we had them at home, and it was going to be a cakewalk. And you can't play like that without more giftedness than we have on our team."

Wesleyan pulled out of a see-saw battle with five minutes left in the game, exploiting the transition game to take up to an eleven point lead. The Cardinals shot 72 percent from the floor in the second half.

Scoring leaders

Senior forward Andy Goodwin led Williams with 16 points, while senior co-captain Scott Olesen had 12 and freshman guard Tim Walsh added ten.

Wesleyan was led by Greg Porydzy with 20 points and Paul Gallivan with 13, while Pat Ryan and Chris Brown had 12 apiece. This was the first game that Gallivan and fellow big-man Martin McDonough had been healthy at the same time.

"We needed extreme intensity tonight," said Tong, "and it just wasn't there. Our problem was an intangible one."

Williams had a slight edge for most of the first half, and retained a 28-26 halftime lead. They overcame some small Cardinal leads early in the second half, but were unable to gain control of the game.

Williams (10-8) is now 1-2 in Little Three competition, and must hope that Wesleyan beats Amherst next week so that if the Ephmen whip the Lord Jeffs the next week they can force a three-way tie for the title.

Root RPI

Last Tuesday, the Ephmen routed RPI for their eighth win in nine games. A 15 point run in the second half sparked the victory.

Olesen and junior guard Art Pldorlano led the team with 18 points apiece.

The Ephmen spoiled the last game of RPI Coach Bill Kalbaugh, whose record in 30 years of coaching is 296-344.

Williams travels to Clark tonight, and Tufts (where their game will be on local cable TV) on Saturday.

that impressive this year, but this time they worked it to perfection, taking only 11 seconds to score. Ed Finn '83 registered the goal on a crisp feed from Wysocki. Rutledge completed the hat trick with an empty-net goal with 40 seconds remaining on the clock.

Once again goalkeeper Finn turned in a dazzling performance in the net, making 46 saves on the evening, including several sparklers in the first period, when the Panthers threatened to skate away with the game.

Hapless Hamilton

On Tuesday, the Ephs gained their seventh win of the season over hapless Hamilton College, 6-2, as co-captain Bob Brownell '83 turned in a hat trick of his own.

Mark Winters '85 opened the scoring with a surprising break-away goal at 9:11 of the first period. Hamilton briefly tied the score on a goal by Bob Howe, but Brownell gave the Ephs the lead for good with his first goal, which came at the 17:18 mark of the opening period.

Brownell tallied another goal at :40 of the second, while Pachus and Jackson also scored second-period goals to give the Ephs a 5-1 edge. Carl Norbeck closed it to 5-2 at 2:09 of the third, but it was simply a case of too little, too late. Brownell finished off the scoring with his third goal at the 14:10 mark.

The two wins gave Williams a skein of four straight victories, and improved their seasonal record to 7-15.

The Ephmen close out their season at home tonight against highly-touted Babson at 7:30.

Ephfools frolic in silly games

In a return to some of the traditional elements of a Williams education which had been overlooked in recent years, many students participated in a plethora of silly and stupid activities this weekend as part of the Outing Club Winter Carnival festivities.

The day started with a Trike race around the Freshman Quad. "Any team that thought they won the race," said Dan Flaherty '83, one of the day's organizers, "didn't abide by the rules. The rules said the trike had to have only one pilot. Most of the trikes that made it to the finish line had more than one pilot."

Best dressed

Darth Vader lookalike Gordon Renneisen '83 won the best-dressed pilot award, while the best-dressed pit crew was the seven dwarves. Rick Hayton '84 and Teresa Casey '86 won the Williams Engineering Award for their trike which hitched two people to the front.

This was the first Trike race since 1974, and, hopefully, will be repeated in future years.

To the skin

The fun continued on Poker Flats with less athletic, if not less meaningful, events than those on Brodie Mountain.

Tim McFadden '86 demonstrated his amazing lack of dining etiquette by winning the Jello-sucking contest. John Woodard '86, not to be outdone, ate an entire banana (skin and all) to tie for the Banana Eating for Style contest. Woodard shared the prize with a skilled Ephwoman whose oral prowess left neither man nor banana unmoved. At the crowd's bequest, Woodard and his opponent repeated their feats, but the crowd was equally aroused by both.

Andy McElfresh '85, however, took the speed half of the banana event.

"A known Canadian"

The snowshoe-throwing competition was won, Flaherty and co-organizer Nico Howson agreed, by "a known Canadian."

Jim Reardon '85 showed characteristic lack of regard for sanity or safety in his life-threatening dive onto the tray jump to score the only perfect "10".

Kegs kept the enjoyment flowing for participants and observers alike.

Snow sculpture

In a less bolsterous competition on Saturday, several houses entered the annual Snow Sculpture contest.

Armstrong won with their rendition of an octopus wrapped around Captain Nemo's submarine, the Nautilus. Dopey in his doghouse won second place for Morgan, while A-Gar-Wood tied with Dodd for third place with sculptures of the bear from the Jungle Book and Jimney Cricket, respectively.

Squashwomen slam Little Three rivals

The women's squash team, currently ranked sixth in the country after their 3-3 record at last weekend's Howe Cup tournament in New Haven, easily disposed of Little Three rivals Amherst and Wesleyan on Saturday by 6-1 scores.

"It was our best match of the season considering that Cassie Fisher (number two player on the team) wasn't able to play," said Williams Coach Curt Tong.

Williams improved their overall record to 9-9 with the double victory. Barbara Relfer split her two matches, defeating Amherst's Carol Zinke (3-2) but losing to Wesleyan's Karen Adair (3-1). Hilary Thomas beat both of her opponents at the number two position; first Amherst's Allison Slaot fell (3-0), then Wesleyan's Megan Spittle followed.

Williams' Lisa Buckley lost her Amherst match but topped Wesleyan's Tamm Rosengarth (3-0). Buckley's Eph teammate Heidi Halleck took the measure of Amherst's Pam Mix (3-2) and Wesleyan's Heather Croe (3-1).

Williams' number five, six, and seven players never lost a game all day. Liz Cole shutout Amherst's Hilary Mason and Wesleyan's Lisa Campoli; Amlina Mahmood blanked Ann Savage and Susan Bakst; and Mary Pynchon, playing in her first match of the season because of Fisher's absence, stymied Kelly Mehr and Karen Hont.

The team will be in action again on Tuesday at home against Smith.

Squash drills Amherst

Last Saturday the men's squash team triumphed in superior form 8-1 over arch-rival Amherst. The match revealed a vastly improved Eph squad rebounding from their loss to Trinity last week.

Senior members of the team provided the crushing blow to the Lord Jeffs. Senior co-captain Matt Lynch drilled his powerful forehand swing by his bewildered opponent in posting a 3-0 victory at the seven position.

Senior Marc Sopher, playing number five, put in his finest performance of the season with hard serves, volleys, and rallies driving his opponent out of the center of the court giving him an easy 3-0 victory.

The other matches demonstrated the high experience level of the Williams' squad. Bill Nau '84 at the number two position used finesse and multi-angled shots to dispatch his opponent 3-0. Jamie King '84 used sheer power in winning 3-0 at number three.

Doug Robie '86 at number four volleyed his way to a 3-0 victory against a well-matched Amherst opponent. Sophomores Ben Thompson and Pete "No

Matmen close season

by Chris Clarye

In their final action of the season, the wrestling squad fought their way to a ninth place finish in the New England Championships held at the Coast Guard Academy this weekend.

The team's performance was highlighted by the strong individual showings of tri-captain John Donovan, Jeff May and Gary Stosz.

Donovan, a 134 pound senior, finished fifth overall, upsetting second-seeded Eric Krasnoo of Wesleyan early in the tournament and Cahill of powerful Western New England in the quarterfinals.

Senior heavyweight Stosz ended up third in his division, losing a very close match, 4-2, to Newton of Coast Guard in the semifinals. With only forty seconds to go Stosz was down by one point and in a controlling position. He allowed Newton to escape in order to try for the winning takedown, but was unable to pull it off.

May, a sophomore wrestling at 150 lbs., had a superb tournament, finishing second and narrowly missing qualification for the nationals. Coast Guard's Kinset was the only obstacle May was unable to overcome in the double elimination format, as he lost to him twice.

Women win in overtime

by Sara Griffiths

In their second meeting with Wesleyan, the women's basketball team came from behind to defeat the Cardinals 57-52 on Saturday.

During the first half, Williams had trouble making shots fall in and the offensive rebounding was weak. The sharp passing of Wesleyan's offense gave the tough Eph defense a good workout. At the close of the half, the score was 28-20 in the Cardinals' favor.

At the start of the second half, co-captain Cathy Evans '83 sparked the offensive play and Williams tied up the score. The lead see-sawed back and forth. The score was tied at 48 with a minute left; Kay Lackey '85 put in some key foul shots and the lead went to Williams. Wesleyan tied the score at 50 as regulation period came to a close.

Coach pleased

Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin was pleased with the team's play during overtime. "They just kept chipping away at Wesleyan's defense and scored 7 unanswered points before Wesleyan even got on the scoreboard."

High scorers for Williams were Kay Lackey with 20, 14 of which were in the second half, and Tracy Burrows '84 and Thalia Meehan '83 with 14 apiece. Meehan led the team in rebounds with 16.

Little Three battle

The battle for the Little Three title takes place on March 2 at Williams. The best result for Williams can hope for is a tie as Amherst has beaten them once already.

The next game is Feb. 22 at Williams against Smith.

Magic rules

Black Magic won this year's women's intramural basketball tournament by defeating the Gladden House "Super Pickles" 13-12 last Monday night.

Black Magic, the Black Student Union team, finished with a 6-0 record, good for first place, while the Super Pickles were 5-1 and Spencer-Brooks finished third with a 3-2 record.

The six-week tournament involved 14 teams and two leagues—Monday - Wednesday and Tuesday - Thursday. Top teams then competed against each other in the playoffs.

The championship was a repeat of last year's game, when Black Magic again beat the Super Pickles by one point.

Two-on-two

Gary Pfaff '83 and Mike Jones '83 dribbled their way to victory in the men's division of the Miller two-on-two last Friday.

Mace Foehl '85 and Erin Sahr '84 won the women's division; and Peter Griffith '85 and Cathy Evans '83 won the mixed competition.

Women fall

In an encore performance from a game at Wesleyan two weeks ago, the women's hockey team lost to the Cardinals 5-4 in the last minute.

Williams goals were scored by senior co-captains Meredith McGill and Bea Fuller, Sally Hart '86 and Pam Briggs '84, as they traded goals with the Cardinals all afternoon. Wesleyan beat Williams 8-7 in the last minute in their last meeting.

The Ephwomen close out their season this week with UConn Thursday night at 7:00 and Skidmore Saturday at 2:00.

CUL, CC-

"Because they are more active (than in the past), the potential threat of Housing Committee actions not in the student's interests is greater," said Ward. He claimed that last year's Housing Committee was out of step with student opinion.

CUL member Professor Jill Nassivera countered, stating, "I'm sensing a degree of paranoia about last year." Ward responded that he was "not paranoid but reactionary. I've been hurt once and don't want to be hurt again."

There appeared to be general agreement on the advisability of adopting the Pomilla (prioritized lottery) Proposal. Robinson stated that the Council still supports the measure and Roosenraad stated his own favorable inclination towards the proposal.

Robinson and Roosenraad attempted to downplay differences between the two groups.

Alpiners claim top spot

by John Clayton

John Pler and Crawford Lyons took one-two in the slalom to propel the men's Alpine team to first place in this weekend's Winter Carnival at Brodie Mountain.

Williams Coach Bud Fisher said that this was the first time in the history of Williams skiing that Ephs had taken the top two spots.

It was the first time all season that the University of Vermont had lost the men's downhill. Fisher said, "We've never won a Alpine race that I can remember. UVM doesn't lose often."

No fluke

Pler, a sophomore, won the slalom with a time of 1:20.14, with Lyons, a junior and the downhill captain, right behind at 1:20.17. "Crawford and John were not flukes, they were not skiing above their heads," said Fisher.

"Another factor that has helped is the consistency of Tuck Collins. He's been around the top ten, and that result is crucial to our team score. And freshman Tim Hill has the potential to score just as well."

"Our Alpine team should be right up there most of the time," said Fisher. "Even when Crawford fell on Friday (in the giant slalom), we still came in third. I expect at least a second or third at Middlebury as well."

Lyons will be going to the Nationals in Montana in the first seed in the slalom and first or second in the GS. The first seed includes the best four skiers from the East and best four from the West. Pler should be in the second seed in both events, while Collins will be fourth in the GS and Hill may also go in that event.

A seventh-place finish in the Nordic competition gave the men fifth place for the weekend. "There were bright spots," said Fisher of the cross-country, "but Steve Johansen being sick really hurt us."

Women fourth

The women finished fourth overall, placing fourth in cross-country and third in the downhill.

Freshman Heidi Knight won the women's giant slalom, and Kate Knopp '85 skied to third in the slalom to lead the Alpine team. Ellen Chandler '83 took fifth in the individuals to lead the Nordic team.

Swimmers splash Wesleyan

by Chris Harned

The men's varsity swim team handily defeated Little Three rival Wesleyan University, 73-17, to capture the Championship Title today. The Ephs finished the regular season with a near-perfect 8-1 record.

The Ephs won every event following the opening 400 medley relay, and eight Williams swimmers registered first-place finishes. Sophomore Rob Kirkpatrick was the only dual winner of the day, splashing to a close first in the 200 individual medley (2:05.4), and outdueling teammate John Gould '84 to win the 500 freestyle (5:04.1 to 5:08.23).

All-American Rob Sommer '84 won the 200 backstroke in a time which qualified him for NCAA Division III Nationals (1:59.1). Senior Rob Bowman raced to victory in the 1000 freestyle (10:50.0), sophomore John Peloso fought off teammate Kelley Murphy '85 to win the 200 freestyle (1:49.5 to 1:51.4), Gould prevailed in the 50 freestyle (22.7) and Murphy won the 100 freestyle in a quick 51.2.

Freshmen victorious

Freshman Dominic Kulic picked up a win in the 200 butterfly (2:02.7) and classmate Alex Kraus took a strong second in the event (2:09.1). All-American David Johnson '83 glided to victory in the 200 breaststroke (2:18.0) and appears to be a leading candidate to win that event at New England.

The all-freshman team of Bill Couch, Kraus, Kulk, and Will Andrew concluded a successful day for the Williams mermen with a streamlined victory in the 400 freestyle relay (3:22.2).

The Ephs, four-time defending New England champions, will attempt to continue their dominance March 3-5 at Springfield College before traveling to Canton, Ohio for the NCAA Division III National meet. Last year, the Ephs finished in the runner-up position, after taking third the year before.

Women win too

The women handily defeated Wesleyan as well.

Williams winners included Liz Jex '83 in the 100 butterfly, Kim Eckrich '85 in the 50 breaststroke, the 100 IM and the 100 breast, Sue Knapp '85 in the 200 crawl, Kathy Kirmayer '86 in the 100 free, Cecilia Clepiela '84 in the 200 back, and Alicia Murphy '86 in the 200 breast.

The Ephwomen also won the medley relay; but Wesleyan scorekeepers neglected to furnish Williams with a score sheet including all win winners and times.

The women go to the New England at Southeastern University in North Dartmouth, Mass. next weekend. They are favorites to repeat as champions for the fourth year in a row.

Track Third Parker sets new mile mark

by Mark Averitt

Junior Bo Parker set a school record in the mile and won the 880 yard run to propel the men's winter track team into a tie for third with MIT in the Division III New England Championships held over the weekend in New London, Conn.

Parker won the mile in 4:09.6 and his performance in the 880 yard relay enabled the Williams team to win the event, setting a school mark with a time of 10:17.3.

Tomas Alejandro '83 once again dominated the short and middle distance events. Alejandro broke a school record by winning the 440 yard run in 49.73 seconds, then anchored Williams' mile relay team which finished first at 3:25.1.

Alejandro came in a disappointing sixth in the sixty yard dash, although as Coach Dick Farley said, "He was just exhausted by that time." Parker and Alejandro teamed up to contribute in 50 of Williams' 58 points.

Parker dominated the eleven-man mile field by running away to a 1:54.2 pace in the first half-mile. He then combined with Bennett Yort '84, Mark Rice '84, and top-notch anchorman Brian Angle '84 to take the 880 relay. Alejandro was supported by John Campbell '84, Kevin Jenkins '85 and Ted Leon '84 in the mile relay. The two mile relay team of Eric Smith '83, John Conlon '85, John Nelson '84 and Tom Pingree came in sixth at 8:05.0. Williams' other scorers both ran the 440 yard race: Ted Leon '84 finished fourth while Jenkins was fifth.

Coach Farley said, "We didn't qualify many kids for this meet, which didn't really surprise me. We're a great dual- or tri- or quad-meet team, but besides our two superstars (Parker and Alejandro), we really don't have anybody to compete in meets like this."

Tufts emerged as the Division III New England Champion with 83 points, while Bates was second with 63.

Puckmen ice two more

by Dave Woodworth

The men's varsity hockey team continued their dramatic late-season turnaround, winning both of their games this week in easy fashion.

Friday night saw the Ephs avenge a mid-season loss to Middlebury by defeating the Panthers, 6-3, before an enthusiastic crowd at Chapman rink.

The first period proved typical of the game, as Middlebury dominated play, racking up a 2-5 edge in shots on goal. Goalkeeper Dan Finn '84, however, managed to turn them all aside, while Brian Rutledge '85 converted on one of Williams' opportunities to give the Ephs a 1-0 lead at the 6:43 mark. Rich Jackson '85 got the assist.

Insurmountable lead

Co-captain Sam Flood '83 extended the margin to 2-0 with a goal that came just 24 seconds into the second period. Rutledge and Mark Wysocki '83 set Flood up beautifully for a clear shot from straightaway, and Flood beat the Panther goalie to the near post.

Rutledge got his second score of the night at the 7:35 point, with Flood, returning the favor, on the assist. Moments later Greg Pachus '84 gave Jackson a perfect pass to send him in alone on the breakaway. Coming at the 8:29 mark, this goal gave the Ephs what proved to be an insurmountable 4-0 lead.

Middlebury did give Williams a run for its money, however, as they scored three straight goals to cut the Ephs' margin to 4-3. Marty Wenthe tallied at 11:58 of the second period, Matt Weeden at 7:49 of the third, and Jeff Scanlon less than five minutes later.

Regain momentum

The Ephs regained their lost momentum, however, when they got a power-play opportunity with 7:02 left to play. Williams' power play has not been

Pomilla Proposal passes; French House passe

by Chris Howlett

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) resoundingly passed the system of priority ranking and lottery for house transfer applicants as outlined in the Pomilla Proposal at last Tuesday's meeting. They also voted to postpone the proposed French House for a year because of a lack of student interest.

The new ranking system, as proposed by Paul Pomilla '84, will base priority for house transfer on freshman inclusion results and class year. Juniors applying will receive four points and sophomores one, while people living in their initial fifth choice houses will get eight points, fourth choice residents six points, and so on.

Applicants will be randomly ranked within each of twelve point categories and placed in their highest available choice before people in the next category will be considered.

Only for Class of '86

This method will yield a higher choice on the average than the alternate first-choice maximization system, explained CUL chairman Cris Roosenraad. "The first choice maximization would make many people happy," he said, "but those who are unhappy would be very unhappy."

On the advice of representatives from the Student Housing Committee and College Council, the CUL passed another motion stating that the new system will go into effect next year only for the Class of '86. The Class of

'85 will therefore not be affected by their freshman inclusion results since the ranking system was not operative when they were included.

The CUL agreed that incoming transfer students, who did not undergo freshman inclusion and are generally unfamiliar with campus housing, should be treated as though they were applying from their fifth choice houses.

The CUL then voted not to offer the proposed French House co-op next year. Although 11 students had been placed in the French House, four later withdrew their names, leaving only seven. Roosenraad declared that this number is substantially below what the committee considers "viable" for

Chandler, CC oppose Solomon Amendment

by Robert Herbstman and Ned Ladd

President John Chandler, in an open letter to the Williams community, formally declared his opposition to the linking of federal financial aid to draft registration. College Council is expected tonight to endorse similar denunciations of the Solomon Amendment.

Chandler outlined the College's plan which included active participation in protesting the Solomon Amendment. He also stated that the administration will "continue to consider what financial relief, if any, the College will provide to students who, for reasons of conscience, forfeit their eligibility for Title IV programs."

"The College has no position on draft registration itself," Chandler explained. "The Solomon Amendment is a deplorable piece of legislation because it links draft registration to higher education."

New committee

Chandler has set up a committee to study the effects of funding non-registrants with College funds. Dean Cris Roosenraad will chair this committee which will include Ralph Bradbud, Philip Wick, Michael Reed, Robert Dalzell, Jr., Jonathan Light '83, Mark Koenig '83, Susan Fritts '83, and Daniel Flaherty '83.

The committee will discuss the many problems that aiding non-registrants raises, according to Chandler. He explained that, contrary to popular belief, there is no "stash" of liquid funds ready to be doled out to draft resisters.

"How much we spend of our endowment is determined by a formula," he said. Changing that formula to provide aid for non-registrants would involve a change in tuition, according to Chandler.

College Council will consider two proposals opposing the Solomon Amendment at tonight's meeting.

Bates Proposal

One of the proposals, written by the representative assembly at Bates College and distributed to several Eastern colleges, calls for opposition on the grounds that the Solomon Amendment is "unfair and discriminatory." Middlebury College has already approved this resolution and other colleges are in the process of debating it.

Petition for aid

The other proposal is a petition currently circulating on campus, which urges the Board of Trustees to provide "some sort of aid to non-registrants to replace the federal funds so that students will be able to continue their education."

The petition, designed by a special action group of 20 members of the Coalition Against Militarism, is being considered by the Council separately from the Bates Proposal.

Carl Van Duyne, dead at 36

Carl I. Van Duyne, associate professor of economics at Williams College and a resident of Petersburg Road, died yesterday morning after a short illness. He specialized in macroeconomics and international economics.

Born May 30, 1946 in Newark, N.J., the son of Gardner and Jane Ill Van Duyne, now of Mantoloking, N.J., he was married July 22, 1972, to the former Wendolyn Krause of Hutchinson, Kan.

He graduated magna cum laude in 1968 from Princeton University and received his Master's in 1969 and his doctorate in 1976, both from Stanford University.

Stanford lecturer

He had been an instructor in economics at the U.S. Naval Academy, from 1969 to 1972, while on active duty as a Lieutenant J.G. with the Navy. He later spent a year as a lecturer with the Stanford economics department.

In addition he had served as a junior staff economist and later as consultant for the Council of Economic Advisers in Washington, and had been a visiting scholar with the Division of International Finance of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Mountains of jelly beans await even the casual muncher at Goodies. (Scheibe)

Goodies found on Spring Street

by Jeff Brainard

There's a new kid in town.

"Goodies" is a new candy store on Spring Street. But it's not just your average candy store. A rainbow pattern of jelly bean jars, framed by black formica, a long mirror and a neon sign blazing forth the store's name beckon the first-time visitor into an unusual environment.

The overnight appearance of Goodies which startled many in the community was just that—the owner moved in in a day-and-a-half, a week ago last Sunday. And already her business is non-stop. After her first three days she had already sold 48 pounds of fudge and had to order more of everything in her stock.

"Here, you've got to try some of this," exclaims Jesse Spector, as he leads a newcomer over to a jar for a sample of some unknown treat. Spector, a cancer specialist from Lenox, takes time out to help run the store. His wife Patty is the owner of the corporation which started Goodies in Williamstown, and which plans other stores elsewhere.

"Cool" decour

"This really turns me on a lot more than my medical practice does," Jesse says. His pride in the store's appearance is evi-

A mixed bag

The Committee on Undergraduate Life finally resolved the housing issue last week by adopting the Pomilla proposal. Putting to rest the fears that the CUL would limit the number of transfers, the Pomilla proposal's passage brought a degree of fairness to the housing system by prioritizing transfer choices. At the same time, prioritization encourages freshmen to take inclusion more seriously, by recognizing that their choices will remain valuable throughout their college careers.

But if the CUL meeting brought a sigh of relief, it also brought a measure of disappointment. Due to a lack of co-op space, and a lack of student response, the French House's doors were closed before they were ever opened. Of the 11 students who had registered for the French House, four changed their minds; that and the space crunch provided by the conversion of Rice House and the potential conversion of Dewey (to a French House), coupled with a rise in co-op demand, proved too much.

It is unfortunate that an idea on which so many worked so hard, and which would have boosted the image of our language departments, met with so little student response. The French House will get another chance next year, at which time we hope it succeeds.

Great buns

Honey-buns. Just think of the images conjured up by those three syllables: a little golden packet of sticky, scrumptuous joy.

The honey-bun is integral to the identity of Williams as we know it. It is the staple of the diet here, the workhorse of late-night gourmet snacks over which varied and important ideas are discussed.

The honey-bun provides a focal point for school spirit. The individual differences among liberals, conservatives, radicals, feminists, chauvinists, lovers and space cadets are all smoothed over in a frenzy of culinary delight. "Let's bury the hatchet," they say. "Let's eat a honey-bun."

Why, then, isn't this hallowed nourishment available in campus dining halls? Instead, we get morning "goodies" of such dubious value as bran muffins, cakes and (sorry to say it, but let's be honest) sugar-covered donuts. When parents and friends visit, we can only hang our heads in shame that our well-known specialty is unavailable for their perusal and can only be purchased with their hard-earned pennies in the snack bar.

What kind of public relations is this? If the College realized the institutional advantages to be gained from its golden egg, as it were, it would give honey-buns to visiting perspective students, perhaps before their interview. It would mail honey buns to parents and alumni along with term bills and solicitations for money.

But for now, we must concentrate on the campus itself. While we might not be able to win the war, we can wage the home battle.

Any late-night visitor to the donut man can vouch that trays of honey-buns exist in abundance. But they aren't destined for dining hall trays. Some go to the snack bar, but what about the rest? Perhaps they are spirited away for the consumption of elite faculty or trustee committee meetings under cover of night.

And another thing. Have you ever seen a chocolate-covered donut anywhere on campus? Or a croeller? They're not even for sale at the snack bar. But they exist.

Who knows for sure how extensive are these monstrous plots which deter us from our destiny? But as students we can only call more loudly for justice, for an equal distribution of the supply of munchies. Honey-bun lovers of the world, unite!

Unfair

To the editor:

I enjoyed the interview with Professor Stiglitz; however, I found it too pessimistic and that it contained many unfair assumptions. There are many students here, who enjoy "learning for its own sake" and who are "excited by ideas". Courses and studies introduce the students to the facts and the "mechanical knowledge" which are necessary for more complete thought on, greater understanding of, and appreciation for "big ideas". Demands on students are not so great that course materials occupy our every waking thought. Some of us devote time to meditation and prayer to allow what has been learned to flow through the mind and stimulate questions about God and existence.

Expanding knowledge does not dampen creativity but stimulates and broadens it. Perhaps, creative expression is not as great as it can be while we are occupied with other school requirements but I think some creativity is shown in papers and class discussions.

Williams is far from an "emotional black hole". Multifaceted freshman do not enter Williams and four years later, graduate with a "one-dimensional instrumental rationality". Williams students come from all over the U.S. and from different areas of the globe. With them, they bring varied educations from different atmospheres and backgrounds. Students influence each other to produce a greater spectrum of rationality and emotions for the individual. At Williams students progress, not regress.

Cheer up, Professor Stiglitz, there are some of us who are emotionally and intellectually growing and who are seeking a greater understanding of "large questions".

Doing well

To the editor:

Before we get too depressed about the fact that "Applications Plummet for '83" (2-22-83), I think it's worth reminding ourselves that Williams is one of about ten colleges or universities in the nation that still receives eight applications for each opening in the freshman class. Think about that, the kind of secondary school record you need to be accepted here, and the simple demographic fact that there are fewer and fewer of you, and it becomes clear just how well Williams is doing in attracting the nation's top students.

Williams, gays and the oppressive silencing

The following piece was submitted by the advisory board of the Williams Gay People's Union.

But is homosexuality an issue? Certainly it is the subject of cozy liberal dialogue between the Gay People's Union and the administration, among self-styled radicals and progressive professors. It is the topic which, when raised in the classroom, invariably provokes silence from the homophobic, the self-conscious and, of course, the "guilty". So then, yes! homosexuality is indeed an issue at Williams College: an issue so rarefied, so intangible, as to seem almost a non-issue.

The value of a non-issue is that it promotes no discussion and thwarts confrontation; in short, it facilitates silence. For such a nasty, undignified issue as homosexuality, isn't silence just wonderful, or at least appropriate? And yet, what is silence but denial: denial of the validity of one aspect of sexuality, and also a denial of its reality altogether. Since, then, gays (the generic term for both lesbians and gay men) do not exist, consideration of one's emotional/sexual preference is unnecessary, as is gay rights or a non-discriminatory clause in the official Williams College statement. Such is the Williams College atmosphere.

Is it left for us to establish the existence of homosexuals? First, let us admit the debasing nature of a requirement to prove one's own existence. Addressing such a total denial is itself participation in subtly violent discrimination. But if this requirement were the extent of the problem, homosexual oppression would have abated long ago with the marching of millions of supporters in National Gay Pride Week. Yet for several years now, in major cities across America, gays still feel angry enough to march for their rights. Silent denial, so strong on this campus, is far more pernicious.

As people become introduced to homosexuality, either through introspection or meeting a gay person, continuing denial of the existence of gays requires extreme manipulation of perceptions. Rescinding a gay's right to full existence is a more available and thereby stronger form of denial. If we construct an image of gays as people foreign to normality, removed from ourselves, how much easier denial becomes. The subject becomes extraordinary, in a pejorative sense. To concern oneself with homosexuality in any but the most abstract way is to be extreme. We have allowed ourselves to banish the topic as a truly personal concern. This final indulgence brings into focus many of the problems people face in exploring their emotions while in the Williams environment.

Let's begin to look at the problem on the fundamental level of language. The quaint euphemism employed to refer to homosexuality, that caused a lengthy debate in the 1977 faculty meeting over discrimination is "sexual orientation." Does Williams discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation? Should an official statement reflect this concern? Williams does not illegally discriminate on the basis of race or color, referring to Blacks, orientals, Hispanics, and other non-Whites; neither does the school discriminate on the basis of religion or creed, referring to Jews, Muslims, Hindus, and other non-Protestants; nor on the basis of sex, referring to women. To whom does the phrase "sexual orientation" refer, and more specifically, how does it relate to gays? The gay choice is pigeonholed into one of a purely sexual nature, as if the emotional side of a "normal" love affair is foreign to the homosexual relationship. Again, a denial of normality.

When not shattered by more current ideas, our societal understanding of sexuality rests on the Christian Church's position that sex is natural purely for procreative reasons. Without new consideration, gay sex becomes repulsive and unnatural, further dissociating it from our notion of the range of real or possible human emotions. The procreative definition of sex, of course, also began to be limited to excessive and harmful extremes.

Homosexuality is not different from the above expansion of sex from a purely procreative realm, as many people have discovered. It has its extremes, no doubt, but we should be careful not to focus on them prejudicially. Gay is not necessarily the polar opposite of heterosexual "normality," rather, we should view both as part of a spectrum. Having homosexual experiences does not exclude a person from having heterosexual experiences. Often people go through different orientations and should, I think, have the freedom and encourage deems immoral premarital sex, masturbation, any type of contraception, abortion, and all forms of casual sex. As the positive aspects of these practices began to be discussed, the brand "immoral"

Our societal understanding of sexuality rests on the Christian Church's position that sex is natural purely for procreative reasons.

ment to explore the range of their emotions. (We do not at all, however, imply that homosexuality is simply a phase one grows through.)

A positive environment, the generic demand necessary for all change, is not easily achieved in the case of gays. The myths continue to be fed by silence: a silence pernicious in its grip on the images of our own potential. The number of alumni who have discovered a gay lifestyle, post-Williams, attests to the unnecessary problems they faced while here. As they matured through Williams, homosexuality was, unfortunately, an issue to be bottled up. The source of oppression today is generated from archaic social myths and perpetuated by an internalization of the values embodied in these myths. So often, it is we the students who will not address our own emotions. The eruption that oppression brings should not have to explode within.

Keeping commitments: funding draft resisters

by Jeff Sultar

The Solomon Amendment to the 1983 Defense Authorization Act links federal financial aid to draft registration. Yale, Wesleyan, Haverford and Earlham colleges have already publicly stated that they will not allow the new law, which goes into effect on July 1, 1983, to interfere with their policy of meeting the demonstrated financial needs of its students.

The petition currently circulating calls for Williams to follow these other schools in reaffirming a commitment to the philosophy of allowing students to attend school regardless of financial need. This article will respond to the questions most often raised regarding Williams replacing federal funds lost to draft non-registrants.

WHY NOT JUST WAIT FOR THE SOLOMON AMENDMENT TO BE DECLARED UNCONSTITUTIONAL?

While the Solomon Amendment seems to blatantly violate numerous constitutional rights, we have no guarantee that it will fall in the courts. Even a successful legal challenge, with the accompanying appeals, will take a considerable length of time. Some of the men affected by the new law will not be able to attend Williams next year unless they have the lost federal funds replaced. And for these men, because of their moral opposition to draft registration, registering simply is not an option.

BUT I AGREE WITH DRAFT REGISTRATION, SO WHY SHOULD I SIGN THE PETITION?

The controversy surrounding the Solomon Amendment has nothing to do with the legitimacy of draft registration. President Chandler's position that draft registration itself is "good national policy," but that the Solomon Amendment is "a deplorable piece of legislation" exemplifies the distinction between the two. The position in the petition merely deals with the response that put forth Williams should make regarding the Solomon Amendment as an affront to its fundamental policy of allowing students to attend regardless of need; it in no way involves itself with the question of draft registration as national policy.

NONETHELESS, IF PEOPLE HAVE BROKEN THE LAW BY NOT REGISTERING, WHY SHOULD THEY GET ANY HELP FROM THE GOVERNMENT?

If those men who have not registered are convicted of that crime, then perhaps they should not receive federal funds. But denying this aid prior to being convicted amounts to punishing them before they have been proven guilty in a court of law. Denying aid, therefore, violates the Fifth Amendment guarantee of due process, that of being innocent until proven guilty and the Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury. While the unconstitutionality of the Solomon Amendment is a separate debate involving national policy, the call for replacement of federal funds lost to non-registrants is clearly a Williams issue. We simply ask that Williams maintain its commitment to allow students to attend regardless of financial need.

WHY SHOULD OTHER STUDENTS HAVE TO PAY FOR PEOPLE WHO HAVE BROKEN THE LAW?

If Williams decided to replace lost federal funds with grants and subsidized loans (which is the way financial aid packages are now given), tuition could be affected slightly. However, paying such a small additional amount (which would only be several dollars per student) seems a small price in exchange for maintaining our commitment to a fundamental policy of the college. Even if a slightly higher tuition is not acceptable, the lost funds could be replaced by making commercial-rate loans available to those men affected by the Solomon Amendment. While students might not be able to get loans on their own, Williams could arrange low-interest loans for them at no cost to the school, thus enabling students to avoid high-interest rates. This method is the one Yale is using to replace lost federal funds to its students affected by the Solomon Amendment.

Co-op space needed

Also, because of the potential loss of two co-ops this year, (Rice House to the coaches now in Jesup and Dewey to the French House), 43 students remain on the waiting list, Dean Mary Kenyatta reported.

As a result the committee decided to return Dewey House to its original status as a co-op. It also urged Kenyatta to find out whether those seven students would like to be returned to the co-op waiting list, and if so to place them with high priority. Since Dewey is now the only co-op left to be filled, they will probably end up there, but not as members of a French House.

Inclusion a success

The Committee also reviewed the freshman inclusion form which will be distributed soon. Roosenraad noted that it was "substantially the same as it has been in past years," except that now freshman may only apply in groups of up to four instead of seven.

Roosenraad praised the overall success of the inclusion process, noting that last year more than 89 percent of freshmen were placed in either their first or second choices.

group, said that nearly 80 percent of the students he has spoken with have signed the petition. He feels that this petition is more "active" because it seeks to compensate for the losses some non-registrants have incurred through the amendment.

"I don't think (the Bates) proposal is as meaningful as ours but of course I agree with it," Yaskulka said. "It will at least show solidarity among colleges, which is indeed important."

Yaskulka added that if the Trustees were not quick to respond to the petition, the special action group would "put some pressure" on them. However, he did not elaborate on what kind pressure the group was considering. He also said that since Williams is in a "comfortable" position financially, it has enough money to give some sort of aid either in the form of commercial rate loans, or subsidized college loans.

University of Illinois professor James Miller reveals the weaknesses of the Soviet economy.

Speaker stresses need for freeze

"This is the year for the nuclear weapons freeze movement," claimed Chris Martin of the Williamstown Nuclear Weapons Freeze Office in a speech last Thursday.

"If we don't have the freeze by the end of this year, we can all hang it up," Martin continued. "There will be weapons systems in place which are essentially guaranteed to accelerate into a nuclear conflict."

The freeze Martin advocates would be a bilateral agreement between the US and USSR to stop all testing, production and deployment of all nuclear weapons. Martin described the Reagan administration as "extremely reluctant to pursue the freeze" and predicted no significant change in the President's policy.

Popular support

However, there is much popular support for the freeze, he said. One-third of the US population was presented with the proposal in last November's elections, and of those, 60 percent voted for the freeze, said Martin. In Williamstown alone, 76 percent of those voting supported the freeze.

Martin hopes to "translate public sentiment in last November's elections into policy—first by pushing for a freeze bill in the House, then for similar freeze resolutions in the Senate."

Such bills have already been submitted and voting is scheduled in the House for March and for a few months later in the Senate. Until that time, Martin hopes that Congress can be persuaded to suspend further funding for nuclear weapon systems.

He stressed that action must be taken now, before the concept of a nuclear weapons freeze becomes obsolete.

"The freeze may never work in the future because the very weapons systems which the freeze seeks to stop are systems which would make the freeze unworkable should any of them be deployed," he explained. "The Soviet Union would have no intention of agreeing to a freeze with those systems in place."

Ghost of a chance

He advised interested individuals to "get actively, directly involved in the electoral process for the 1984 elections," adding that "the important thing is not for the freeze to endorse a particular candidate but to make it clear to anyone running for office that unless they support the freeze they haven't got a ghost of a chance of getting elected."

Merit Scholars flock to Williams

Williams has more National Merit Scholars in its current freshman class than any other comparable college of its size in the nation, according to director of admissions Philip Smith.

There are currently 35 freshman Merit Scholars, which is the largest number in the school's history, Smith said.

All of the 5,448 students in the nationwide program received at least a $1,000 grant. Some schools sponsor Merit Scholars as a recruiting device, offering them a chance to compete for additional grants from the school.

Among other schools that do not sponsor Merit Scholars, Amherst has only 19 in its current freshman class, Swarthmore has 18 and Wesleyan has eight.

dent. "The whole decor has to be classy, right down to the minute detail of the [candy jar] lid covers . . . look at them, they're cool!"

The goodies in those jars include jelly beans, taffy and fruit slices. In the display cases are nuts, and chocolates containing liquor, fruit and cashews. The store's specialties are imported chocolate, marzipan and shortbread, says Patti. She will also offer bulk orders and shipments to students' homes.

"I've always liked to eat," Patti explained of her interest in the candy business. "I had to take up sports to keep from getting fat." She was a practicing child psychologist before beginning the new business.

Jesse explained that they chose Williamstown for the location of the first Goodies because it is "a high-calibre, vibrant community . . . with a very prestigious college and a well-known summer theatre." The population here is small but "sophisticated," Jesse explains, and according to Patti, willing to pay Goodies' high prices (up to $14 per pound for chocolate.)

Example of oligopoly

"We're not worried about any competition for them," said a checker at the Slippery Banana concerning Goodies' appearance. But an Economics 208 class did address the possibility of oligopolistic competition replacing the current monopoly in the Spring Street candy industry on a recent mid-term examination.

Patti hopes to expand her operation to other locations, possibly Boston, New York or Nantucket. A store in Lenox will begin operation this summer. Jesse is in charge of scouting possible locations. Real estate costs on Nantucket could be four times as much as in Williamstown, and sixteen times as much in New York. But the basic start-up cost for Goodies' custom-built (and baked) materials would be the same anywhere.

"We were fearful at first to sink a tremendous amount of money here," Jesse admitted, "but I already have a good feeling that it will take care of itself and that it will be fun."

Juniors bring back culture

by Amy Chapman Smith

This year, as always, part of the junior class chose to spend the first semester of this year pursuing programs of study abroad. When these juniors return to Williams, friends and acquaintances want to know how everything went.

"When people say, 'So, how was your trip?' " said one junior, "What do they want me to tell them? 'It was fun.'? No. So, I always say, 'Well, do you really want to know?' and they always look at me funny."

Culture shock

Most returning juniors and seniors experience a form of "culture shock." Some arriving juniors described the term "culture shock" as "probably over-rated," and "too broad," but all recognized it as a problem.

Linda Aaron, who was in London, described her first few days back as "weird. It was sort of life being a freshman again." One junior, Kristen Engberg, came back to the United States three days before second semester was to start. She enjoyed her time alone, it was "a time to reabsorb things."

Although, said Engberg, "I did dissolve into tears and berate everyone for a few days at meals. I find large crowds almost impossible to cope with." Junior Stephen Brewster, who spent the first semester in London, made sure he spent his first few days back at Williams with a small group of friends—"I didn't go near Baxter."

Reassessing Williams

On experiencing Williams anew, many returning students remarked that they appreciated Williams more—especially the academics. Aaron had left with her impression of Williams ranging from "fine to routine" and now finds that "Williams has so much to offer: so many fantastic courses and brilliant professors."

But not everyone agreed.

pering," remarked a student returning from Greece.

Aaron was struck by a comparison of America and Europe, explaining, "We have no history! It's so shocking! It felt like people here are so lazy." A student returning from Vienna noticed that with "some people it's really frustrating because you just want to shake them and say, 'This isn't the only place in the world. There's so much more out there.'" Brewster said, "I can't get angry when they haven't had the opportunity to go abroad."

Spontaneous descriptions of a

Williams is a "really intense place, and you can't afford to be aware of a lot of what's going on in the world. You have what's really like tunnel vision. It's scary—you don't realize it until you step back."

Another student, returning from Vienna, observed that Williams is a "really intense place, and you can't afford to be aware of a lot of what's going on in the world. You have what's really like tunnel vision. It's scary—you don't realize it until you step back."

Students mentioned a change in their perspective. For some, Williams' narrowness is not the real world; "everything's taken care of—it's amazingly pam-semester's study abroad ranged from "good" with reservations, to "incredible" and "fantastic, enlightening and challenging." But that was just a cursory look. The students interviewed feel, for the most part, that something about them has changed.

"People want to pigeonhole it," said Engberg. "They say, 'What was your experience?' It's just a part of my life—it's not something separate."

MIT

MIT's Lecture Series Committee (LSC) had planned to show Deep Throat on January 31 as its traditional Registration Day pornographic film. Deep Throat was replaced by Star Wars at two o'clock on the day on which it was to be shown because of a threatened protest by the Intercollegiate Women's Coalition.

The Wellesley News spoke with Leo DaCosta, Chairman of the LSC. "The LSC has shown a 'double x-rated film every Registration Day' since February, 1971. . . . The films are incredibly well attended—our best attended films of the year—and allow us to show everyone who comes previews of coming attractions for the rest of the semester. We show 200 films a year, 2 of which are x-rated; I don't see anything wrong with that. I'd rather have people see it here than have them trudge over to the Combat Zone." According to DaCosta, LSC has shown Deep Throat before . . . "Not only were there no protests, but 2,500 people came."

In May and June of 1978, for a year between August 1979 and July 1980, while on sabbatical leave from Williams, and again during the summer of 1981, he was a visiting scholar at the Institute for International Economic Studies at the University of Stockholm, Sweden. He worked there on developing a theoretical model to demonstrate what happens to primary demand for recyclable products when economic growth decelerates.

NSF grant

He had received a National Science Foundation grant to construct a computer-based econometric model of the U.S. economy for instructional use. That model uses a computer to simulate the effects of national and international events on the U.S. economy.

He had served on several Williams faculty committees including the Library Committee, the Political Economy Committee and the Provost's Advisory Committee and was the current chairman of the Academic Computing Committee. He was the author of a number of scholarly articles and book reviews.

Sailing pro

An avid sailor, adviser to both the Williams Yacht Club and the Williams Sailing Club, he had also published a number of articles on sailing tactics and strategy. A former captain of the Princeton University Sailing Team, he was an Intercollegiate All-American in sailing in 1966 when he won the Intercollegiate Singlehanded Sailing Championships.

Van Duyne had also won both the North American and Canadian Finn Class sailing championships, and had participated in Finn Class competition in the 1968 Olympic Games, placing thirteenth, and in the Pan American Games in 1967 and 1971, placing second both times.

A member of the Faies Committee at the Naval Academy, he had served five years as vice president of the International Finn Association and four years as a member of the U.S. Olympic Yachting Committee and the Athletes Advisory Council to that group.

Coach of the Naval Academy Sailing Team from 1969 to 1972, he also coached the U.S. Team in the World Youth Sailing Championships in 1977, and was a consultant to the President's Commission on Olympic Sports in 1976.

Besides his parents and his wife he is survived by two sons, Carl Gerret and Geoffrey Adin; one sister, Sally Van Duyne of New York City; and a brother, Peter VanDuyne, a student at Lehigh University.

Private burial services will be held Wednesday in the Williams College Cemetery. A public memorial service will be held Friday at 2 p.m. in the Thompson Memorial Chapel on the Williams campus with the Rev. Richard Sherlock of Princeton, N.J., a Princeton University classmate, officiating.

In lieu of flowers the family has suggested memorial contributions be made in his name to Williams College. Contributions for that purpose may be directed to the College's Development Office in Jesup Hall.

Who are the Smiths?

by David Cerda

The Smith families of North Adams and Williamstown have been brought together in a photography show by Kristin Graham, presented in the Goodrich Gallery through March 4th.

Using telephone listings, Graham systematically contacted every Smith family in North Adams and Williamstown, seeking to take portraits of them in their homes. The exhibition is comprised of photographs of everyone she was able to reach: twenty-four portraits of Smiths and nine photographs of the doors of the Smiths who did not want to be photographed.

Thus, a group of people sharing the most common name in America is gathered in an exhibition which allows the viewer to examine their diversity and their responses to being photographed in their personal domain.

Using addresses from the telephone book, Graham sent letters to each Smith family, introducing herself as a Williams College Art Major, including a photocopy of her Williams I.D., and explaining the idea behind the show. She followed up the letter with telephone calls answering any questions the Smiths might have and arranging a time when she could spend an hour or two with them.

The tactfulness and care with which Graham approached the Smiths is evidenced in the number of Smiths who allowed a stranger into their homes and in the comfortableness and/or immediacy of the portraits themselves.

Each 11" x 14" black and white portrait of the Smiths is accompanied by a packet which includes the photocopied telephone listing of the Smiths, a questionnaire and the contact sheet(s) of all the pictures Graham shot for each portrait. The questionnaire asks the Smiths what their favorite family activity, vacation spot and political stance is, as well as what their favorite dinners, movies and T.V. shows are.

Hence, the viewer is invited to develop a conception of what the people photographed are like and then compare that conception to the questionnaire responses. This conceptual frame is purposefully limited, ambiguous and intriguing; there are no definitive answers—rather our anticipation of the questionnaire responses heightens as we move from photograph to photograph.

The contact sheet(s) invite the viewer to participate in the mounting of the exhibition itself. By examining the contacts we can attempt to envision the way Graham approached the Smiths. For example, how did she direct the Smiths in and around their homes and arrive at the photograph presented?

While the photographs of the doorways neatly document where the Smiths who did not want to be photographed live, the portraits go a step beyond factual documentation and convey the immediacy of the photographer-subject relationship. Gestures are arrested while the camera meets the eye in these close-up portraits.

Most of the photographs are mysterious, some eerie, others straightforward and likeable. Harsh lighting, contrasty printing, truncation and frozen gestures connote that something is "happening" here.

Although not always superbly printed, the photographs nonetheless emit a presence which invites the viewer to ask "who are these people." The viewer may refer to the packet accompanying the photographs for possible answers or may simply walk away thinking "that was Mr., Mrs., or Ms. Smith." The show is rich in material which allows the viewer to participate in almost every aspect of its construction and is therefore well worth a trip to the Goodrich gallery.

Squash squishes Wesleyan

The men's squash team completed its intercollegiate season this week with a resounding 9-0 victory over rival Wesleyan to capture yet another Little Three Championship. Williams finished with an 18-4 won-loss record.

The win was highlighted by the impressive play of the team's four seniors: Matt Lynch, Marc Sopher, Roger Platt and Mike Treltler. While Lynch "nuked" his helpless opponent with hard serves and raw power, both Sopher and Platt wore down their adversaries with finesse and superior court movement. The most exciting win, however, was reserved for Treltler, who overcame his admirable foe in a grueling five-game match.

Rejoined by juniors Greg Zaff and Tom Harrity, who spent last weekend at the Nationals in San Francisco, the rest of the Ephmen rode to easy victories, dropping only one game among five matches.

Expect five ranking

On the strength of their schedule and their successful season, the racketmen expect to secure a number five ranking nationally, behind Harvard, Princeton, Yale and Trinity. The team hopes to make an impressive showing at the Intercollegiate Championships to be held this weekend in Princeton.

Each team from across the country sends its top six players with numbers one and two playing in the "A" flight, numbers three and four in the "B" and numbers five and six in the "C". Each draw is devised as a separate tournament with seedings and feed-in consolations to losers up through the quarter-finals.

Individual players' points are then added to form a team total upon which the six-man team rankings for the season are based. With many of its top six likely to receive high seeds, Williams stands in good stead to outperform foes Trinity and Yale.

Alpine hot, nordic not

A third-place slalom finish led the men's ski team to an overall sixth place finish in the Middlebury Carnival and Eastern Championships this weekend.

Williams placed fifth in a tight giant slalom (GS) race, eighth in the cross-country and eighth in the X-C relay.

In the slalom, Alpine captain Crawford Lyons '84 led the team with a third place finish. Tim Hill '86 finished seventh and Chris Eagon '84 was 16th.

In the GS, Lyons was 13th and Hill was 17th to lead the Ephmen.

Cross-country

Spencer Jones '85 led the cross-country team with a 32nd place finish. Ragnar Horn '86 following in 33rd, and Chuck Mahoney '86 was 36th.

"It was the same story," said Coach Bud Fisher. "The Alpine team did very well, but cross-country was not so hot."

"Overall," Fisher continued, "that was the trend over the whole season. The Alpine team is in the top three in the East, but the cross-country needs to come along."

Four make nationals

Lyons, John Pier '85, Tuck Collins '83 and Hill will be going to the Nationals in Montana next week. "We qualified more people than ever before," said Fisher. "Our goal is to finish in the top ten."

Hockey

and a host of Babson defenders fell into the goal, knocking it off its posts. However, the referee ruled that the puck had crossed the goal line before the posts were dislocated, and the goal stood.

Babson came into the game with a 19-3-1 record and a number two ranking in the ECAC Division II.

On the Williams side, there were heroes aplenty: Brownell, with his two goals; Ed Finn, with the game-winner; and Dan Finn and the rest of the Williams defense, who held the swift-skating Babson forwards at bay.

Injuries hurt Williams

Williams finished the season with a lackluster 8-15 record, but the stats did not tell the whole story. Twelve Ephs sat out at least one game, and Brownell, the team's catalyst, was out two weeks with a shoulder injury. Williams was able to put a full squad on the ice for only one period during the entire season.

Also hidden in the record was a nine-game losing streak, with several contests decided by one goal. This was followed by the five-game winning streak with which the Ephs closed out the season.

Of his team's performance, Coach Bill McCormick noted, "I'm obviously disappointed with the season as a whole, but our play the last week-and-a-half was very encouraging. We finished real strong."

Men spike Adams

The men's volleyball squad extended their record to 3-1 with a 15-13, 8-15, 15-12, 15-7 victory over a scrappy Adams Turners club Saturday.

The Ephs, led by junior setters Vince Brandstein and Steve Brewster, looked sharper than they have all season, making smooth defensive transitions and involving all of their hitters in the offensive flow.

Midway through the first game, with the score 8-8, Brandstein put a Brewster short set down inside the Turners' ten foot line, igniting the crowd and establishing a new, more energetic pace for the rest of the match.

From there Williams began to dominate offensively, freshman Chris Clary and Brewster augmenting Brandstein's hitting power and senior Bill Best dinking superbly.

"I was very pleased with our performance," said senior player/coach Paul Sabbah. "Pieces are starting to fall into place and we're now playing the way I thought we would three or four weeks ago."

Women's squash wins

The women's squash team handily disposed of Smith College 6-1 on Tuesday night.

Williams' number one player, Barbara Riefler '83, destroyed opponent Faith Hawkins by a 3-0 score. Lisa Buckley '83 handled Smith's Lisa Lindstrom with ease, 3-0.

Hilary Thomas '85 topped Smith's Sue Colodny, 3-0; Eph Heidi Halleck '83 took the measure of Debora Parkins, 3-1; Liz Cole '83 shutout Rose Reed, 3-0; and Amina Mahmood '84 blanked Barbara Rybke, 3-0. Cassie Fisher, playing number two, was the lone Eph loser in the Smith match, succumbing to Wendy Pruitt, 3-2.

The win improved Williams' record to 11-8. Riefler, Fisher, Thomas and Buckley will be competing for the National Title in March.

Tufts dunks hoopsters

Season-high performances by Kay Lackey '85 and T. K. Meehan '83 were not enough, as the women's basketball team lost to Tufts 86-61 Saturday and 68-64 to Smith in overtime Tuesday.

Against Tufts, Lackey scored 24 points and Lynne Jaycocks '85 added 16. The Ephwomen stayed with the Jumbos for the first half, but three quick hoops in the second half sparked Tufts to the win. Due to sickness, Williams played with only seven players.

Smith was seeded first in the New England Athletic Conference (NIAC) tournament, but Meehan's 25 points and the leadership of fellow co-captain Cathy Evans '83 kept Williams in the game. Lackey got the tying basket at the buzzer, but Smith scored ten foul shots in the overtime period to get the win.

The Ephwomen, now 4-12, face Amherst to close the season Saturday Wednesday at 7:30 at home.

Women's hockey falters

The women's hockey team (2-7-1) finished their season on a down note as they tied Skidmore 4-4 on Saturday and lost to UConn 5-4 on Thursday.

Co-captains Bea Fuller '83 and Meredith McGill '83 scored the first two goals to put the Ephwomen up 2-0 early.

"Then," said Coach Bernie Neuner, "we fell apart. Although they had a good goalkeeper, Skidmore was a weak team, and it was a disappointing game."

Pam Briggs '84 and Sally Hart '86 scored the next two goals; Hart's tying goal was her third in three games.

"The positive thing about our season was that we were competitive with almost everyone," Neuner said.

Hoopsters trample Tufts

by John Clayton

Junior Guard Art Pidoriano scored 32 points to lead the basketball team to a 82-75 victory over Tufts at Medford Saturday night. Tufts (14-9) had been ranked ninth in Division III New England. The game came down to the wire, as the Jumbos scored off a steal with 1:55 left to tie. After a Williams time-out and a stall, Pidoriano drew a blocking foul and hit two free throws.

Free throws win it

After two more possession changes, Tim Walsh '86 committed a foul while going for a steal with 23 seconds left. Tufts' Bill Ewing, however, could only sink one of the foul shots, and Pidoriano grabbed the rebound and hit two more clutch free throws with 19 seconds left to put Williams up by three.

A Steve O'Day steal nine seconds later clinched the game for the Ephs.

Walsh added 17 for Williams, and senior co-captain Scott Olesen chipped in 14. Greg David led Tufts with 23 points. The Williams edge came at the foul line, where they outscored Tufts 26-19.

Loss to Clark

Earlier in the week, Clark exploded in the second half to edge the Ephs 94-77 in Worcester.

Walsh led Williams with 19 points, while Pidoriano added 17 and Olesen had 16.

There were 61 fouls committed in the game, and three Ephs fouled out. Clark held only a two point lead, 41-39, at halftime.

Saturday's win raises Williams' record to 11-9, and assures them of a winning record for the season.

Hockey blasts Babson in overtime

by Dave Woodworth

The men's hockey team closed its rather disappointing 1982-83 season in a blaze of glory last Tuesday, defeating highly ranked Babson College 3-2 in overtime.

The Ephs got off to an inauspicious start when Babson got the opening goal of the contest just 23 seconds into the first period. Fran Murray got the goal, which came on a breakaway set up by Ed Gavin. Babson kept the pressure up, but the scenario changed quickly.

Co-captain Bob Brownell '83 and Dick Gallun '85 got the equalizer at 2:17. Brownell was credited with the goal and Gallun the assist. The goal was actually scored by a Babson defender, the puck going off his skate when Brownell tried to recenter a missed shot.

Dan Mathews gave Babson a 2-1 lead at the 19:00 mark of the first, putting home a shot after a steal by Russ McKinnon. The goal was a tough one for the Ephs to give up, having played so well for most of the period. Ed Flinn '83 almost retied the game 30 seconds later, as he hit the post on a Williams power play.

The second period was quite uneventful, with no goals scored. However, the lack of action bode well for the Ephs, as it meant that Babson's well-coordinated passing attack, much in evidence during the first period, was beginning to fray at the edges.

Gain momentum

Williams was unable to take advantage of a power-play to start the third period and even returned the favor, as Flinn went off at the 4:18 mark. A near catastrophe occurred at 6:01, when Mark Winters '85 was also called for a penalty. Babson was unable to capitalize on the five-on-three advantage and the Ephs gained the momentum.

Flinn, Paul Coleman '85 and Brownell teamed up to even the score at two apiece at the 8:12 mark, with Brownell getting his second goal of the night on a great shot into the upper right-hand corner of the net.

Neither team was able to score during the remainder of regulation, although Babson had several good chances. Dan Flinn '84, who had 38 saves playing yet another outstanding game in the net, turned them aside, however, and sent the game into overtime.

Overtime confusion

The end was not long in coming, as brother Ed finished off his career in heroic fashion, scoring the game at 3:45 of the overtime. The goal came about as the result of a mass melee in front of the net, which screened the goaltender and gave Flinn his opportunity.

At first, it appeared that the goal would be waved off by the referee. Flinn, the goaltender, Continued on Page 7

Women skiers third in eastern tourney

The women's ski team raced to their best team finish at the WEISA (Women's Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Association) Championships this weekend at Middlebury. Placing third in the Giant Slalom, Slalom and Cross Country Individual and fourth in the relay, Williams scored a total of 350 points to finish third overall.

The stakes and emotions were high this weekend as it was the last chance to qualify individuals for the Cross Country NCAA competitions to be held in Bozeman, Montana. Senior Ellen Chandler finished a solid seventh in her last carnival followed by Sarah Bates '85 in 15th and Karla Miller '85 in 26th. They put together their best efforts in the relay on Saturday, Chandler posting the fourth fastest leg, to put the team in fourth in that event.

Knight stars

Heidi Knight '86 continued her domination of the downhill circuit by coming back after placing second in the first run of the G.S. to win by a hundredth of a second. She also led the team in the slalom with third place on Saturday. Kate Knopp '85 skied consistently to eighth place in both events.

Betsy Paine '85 was the third team scorer in the G.S. placing 22nd and collecting 21 points for the team tally. Marcy Rubinger '85 produced a solid slalom result on Saturday with an 18th—scoring 24 points. Freshman Peg Dyer also skied to her best result all season.

Heidi Knight, Ellen Chandler and Kate Knopp were named to the "All-East" Team and will compete, along with Sarah Bates at the NCAA Division I Nationals, March 6-12, in Montana.

New England champs again

by Chris Harned & Rob Tercek

The Williams College women's swim team set eight meet records and took first in 13 of 22 events while winning its fourth consecutive New England title this weekend at Southeastern Massachusetts. The Ephs won in convincing fashion, outscoring second place Tufts by a 785 to 613 margin.

Sophomore Kim Eckrich collected four individual victories while freshman sensation Kathy Kirmayer set Meet records in winning the three backstroke events. Senior co-captain Liz Jex won the 100 freestyle for the fourth year in a row, and Diver Dina Esposito '83 set another record while winning the one-meter diving.

Williams dominated the meet from the start, winning the opening event of the meet, the 200 medley relay, with a Meet record time of 1:54.88. Kim Eckrich then sprinted to victory in the 50 breaststroke (31.9) while fellow sophomore Peg Thomas took eighth.

Kirmayer swam to her first backstroke win of the meet, taking the 200 in 2:16.4, just ahead of Cecilia Cleplela, in fourth at 2:19.86. Co-captains Katie Hudner and Jex battled for third and fourth in the 50 freestyle (25.07 and 25.4) while Anne Tuttle '83 took eighth in the event. Dina Esposito concluded a successful Friday for the Ephs by winning the one meter diving with a Meet record 376.65 points.

The 200 freestyle relay team opened Saturday's competition on a high note, taking the event in a record 1:40.71.

The Ephs then won three of the day's four remaining events. Kirmayer opened the barrage with her record setting 100 backstroke victory (1:01.83), and Eckrich glided to victory in the 100 breaststroke (1:09.6), while Thoman took seventh (1:14.16). The 400 medley relay quartet concluded the day with their record shattering victory in 4:10.74.

Leading by only 80 points after two days, the Ephs came alive on Sunday to take five firsts. Stauffer, Knapp, Kirmayer, and Jex teamed up to win the 400 freestyle relay (3:40.13) and another record. Kirmayer raced to her final backstroke win of the meet, taking the 50 in a record shattering 28.81.

Jex, a seven-time National champion last year, led a host of Ephs in her 100 freestyle victory (54.81).

Williams concluded the Meet in sterling form, as Eckrich chalked up a win in the 200 breaststroke (2:30.72), just ahead of classmate Thoman (2:42.29). In the most exciting race of the day, Eckrich touched out Jex in the 100 individual medley (1:02.25 to 1:02.51) while Hudner and Cleplela battled for sixth and eleventh (1:05.99 and 1:06.77).

The victorious Ephs will travel to Canton, Ohio on March 11, 12 and 13 in hopes of defending their National title.

Paper, Van Eck elected to College Council

Tom Paper '84 was elected president of the College Council in last week's elections. About 850 students voted, less than half of the student body.

Participation was higher two years ago, when 1251 students voted.

Paper received 406 votes, defeating Jay Ward '84, the current Council vice-president, who got 237 votes; Michael Sullivan '84, who got 126; and Joseph Beach '84, who got 97.

Jan Van Eck '85 was elected vice-president, defeating Bill Sawyers '84, by a vote of 469 to 329.

Hamilton Humes '85 will be treasurer. He defeated Benjamin Bahn, 432-372. Matthew Dodds '86 will be secretary.

Run-offs in other races

Three candidates for the six at-large representatives to Council were elected outright: Amy Glick '86, Brook Larmer '84 and Anza Mammen '86. In this week's run-off elections, five other candidates vied for the remaining three spots: Evie Cobden '84, Andrew Cypriot '85, Craig Hammond '85, Jamie King '84 and Kathy Mountcastle '85.

Navjeet Bai '84 and Sue Reilly '85 were elected to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR.)

In the elections for two representatives from each class to the Honor and Discipline Committee, Chris Harned and Laura Voipe of the Class of '85 both won.

Herve Jean-Baptiste of the Class of '84 and Robert Voter turnout at last week's College Council election was poor. Only 850 students voted.

Kapilinsky of the Class of '86 were elected to H and D last week. Tony Griffith, Sue Martin and Rob McClean ran for the other '84 spot in this week's run-off elections and Sean McAvoy and Daniel Peris ran for the other '86 spot.

CUL race

In the elections for one representative from each class to the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), Mireya Calderin of the Class of '85 was elected unopposed.

In this week's run-offs, Tony Griffith, Christine Harrington, Joel Heilman and Paul Pomilia vied for the '84 spot; Marty Col-ins, Amy Harrison and Donald Hess ran for the '86 spot; and Sara Gross and Bill Sawyers faced off for the at-large representative spot.

In elections for representatives from each academic division to the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), Doris Beyer '84, Laura Seligson '85 and Paul Pomilia '84 were elected to the Division I, II and III spots, respectively.

John Irwin '85 and Mike McShane '85 ran for CEP at-large representative in the run-offs.

No Greylock rep

Candidates for Housing Category representatives to Council were not placed on last week's ballot because all of them ran unopposed. The representatives will be John Carpenter '85, Sara Gross '85, Peter Kandel '84 and Kim Zullo '84 for Mission Park, Dodd-Tyler, Berkshire Quad and Row Houses, respectively.

No one nominated themselves to be housing representative for the Greylock Quad. Current Council president Stuart Robinson '83 said that a candidate may be solicited during this spring's nomination process for other college committees.

Mass, Conn, Philadelphia governments fight apartheid

This is the first in a series of articles dealing with aspects of the divestment process. The articles will discuss the results of divestment in institutions outside of Williams as well as the effects of divestment on corporations dealing in South Africa.

by Néd Ladd

State and local governments have taken a more active role in the divestment process than Williams College thus far. The states of Massachusetts and Connecticut as well as the city of Philadelphia have enacted legislation calling for divestment in some form.

In Massachusetts, a bill sponsored by state Senator Jack Backman and Representative Mel King passed over Governor Edward King's veto on January 4, 1982 to become the first legislation in the United States requiring total divestment of state funds from all corporations and banks dealing in South Africa.

The law requires complete divestment from all state pension funds, most notably the employee and teacher pension funds. The funds are valued at $1.8 billion and the law will affect five percent or about $90 million, according to Backman. As of November 30, 1982, the selling of South African stocks has actually resulted in a net gain of

Barnett reports on banks

by Melissa Matthes

At the meeting of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) last week, political science professor Vince Barnett reported on his recent meeting with several College trustees and Citicorp bank officers concerning Williams' deposits in banks issuing loans to South Africa. Barnett concluded that it would be difficult and inconsistent for the College not to do business with such banks.

Barnett's investigation, which was promised by the College at the end of January's hunger strike as one way to clarify its investment policies, revealed that both the Trustees and Citicorp officials believe that loans to South Africa should be judged on a case-by-case basis.

Citicorp, one of the banks Williams does business with, has established guidelines concerning their loan policy to South Africa. The bank will make no loans for general balance of payments of the South African government; its loans are limited to specific projects that can be monitored. For example, Citicorp recently negotiated a loan to finance internship programs for black doctors.

Impossible to trace

According to Barnett, the Trustees agree that the loans should be judged on the basis of their consequences—"whether they strengthen or improve the position of blacks vis-a-vis housing, education or working conditions."

Barnett went on to describe the near impossibility of tracing the distribution and cross-borrowing of loan money. For example, a bank allegedly following a no-loan policy in South Africa may loan money to Citicorp, which in turn may make a loan to South Africa.

Nor could the number of short-term loans, which last only for a few days in order to stabilize a balance of payments, ever be fully monitored, according to College Provost Hodge Markgraf.

Butter vs. guns

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) had no specific comment on the ACSR's claims, according to spokesman Roger Doughty '84. But in the past, WAAC has maintained that loans to South Africa for any purpose merely allow its government to divert funds from humanitarian purposes in order to spend more on its military and internal policing than it would have otherwise.

Dean Daniel O'Connor responded that there is little evidence that the non-military projects would have been created without US loans.

In addition to meeting with the Citicorp officers, Barnett also presented, according to William Reed, College Treasurer, "forcefully and without equivocation of sentiment" the consen-

Gilliam labels 1984 critical

by Chris Howlett

"The 1984 (Presidential) elections are probably the most critical for the nation since 1932," proclaimed Williams trustee and national advisor to presidential candidate Senator John Glenn, Reginald E. Gilliam in a lecture about presidential politics last Monday evening.

"The institution of the presidency has been buffeted, tested, changed and stretched, possibly to the limit [recently] by a set of strange presidencies and odd and bizarre circumstances," Gilliam continued.

He expressed concern that support for the presidency and the government has been undermined in recent years, particularly by the last two presidents, who were elected because they ran against the very government they sought to head, Gilliam explained.

President Reagan, for example, ran on the platform "government is the problem," he said.

As a result, "the lay of the land in Washington in 1983 is not too attractive," said Gilliam. Our political system has been infused with "banal, after-dinner, Kiwanis-club rhetoric," he added.

Meanwhile, the clock is being turned back to the 1920's, Gilliam claimed, with poor houses returning, race relations slipping, the government ignoring public works, the environment under siege and even the Cold War beginning again.

Instead of focusing on these concerns,

Empty pitchers—empty Log

A visitor to the Log would be surprised. In the old days, especially on weekends, it was often difficult to secure a place to stand. Last Friday, whole tables were left open. Alpha Pizza Pi used to have their orders backlogged for an hour. Now they have time to deliver on campus. The simple facts are that the Log is no longer popular, and that much of its decline is due to the ban on pitchers.

The Log is one of the College's most important social spots, especially when given the lack of an adequate student center. It is the only place where students can meet so many other students in such a relaxed atmosphere, where drinking is both social and civil. Though not central, it is at least proximate to the College community.

The College advances the argument, from the Alcohol Awareness Program, that drinking from glasses involves a different psychology than drinking from pitchers, which place emphasis more on drinking pace and less on social atmosphere. This fact gives little comfort when the new policy's actual effect is to discourage even healthy drinking at the Log. The idea that we need less negative drinking is a good one, but it just isn't working out: We've replaced a drinking psychology with a child psychology; making the environment less, not more, relaxed.

So people go elsewhere. They take to the roads, which is dangerous and depletes from the central campus's social life. They go to parties, at which behavior is less regulated and less pacific, and at which it is more difficult to enforce the law.

The new policy also makes little financial sense. The Log, when popular, runs a deficit of a few thousand dollars. This is a small subsidy for a popular social activity. But the Log's declining attendance means fixed costs will be spread out over fewer customers, so the deficit will rise. Result: more money spent, fewer students to enjoy it.

The administration was understandably unhappy with the old situation; the students are unhappy with the new one. Strict enforcement of the law, by stamping hands at the door and checking at the bar, is sufficient. The lack of pitchers doesn't just slow down the drinking at the Log. It brings it to a halt.

Not surprising

To the editor:

I noticed that the article on homosexuality in the Op-ed section was submitted by the "advisory board of the Williams Gay People's Union." Contact with the GPU is through an S.U. Box or "Hotline." It is not surprising that homosexuality is a "rarefied" and "intangible" issue when those who want to bring it out into the open remain anonymous.

Jumbled

To the editor:

I would like to clarify some points attributed to me in last week's article, "Chandler, CC oppose Solomon Amendment," as I feel that my words were jumbled somewhat, and taken out of context.

The Coalition Against Militarism (CAM), in its campaign to assure financial aid for draft non-registrants, does not have some mysterious pressure tactic up its sleeve, as the article implies. In fact, to avoid mysteriousness and surprise, every action the CAM has taken on this matter has been mentioned to President Chandler before the fact.

I did mention a need for the Trustees to respond quickly to the Solomon Amendment. This is because, in all fairness, lower income non-registrants should soon be able to make plans for next year if the Trustees decide that they cannot attend Williams.

The CAM regrets having to begin such a campaign on the tails of (and in fact, during) the Anti-Apartheid Coalition's necessarily strong pressuring of the Trustees. But again, this is unavoidable so that lower income non-registrants can make plans.

Also, Williams' "comfortable" financial position is not requisite to the College's being able to make aid available to non-registrants. Our petition asks for "some sort of aid," which includes commercial rate loans which would cost the College nothing, except the paperwork involved. Williams is financially capable of doing more, such as making subsidized loans or grants available (which is usual financial aid policy), but this is not being asked for in our petition.

Finally, I would like to clarify the intent of our petition and current campaign. Signing the petition does not imply that one is anti-draft or anti-draft registration. The petition does express dissatisfaction with the Solomon Amendment, which is discriminatory and unconstitutional. But most importantly, signing the petition shows one's commitment to income-blind availability of education for all.

Fear and loathing at OCC

(with apologies to Hunter S. Thompson)

by Peg Stevenson

Strange musings late on a raw March night... I spent yesterday afternoon at OCC. I was just an innocent observer, going for a casual glance through the political tracts, entertaining the fantasy that I might join the summer pilgrimage to Washington, stand before a Xerox machine, and thereby insure the survival of the world's greatest democracy.

This scenario was shoved violently aside as I opened the doors of Mears House and was swept into the maelstrom. What's the word they have for this feeling? Oh yes—angst, that's it. Everything exuded angst. Not a great place to be if you're naturally a little high-strung or have a family history of nervous disorders.

A month ago they were creative, distinct individuals; now look.

It was loud in there—the dry rustle and slap of resumes and other vital papers being shuffled about. I squinted at the wall (my God they keep the lights bright in here) and under the aggressive fluorescence I read: YOUNG AND RUBICAM, CHASE MANHATTAN, BANKERS TRUST, PROCTOR & GAMBLE. There it was, a rare opportunity to devote one's life to toothpaste. Whiten up America.

Business, banking, advertising, finance, capital accumulation. Come and walk the halls, handle the money, learn what to move and how to shake. Names for interviews will be drawn at random.

Interviews—so that's how they distinguish one from another. I can't even tell the men from the women. They all wear those goddamn grey suits. The life seems to have been sucked out of these poor bastards. A month ago they were creative, distinct individuals; now look. A good many of the people in this room will break into hives merely at the sight of someone else's resume. Well, I suppose it happens to the best of us.

The interviewers are faced with a numbing task. With frightening detachment they put a series of mechanical questions to the suffering, nerves-crippled victims before them. Galety is a rare commodity here. I guess if I spent that much time in tight neckties I'd be a little testy as well. Still, these folks represent a dark, sterile side of the national character that we would do well to exorcise.

A quick browse among the books should dissipate some of this feeling... the mood has even gotten noticeably uglier since I've come in. Interesting volume here: Guerilla Tactics in the Job Market by Tom Jackson. I begin to look around for the nearest exit.

A strange, venal panic has seized these people. With June looming on the horizon, what should be the next move? Look to OCC, observe the bustle and the presence of some of the country's weightiest business endeavors. Hmmm... get one of those suits, start to build up a properly mind-bending case of anxiety. "I mean, well, anything that everybody gets this charged up about must be important, right!?"

I can't even tell the men from the women. They all wear those goddamn grey suits.

Opportunity! Success! Money! Suddenly, four years spent expanding the mind in all directions are collapsed into a telescopic picture, with BUSINESS at the center. The view into the future from here is "as grim as it is limited."

And yet, a long-ago, half-forgotten idea intrudes on the bleak picture. How did it go? I remember now: "It's a shame that a race so broadly conceived should end with most lives so narrowly confined." Indeed.

A pitcher is worth a thousand words

by Gordon Becker

Last year, as a freshman, I spent many memorable evenings down at the Log talking to people in the typical one hand-in-the-front-pocket-the-other-clutching-a-beer position. I went again the other night, a Friday, and found the place dull and barren.

On my way home I walked by Spencer House, hoping to find a few people at the party who just wanted to pass the bull. Instead, I learned that the party had been closed down because three fights had broken out in some half an hour.

Now I hear that the Log is in financial trouble and could close. Whether or not that rumor is true, we may say, without question, that the Log is dying. Its decline seemed to begin when the bartenders first started checking I.D.s more often. Now, pitchers are gone and so are the people.

What does the college hope to do by cracking down on age and eliminating pitchers? I know... they have to discourage the kind of drinking which leads to store windows being broken. I may have my facts confused, or I might be missing something but it seems to me that the regulations at the Log have shifted the kind of drinking to the type that produces more problems than before.

A typical all-campus party is largely, as the stories tell, a series of people puking and fighting. You can't talk at these gatherings. The Log, however, is one of the few remaining places where students can go and not slip on a floor glazed with spilled beer. People socialize there, and it's rare that any problems arise from it being packed with people. The few incidents seem to have been caused by people who just weren't ready to make the transition to the big time of responsible drinking. In general, the good mood is too strong on a crowded night to spoil it by losing control.

We all agree that asking the school to sell to minors, through the mechanism of the Log, sounds bad on the surface; the drinking age in Massachusetts is twenty. But what happens at freshman parties? It's the same thing with an entrance fee instead of a per beer charge. So be strict on age at the bar, don't give up pitchers.

In making drinking more difficult, one only causes it to be covert. This kind of drinking leads to fights and broken liquor store windows and a general misuse of alcohol. When you eliminate pitchers, people don't change; they go elsewhere. Have you seen the Pub recently? You can't get in the door. How long before a freshman rolls out of the Pub and does a no-no on Spring Street?

We will always be surrounded by people who can handle their liquor and by people who can't. By eliminating pitchers at the Log we don't quash harmful drinking; we simply remove the incentive for people who want to have a good time over a beer.

The Log—the way it used to be.

A tribute to Carl Van Duyne

by Steve Willard

The death last week of Professor Carl Van Duyne is a particularly saddening blow to the many students who studied with him here.

Carl Van Duyne was one of the finest economists ever to teach at Williams, combining unusually distinguished research contributions to economics with a teaching skill that made even statistics classes a pleasure. He had the ability to make the most technical theories understandable, and he did so with uncommon humility and a gentle humor.

His life was a rare combination of unflagging drive and personal contentment.

Carl taught us more than economics, however. He taught us to think and to write with precision, to persevere until even the most difficult challenges were solved through determination and hard work. He struggled also to teach us grace in understanding and courage when confronted by failure.

Because he taught by example, Carl served as a teacher to more than just his economics students. The quality of Carl's life was a goal to which those who knew him could aspire. His life was a rare combination of unflagging drive and personal contentment. Carl pushed himself to the limit in everything he did, yet he accepted his own limitations as gracefully as he accepted those of others. He was always unceasingly busy, and yet his remarkable inner peace made him one of the happiest people I have had the pleasure to know. Carl's family, his students, and his work meant the world to him. He often told many of us that he could gladly spend the rest of life living and teaching in Williamstown.

He struggled also to teach us grace in understanding and courage when confronted by failure.

Carl's final months serve as the ultimate tribute to the life he led. He fought cancer with every ounce of his strength, yet he never lost his cheerful, helpful spirit or his unfailing interest in the lives and concerns of his students. He lived each of his final days so fully that it was difficult to imagine how close he was to death.

Carl Van Duyne's teaching has had an indelible influence on all who knew him. He will be deeply missed.

Steve Willard is a member of the class of 1982 who is currently attending Yale Law School. Willard wrote his honors thesis under the direction of Dr. Van Duyne.

Craig takes over

English Professor C. Armour Craig was named acting President of Amherst College last week. He will remain in office until a permanent successor to Julian Gibbs is named.

Gibbs, Amherst President from 1978, died of a heart attack on February 20.

Craig has taught at Amherst since 1940 and has acted as Dean of Freshman, Chairman of the English Department, and as a member of the executive committee of the Amherst faculty.

In 1980, he was honored by President Jimmy Carter as one of six teachers nationwide who greatly inspired his students.

An Amherst graduate and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Craig received his doctorate in English from Harvard University.

Craig will take over the duties of president from Mary Cathrine Bateson, the Dean of the Faculty who assumed the duties of president since Gibbs's death.

Jewish-Greek link

"Hellenistic times were one of the most important periods in Jewish history," said Dr. David Altschuler, professor of Judaic Studies at George Washington University and author of Hitler's War Against the Jews, in his Tuesday lecture last week.

The period saw the writing of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the origin of Passover, synagogues, and the rabbinical system, Altschuler explained.

He commented that conflicts between Jews and the Hellenistic culture represented the "few against the many" (Jews formed only 10 percent of the population), "the weak against the mighty, and the old against the new." Many Jews were murdered, but Judaism survived, he added.

Christians generally view the Hellenistic period as the time when "Judaism waned and Christianity flowered," Christianity replacing "academic and dogmatic" Judaism, he said. Marx put a twist on this theory with his belief that Judaism lived on in the form of Christianity, Altschuler remarked.

Heroes and martyrs
Judaism, on the other hand, traditionally looks on the era as one of heroism and martyrdom by the ancient Jews, who "perished and were tortured rather than defile God's name." The Israeli version of this theory, Altschuler added, even equates Rome with the Holocaust.

Usually Jewish thinkers do not recognize that there was an amalgamation of the Hellenistic and Jewish cultures, for they consider Judaism too pure to mix with "crude" Hellenism, Altschuler said.

Altschuler remarked that both the Christian and Jewish theories contain elements of truth, but neither comes close to accurately describing the period.

"Judaism is here today more by reforming than resisting and more by living than by dying," he said. "Like any living organism, diversity and flexibility is what enabled it to live."

Fusion of cultures
Judaism assimilated much of Hellenistic culture, he explained. The synagogue, for example, is a fusion of Hebrew and Hellenistic customs, and exegesis is modelled on Greek philosophy. Furthermore, Bibles often were written in Greek, and the Seder ritual is patterned after pagan philosophical banquets.

Altschuler cast doubts on the validity of the so-called plight of the Jews in Hellenistic times. Though anti-semitism was widespread, the government tolerated and protected the Jews. Only in isolated periods, lasting a total of about 12 years, were the Jews persecuted, whereas Christians were frequently oppressed.

The pagan world was more tolerant toward Jews than the Medieval empires of Christianity and Islam, Altschuler commented.

Furthermore, often Jewish "revolts" were really civil wars between different factions of Jews rather than resistance to oppressors, he said. There were so many factions, he added, that every decade of the twentieth century has uncovered a new form of Judaism.

Socialism in America

"America is the only advanced industrial capitalist country without a powerful socialist movement," proclaimed Professor Kurt Tauber of the political science department in his lecture "Socialism in America?" last Thursday night.

"This phenomenon has been referred to as 'American exceptionalism' and it is a psychological, sociological and cultural problem," he said.

Tauber considered the effect of several conditions of American life on the development of the socialist movement in the United States. He refuted the belief that national affluence undermined the appeal of socialism, explaining that "throughout the entire history of the socialist movement it has been the most affluent part of the working class, the skilled workers of the 'worker aristocracy,' who have come forward as leaders of the movement."

Tauber asserted that, while the overall standard of living from 1860-1913 was higher in the U.S. than in many European countries, the American people were not as affluent as they traditionally have been perceived. He pointed out that "the United States was 'blessed' with more dramatic and disastrous booms and busts in its history of capitalist development than any other capitalist country. Hence, the experience of the working class with the threat of unemployment is well-documented."

US born with bourgeois
Tauber claimed another stumbling block to the development of a socialist movement in America was "the egalitarian and democratic tenor of daily life. Americans miss the surface manifestations of sharp class distinctions."

The United States lacks the emotional impetus born of a history of class struggles which has been the cornerstone of socialism in Europe, Tauber added.

"The U.S. is the only western country which was born with a bourgeois culture," he explained. "All the European countries emerged out of the struggle against feudal classes and feudal estates, the residue of which played an enormously important role in the development of socialism."

Immigration and emigration also affected the development of socialism. "Contrary to mythology, most foreign workers viewed their stay in the US as transient," claimed Tauber. They did not come to find liberty but for economic reasons, often intending to return to their native lands once they had earned sufficient money.

Consequently, "whenever a depression hit, what these people did was pack up and trek home, thus the vast pressures of unemployment had a built-in safety valve which destroyed the development of the socialist party in America," Tauber said.

Notes on Music

Dorian Winds

by Greg Capaldini

Last Tuesday night, listeners at Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall were treated to a rare evening of exquisitely performed woodwind chamber music. The world-famous Dorian Quintet, recently back from an international tour, offered a variety of pieces and demonstrated in each the kind of proficiency that has made them one of new York's best chamber groups.

From the idiomatic flourishes of Reich's Quintet in E-flat to the awkward contortions of a Vivaldi concerto arranged for organ by Bach and then transcribed for wind quintet, the group's sound was uniformly rich and secure. Particularly delightful was Francaix' Quartet, a bubbly vintage dispensed on this occasion with real sparkle. And Hindemith's Kleine Kammermusik had just the right angularity.

Woodwind instruments can, indeed, be testy creatures—the oboist had considerable trouble with waterlogged soundholes. Once the problem was dealt with, he and his colleagues proceeded to turn in practically note-perfect performances.

reflected a rare concern for musical integrity. All the soloists were well-chosen, and even the chorus was uncannily well-blended and in-tune. Special mention should be made of tenor Rich Miller and soprano Valerie Anastasio, both freshmen.

Anastasio and Miller played lovers vying in a civil suit over breach of social contract, i.e., a broken engagement. Thus, we have the perfect set-up for a satire of the British legal system. The show's only false notes sounded when the action looked too frenetic, a little too TV-sitcom-ish.

Tim Harbold was the nimble-fingered musical director and accompanist, and Peter Brown provided the spare but workable set.

The casting was superb, and

Record Review

Dark Side Of The Moon: Ten years later

by Richard Chandler

Ten years ago this March, Pink Floyd's Dark Side Of The Moon first appeared. Contrary to the band's expectations, the album soared to number one in the American and British charts and has shown amazing longevity, having been in the Billboard top 200 for 456 consecutive weeks at this writing.

The material on this, their first concept album, was actually written very quickly because Pink Floyd was about to start a British tour. Says the group's guitarist Dave Gilmour, "We sat in a rehearsal room . . . and Roger (Waters, the bassist) came up with the specific idea of dealing with all the things that drive people mad . . ." The things they treated include death, money, frustration, time, and insanity itself. Yet the album avoids the somewhat heavy-handed bitterness of the later Animals and The Wall.

Dark Side is just as tight musically as it is thematically, with one song running neatly into the next to form a unified whole. Very fine guest appearances are made by Dick Parry, who plays saxophone on "money" and "Us And Them" and by Clare Torry, whose wordless wail on "Great Gig In The Sky" is reminiscent of a disembodied spirit.

"Money," probably the best-known tune, has some fine instrumental solos, as well as the only famous bass line Pink Floyd ever wrote. "Any Colour You Like" is an airy group jam, one of the band's few really light-hearted tunes.

One of the defining characteristics of Dark Side is the use of electronics, especially synthesizers; coming before the modern age of slick studio devices, it is one of the best production jobs ever. (Pink Floyd themselves produced the album, with Alan Parsons as engineer.) Unlike today's synth-pop, however, the electronics are woven into a definite rock texture, rather than being an end in themselves.

Impressive too are the sound effects, which are perfectly integrated with the music. In "Time," for example, the beat of the lead-in comes straight off the sound of several clocks striking simultaneously. The talking heard in the background on several songs comes from a series of recorded interviews featuring questions like "Have you ever been violent?" and "Are you frightened of flying?"

Ten years after its appearance, Dark Side remains one of the most important albums in progressive rock. As Roger Waters put it, "Dark Side Of The Moon" was a very important point because all our dreams were realized: because it was a pinnacle . . ." Perhaps the continuing success of Dark Side indicates that progressive rock is not dead.

Club Bacchus parties

by John Clayton

Who were those guys dressed in white shirts and ties at that Winter Carnival party? Did some sucker end up with a job interview late on a Friday night?

On the contrary, it's the new Williams social organization—Club Bacchus.

"We decided to form Club Bacchus to augment the social life and school spirit at Williams," said President Mike Coakley '85.

"We didn't know what to call ourselves, but then Paul Meeks hit on the name Club Bacchus," added Vice-President Rich Jackson '85.

"We throw parties—we've had two great ones so far—and root for the sports teams," Coakley said. "Right after we started going to the hockey games, they went on their winning streak."

Lose money

The club has thrown two parties since it was formed in January, one at Spencer House over Winter Break and one at Perry the Friday of Winter Carnival. Treasurer Will Prickett '85 estimated that about 300 people attended the Spencer party and over 550 were at Perry.

"But we lost money on both of them," said Prickett. "We lost about $100 at Spencer and $185 at Perry. We're not out to make

"We're not out to make money—we're out to throw parties."

St. Patty's party

The club is planning to throw its next party at Perry House Friday night for St. Patrick's Day, complete with green beer and punch and Sean Croty at the microphone.

The club has close to 60 dues-paying members, whose dues offset the cost of the parties, as well as that of buying kegs for club meetings.

"We use the club uniform—white shirt, dark tie, and bluejeans—to identify club members at parties. Since our dues pay for much of the parties, we like to identify ourselves," said P. R. man Mark Winters '85.

Not a frat

Some have wondered if the club is a secret frat, but both club members and Dean Cris Roosenraad disagree.

"Some students came to me in January saying they wanted to form this club, and asked if there were any College regulations regarding it. I told them that there weren't, that they were the first club of this sort."

"But I can't imagine calling them a fraternity. A fraternity would include such things as a

Extensions energetic

by Heather Fredrich

Fifteen dancers stepped out at Chapin Hall last week to present Extensions, the culmination of Marianne O'Connor's choreography project for her Winter Study 99. The program was a solid success and another indication that dance is alive and well and growing at Williams.

High-Energy Jazz

Although the main theme of the program was polished, high-energy modern jazz, O'Connor and her dancers proved themselves surprisingly at ease in ballet and modern dance pieces as well. Overall, the choreography demonstrated a good grasp of the three different techniques and a flair for creating an atmosphere with a few simple gestures.

"Scrubbing Bubbles," the only modern piece of the program, provided the most ambitious and refreshing moments of the evening. The jagged, angular steps were almost a visual counterpoint to the electronic score. Judy Lewis and Kimerer LaMothe in particular showed off the dynamics of this piece.

"Swingstep," an affectionate tribute to ballroom dancing found Mitchell Anderson and O'Connor recreating a magical evening on the dance floor. Smiles and sighs were expertly mixed with some fancy footwork to evoke a bygone era.

High Form & Exuberance

All the dancers were in high form in the largest ensemble piece, "Red on White," set to the prologue of West Side Story. Controlled menace erupted into some realistic gang fighting at the finale.

Dancing in six of the eight pieces presented, O'Connor's exuberance set the pace for the rest of the cast. It is to be hoped that the Spring Dance Concert in May matches the energy of this project.

residential pattern, exclusivity, where the members pick future members themselves, and a national tie-in. I see none of these in Club Bacchus."

Nobody refused
Vice President Jeff Potter agreed: "No one has come up to us with dues in hand and been refused membership in the Club."

"We have a Code of Ethics," added Secretary Mike Uretsky '85, "which explicitly says that we are not a fraternity, and members should not think of themselves as participating in fraternity activities."

The Code says that "This club is an apolitical organization whose duty is to promote the social well-being of Williams College."

Club Bacchus is also planning to stage a giant spring Bacchanalian Festival and a Bacchus Golf Tournament, and to enter teams in the Sunday Keg Softball League.

So next time you see someone in a white shirt and tie at an all-college party, don't ask him how the interview went... congratulate him on another excellent party.

Man on the Quad

What do you think of Club Bacchus?

Bill McNamara '84: I like it because it presents a new vitality and renewed interest in the Williams social scene... although I don't approve of the drinking aspect.

Dave Feasey '85: I think they and the Temperance Union should get together for a mud-wrestling fight.

John Chandler: What is it? Tell me about it. (We did). I think it's the wrong emphasis in these times with the problems on alcohol.

Tim Sedlock '84 and Tom Paper '84: Tim Sedlock: I know enough about them to know I don't care. Tom Paper: Hey, have they already gone to Smith?

Carter Lombard '84: Let's just hope they don't lead us into the same direction the Romans did.

Tedie Jones '86: They had a really fun party. A lot of people think it's like a frat, but I don't.

In Other Ivory Towers

Mount Holyoke College

With only three months to graduation, Mount Holyoke seniors are worried about their graduation speaker. Although the selection process began last spring, President Elizabeth Kennan has yet to arrange a speaker.

Seniors claim that Kennan just isn't interested in finding a speaker, pointing to the 1982 graduation ceremony where Kennan herself ended up speaking. "She's just not paying much attention to us," concluded senior class secretary Gaby Crane.

Kennan argues that expenses, schedules and diverse preferences make it almost impossible to find a speaker who will appeal to all seniors. She has already asked five women, including Margaret Thatcher, to appear. Kennan told the News, "I do not feel that we should have Commencement speakers."

Smith College

Meanwhile, Smith has a speaker lined up but some people don't want her. United Nations Ambassador Jeanne Kirkpatrick, the second choice of the senior class, has accepted Smith's Commencement invitation, but many students, faculty and alumni strongly object to what they see as her hardline, "racist and repressive" attitudes. However, Smith president Jill Kerr Conway "will not withdraw the invitation."

Wesleyan University

Food service workers are scheduled to hit the picket lines this week at all Wesleyan dining halls if they do not reach an agreement with Saga Food Service.

The workers' union and Saga are deadlocked over wages—the union wants a dollar an hour raise while Saga is only prepared to offer 30 cents. Saga also refuses to compromise on the union demand for "decent and sufficient equipment to do the job."

Saga is ready to keep serving in the event of a strike. All but two of the seven dining halls will be closed. Student employees who do not work during a strike will be fired. To replace high-skill workers, Saga will fly employees in from around the nation.

According to Wesleyan president Colin Campbell, Saga must supply the school with food or risk breaking its contract.

Haverford and Bryn Mawr

As a nice community gesture, Haverford and Bryn Mawr hosted the fifth bi-College Model United Nations Conference for high school students. Chaperoning 250 high school students can get complicated, as a letter to their college newspaper indicates:

"We wish to remind anyone giving a party this weekend that it is not funny to get these students intoxicated; any problems we have had in the past have been the result of college students thinking it hilarious to watch a high school freshman get reeling drunk."

Also at Haverford, charges regarding the "course quality and professional competence" of one John Ashmead, professor of English, have angered both students and faculty. The complaints were aired in a letter to the News signed by 10 students.

The letter alleged that Ashmead gave disjointed, subjective lectures; offered incoherent courses; concentrated on "irrelevant contextual extrapolations;" displayed "no discernible level of insight regarding the course material;" and graded subjectively.

The students demanded "that the administration and the English department take immediate and effective steps to remove Ashmead from the faculty." Unless the Administration responds, "we will seek additional means of dealing with this problem," ended the letter.

The Haverford provost termed the letter irresponsible and said he would not respond to the "silly threat" that closed the letter. In addition, three of the ten signers of the letters asked that their names be removed. No one has heard from Ashmead.

however, politicians "interminably debate school prayer, busing, abortion and trickle-down economics." According to Gilliam, the problem is not conservatism per se, but misplaced priorities.

"We've gone to a type of beeder doctrine to cure our economy," he said, "like the old medieval doctor who bled his patient until he either got better or died."

Gilliam went on to note the post-Watergate rise of other new political elements, "a de facto fourth branch of government," Gilliam said.

One of these is the "American news machine," particularly the evening news, where, according to Gilliam, "complex patterns become reduced to 10-second explanations, treated on an eighth-grade level."

The news media is also "very competitive, very much of a pack, very hungry and a natural enemy of the administration," he added.

Other relatively new factors include "a shadow government" comprised of huge congressional and presidential staffs who do most of the real work, Gilliam said.

"That's what we have today. We don't have our political science textbook case," he explained. "What we have then are the elements in place for something new."

Gilliam did not specify exactly what this new thing would be, but he expressed optimism that it would appear in the 1984 elections, which he considers an important turning point.

Gilliam went on to explain and criticize the present system of campaign financing. Most of this system originated in 1974 as a post-Watergate reform, he said. According to law, presidential candidates may only accept a maximum of $1000 from an individual and $5000 from a political action committee.

In 1979, however, a change in the law allowed individuals and corporations to give unlimited amounts to state and local party organizations to spend on "vote-building activities." This loophole has meant that candidates can raise more money than permissible by asking for donations to these organizations, which use the money in ways which free up other funds for direct candidate use.

The result of all this, said Gilliam, is "a special interest, money-groveling type campaigning." "What this has done is trigger a bizarre, often non-sensical type of political campaigning which is negative... and dirty in many of its aspects," he added.

ACSR questions

sus of student opinion concerning divestment.

Reed feels the presentation was useful because the Board of Trustees now has "a better appreciation of life on an academic campus and the depth of emotion surrounding the (divestment) issue."

Dresser divestiture

In other business, the ACSR agreed to consider this spring whether to recommend to the Trustees that the College divest from Dresser Industries, which was cited by the Arthur D. Little Company for non-compliance with the Sullivan Principles.

The ACSR made its decision after the company claimed to have signed a document identical to the Sullivan Principles but said it objects to on-site inspections and audit reports.

Markgraf noted that the report was "fraught with buried weaseling or at least what could be construed to be."

The ACSR agreed to send another letter to the company saying it may recommend divestiture. The ACSR believes that, by informing the company of the ACSR's reaction, the company will be aware that the College is considering selling the stock for the sake of the Sullivan Principles, not economic reasons, according to John Agostini '76.

ITT sold

Mr. Reed announced that Williams has sold its ITT holdings. The sale was a normal trade decision advised by the College's investment managers.

The ACSR also evaluated three other companies with holdings in South Africa that have not satisfactorily complied with the Sullivan Principles. The three companies were Dart and Kraft, International Flavor and Fragrances, and Stauffer Chemical Company.

Dart and Kraft reported that, although they originally could comply, their activities had "escalated to a level not suitable for compliance." The company cited the cost of auditing and the numerous stipulations of the 43-page Sullivan Audit as a burden too great for them to carry.

"Steer steady"

Committee Chairman Richard Lamb said that the committee could not accept that "as a responsible response. If we are going to follow the course originally set, we must steer steady." He also remarked that the cost of auditing was not particularly burdensome considering the worldwide reputation of the company.

The consensus of the Committee, however, was to write an additional letter affording the company the opportunity to give an opinion on the situation and to respond to the committee's displeasure with the report.

International Flavor and Fragrances candidly declined adherence to the Sullivan Principles because, as their report stated, their product "improves the situation when it is available. Its contribution to humanity makes food that's inexpensive more attractive."

Complete refusal

The other company, Stauffer Chemical Company, reported that "no outside group has the right to monitor" its activities. The company claims adherence to the Sullivan Principles but refuses to be inspected by the Arthur D. Little Co., the auditing firm.

The ACSR's conclusion was to send each of the four companies a letter stating their disappointment with these responses to the Sullivan Principle. Later in the semester the committee will vote on individual case recommendations for divestment to the Board.

WAAC hits the road

by Jack Mayher

As part of their continuing effort to inform the public of the current situation in South Africa, Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) hunger strikers Mark White '84 and other members of WAAC have spoken to various area groups in recent weeks. The talks, for the most part, focus on the history of South Africa and apartheid and not on the actions of WAAC during January.

The first talk was at the Militant Forum in Schenectady. The Militant Forum is a monthly event put on by local union leaders and the local chapter of the Socialist Party in an attempt to raise local consciousness on global issues.

White and Navjeet Bai '84 spoke to a crowd of some 25-30 people, mostly students. White described the reaction as enthusiastic. The response was, however, not surprising because members of the audience had visited Williams to support the hunger strike and had done a variety of other things to aid WAAC as well as their cause.

Cynthia Delth, a graduate art student, and White later spoke at Berkshire Community College to an audience of some 125 students. Three classes were required to attend the lecture and write papers concerning South Africa. The lecture dealt primarily with the history of South Africa and apartheid. In the question and answer period, however, the hunger strike was brought up.

Hunger strike questioned
White said that the students seemed "hesitant," as if they wanted to play "devil's advocate." They questioned whether the hunger strikers had "over-reacted" in their action, whether they were really committed to their cause and what effect it had. White gave WAAC's side of the argument in answering their questions.

"The talks did not center on the hunger strike and divestment at Williams because no one outside the community really cares," White said, emphasizing that the goal of the talks is to educate the public on the problems in South Africa.

Williams' most famous graduate

by Daniel T. Keating

A large crowd gathered Thursday afternoon to learn the identity of Williams College's most famous graduate, the topic of Williams physics professor David Park's lecture in the continuing faculty lecture series. Park increased the mystery surrounding his revelation when he declared, "I think he is Berkshire County's best-known scientist," a few days before the lecture.

George Steinbrenner was out. So was President of the United States James Garfield.

Park himself confessed, 45 minutes into the lecture, that he has no idea who Williams' most famous graduate is, or how to determine that fact. But Park did make an enlightening, if not utterly convincing, argument that Edward W. Morley, from the Class of 1860, is Williams' most famous graduate.

Morley's great achievement, and the action for which he is remembered, is the creation of a physics experiment, the Michelson-Morley experiment. That research proved the non-existence of an ether in space, and cleared the way for Einstein's Relativity Theory, according to Park.

"Filled with Jello"

The belief was held through most of the 19th century that a complete vacuum was impossible, so some kind of ether must occupy space. Theorists tried to make the ether support waves to carry light and gravity, and, as Professor Park noted, "Suddenly the universe was filled with Jello."

The Michelson-Morley experiment, designed to detect the current that the ether was supposed to have, is "known, at least for a few weeks, to almost everyone who studies elementary physics, and it is known to everyone who goes beyond that," said Park. "I do not know whether I am talking about tens or hundreds of millions of people, but they are in every country in the world and the number increases daily," he said.

Morley is buried in Pittsfield in his family plot, but he is not well known. "Perhaps it is unjust of me, but I fear that Edward Morley thought more of Williams than Williams has ever thought of him," Park added.

Gifts to College

At age 81 Morley presented the college with his platinum crucible and some glassware with which he had done his experiments. After his death in 1923 his will left about $100,000 to the college, including the gold medals awarded to him by the Royal Society of London and others who honor superlative research. Park had the crucible, glassware, and medals on display during the lecture, and for people to examine afterward.

Morley's father, Sardis Brewster Morley was born in Otis and graduated from Williams in 1829. The family moved to Williamstown when Edward was 18 so, as a resident of the town, he could attend Williams for free. Educated at home, and at Williams for three years (he received advanced placement by virtue of his entrance examinations), Morley had only one course in chemistry, but his self-education was great enough to lead him to be elected president of the American Chemical Society.

Altered conception

The summation of Williams' most famous graduate and Berkshire County's best-known scientist's accomplishment as a scientist is best given by Erwin Freundlich in a statement about the Michelson-Morley experiment with which Park concluded the lecture: "It is curious to think that in the little corner of the universe represented by the space available in a laboratory an experiment should be possible which alters our whole conception of what happens in the profoundest depths of space known to us, but so it is."

Tenure

To the editor:

I commend the Gargoyle Society (Record, February 22) for pointing out the need for more student involvement in faculty tenure and renewal decisions, and for better methods of determining the student opinion on professors.

Gargoyle, however, incorrectly implies that professors are required to hand out student evaluation forms. No professor (tenured or non-tenured) is obligated to do this. Moreover, if a professor does pass out such forms, he need not turn them over to the chairman of his department nor to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), which makes the final tenure decisions. If the results of the student evaluation do reach the CAP, they usually do so in the form of interpretations by the department chairman.

Sharing Gargoyle's concerns, the College Council has just passed a "package" of proposed tenure changes that the faculty will vote on soon. The proposed changes are as follows:

—that the actual figures of the numerical student evaluations of professors be submitted to the CAP on staffing reports, not just interpretations of these figures, and that non-tenured professors be required to pass out numerical student evaluation forms at the end of courses.

—that there be more public and visible encouragement given to students to communicate their feelings on professors to the CAP, and that there be a section in the student handbook explaining the basic tenure procedures and the students' right to express their views on professors.

—that a student committee be permitted to interview students on a professor up for tenure or renewal and to write up its own report on the student opinion of that professor; this report should be submitted to the appropriate department for consideration in its discussions on the professor, and should be included in the staffing report in addition to the department chairman's statement on the student opinion; the student committee should be either an already-existing student committee in the department, a volunteer group of student majors in the department, or the Faculty Committee of the College Council.

In addition, the Council passed a proposal that does not require faculty approval:

—At the beginning of each school year, and again in November, the Faculty Committee of the College Council will place in all campus mailboxes notices informing the students of the following:

1) the names and departments of all professors up for tenure that year.

2a) the names of those responsible for tenure decisions, and thus the ones to whom students may express their opinions; this includes CAP members and the chairmen of the departments mentioned in part 1.

b) the function of the CAP and the function of student opinion in its proceedings.

—The notice will also include a reminder that all assistant professors will be up for tenure at some point, and all students have the right to discuss these professors with the decision-makers at any time.

Log losing faces, bucks

by Jeff Bralnard

Both attendance and sales at the Log are drastically less this year, but the administration is more concerned about the lack of people than sales.

"Anyone that walks in can see there's less business now," said Rich Olson '82, the Log's manager. He estimates that attendance is one-third to one-half less than last year. Nightly attendance averages out to about 120, he said.

Oleson noted that the College's goal is for the Log to be sufficiently utilized as a local social gathering place for students to go to drink safely.

"The College would be elated if we had 500 a night and no one bought anything," he explained.

Dean Cris Roosenraad admitted that the current lack of patronage is generally attributable to the enforcement at the Log of the state minimum drinking age of 20, which drives away underclassmen, the Log's primary patrons.

But the College will continue enforcing the drinking age next fall, Roosenraad said.

Pitchers may return

He admitted that the elimination of pitchers at the Log is an unpopular measure, "which may change before spring is over," if deemed desirable. According to Roosenraad, the decision to revert to pitchers will be up to Olson and the Log Committee, which will meet next month.

The Log's lighter business this year may cause a higher than normal operating deficit, according to College Treasurer William Reed. But he said he won't know the exact figure for this year until June.

"The Log has had a deficit every year of its existence," according to Roosenraad. The College picks up the tab for the deficit, which last year was $3000-4000, he said.

"[The deficit] doesn't bother us because it's consistent with supporting a student gathering place," he said.

But while regular-hours utilization is down, before-hours use is high, according to Olson. Almost every night, corporate recruiters use the Log for information sessions, or residential houses hold pot-luck dinners there. "It's the exception when there's nothing going on before hours here," Olson reported.

Divestment

over $2.0 million for the pension fund.

Unions support divestment

Backman explained that the legislation had the support of both the state employees' and teachers' unions as well as over 75 other religious, labor and civic organizations across the state.

The divestment process will take up to three years so that losses due to stock market fluctuations can be minimized.

Connecticut has adopted a more lenient stance regarding divestment. A law enacted last June calls for divestment from all companies dealing in South Africa that do not meet three qualifications designated by the state. These requirements are:

1. That a corporation has adopted the Sullivan Principles and has received a high rating from the Arthur D. Little monitoring agency.

2. That a corporation does not supply strategic products or services to the Republic of South Africa for military or police use.

3. That a corporation recognizes the right of all South Africans to strike for social and economic objectives.

Partial divestment by Conn

The law resulted from an investigation by a governor's Task Force. The Task Force determined that the Sullivan Principles were not restrictive enough to effect reform in South Africa. However, the committee felt that complete divestment would be detrimental to state funds as well as corporations that are exerting a positive influence in South Africa.

The effect on Connecticut's $2.0 billion pension fund will be minimized, according to Barbara Reed of the Treasury office, because the $100 to $150 million that must be sold will be divested over time.

Analysts for the state of Connecticut said that although potential losses at the present time are minimal, financial risks in the future because of limited investment possibilities could be greater. They indicated, however, that because of present economic trends, smaller companies that do not do business in South Africa have performed better than multinational corporations with South African subsidiaries, but they could not conclude that this trend will continue.

Philly sold $90 million

The city of Philadelphia enacted legislation last June calling for total divestment from all companies doing business in South Africa and Namibia. This law affects roughly $90 million of the city pension fund of $820 million.

City Council liaison Susan Wilcox explained that the law does not effect bank holdings. She expects that the entire divestment process will not detrimentally effect the city's funds because city managers have two years to divest.

Volleyballers spike Amherst

Avenging an early season loss, the men's volleyball squad crushed Amherst 3-0 last Saturday to take both the Little Three and the New England Western Division championships.

The win marked the end of the regular season for the Ephs, who finished 5-1 in league play and 6-1 overall. Sunday, the squad traveled to North Adams State College and won the Berkshire Invitational Tournament over six other local clubs.

Never in doubt

Saturday's match was never in doubt as Williams jumped out to a 6-0 lead in game one and went on to win 15-8. Game two featured the inspired play of All-New England co-captain Vincent Brandstein '84.
